We need, as always, to get the right balance between enforcement and measures that will encourage children to attend school. Merely sweeping and punishing does not solve the problem. There may be a great need to address family difficulties that are part and parcel of the reason why the child or young person is staying away from school. Perhaps the Department for Education and Skills should be thinking about the curriculum.

There are many reasons why young people truant. One of my great concerns has been young carers getting caught up in sweeps. Young carers have many reasons for being unable to attend school. Sometimes the calls on them from home are such that they cannot get there. It is a difficult choice for them. There is clearly a need for greater support for this invisible army of young people, an enormous number of whom—up to 100,000—are giving up large portions of their lives and may get caught up in truancy sweeps in the process. Of course, some young people need to be caught and dealt with appropriately, but it should not be a blanket measure—there should be an understanding of the underlying problems.

Clause 15 places a duty on ward councillors to respond to a call for action from anybody living or working in the area that they represent about a crime and disorder matter in that area. There are concerns that that mechanism could stigmatise young people and alienate them from their communities. For example, it could lead to an extension of the use of naming and shaming by publicly identifying individual children or families. I have spoken out before about my deep concern about naming and shaming in relation to antisocial behaviour orders. That might sometimes work in terms of protecting a community, but ASBOs have been imposed on children with learning difficulties and mental disorders, and it is outrageous to name and shame such children and families. Concern about such behaviour is probably the most frequently raised issue in our surgeries, but we have to tackle it in the right way. It is all too easy for people to say that the problem is down to this family or that family. Calls for action must involve a measured response, possibly involving full consultation within the wider community, and certainly involving children and young people.

Clauses 16 and 17 cover parenting contracts and orders. When I served on the Committee on the Anti-social Behaviour Bill, I was very cautious about parenting orders. I accept, as I have said publicly before, that they have been successful in some cases. I thought that parents forced to sit in parenting classes would simply fold their arms and refuse to participate, but although that might have happened sometimes, I have heard about great successes. There is a place for these measures, but again we need to look at the wider picture. Ideally, parents should co-operate voluntarily. We need widespread parenting support right across the community as a basic way of life. It should be universal, and not delivered in such a stigmatised fashion.

Poor parenting undoubtedly contributes to some of the problematic behaviour by children and young people, but it is not the only cause. Some children might misbehave in the community as a way of crying out about what is happening in the home. Perhaps they are being abused or there are problems with their parents. Children's organisations suggest that social services should carry out an assessment of need under section 17 of the Children Act 1989. The Government could be more receptive to such suggestions. We have had the tough side—let us look at some of the difficult cases in which the behaviour of children and young people has tragic causes.

Finally, I should like to comment on a very sad outcome of the Home Office's legislation. The United Kingdom locks up more children than most other industrialised countries. In 2004, in England, 4,461 children aged 15 and under were detained in custody. The total number of under-18s detained was about 10,000—enough to fill 10 secondary schools. The recently published Carlile inquiry report clearly shows the damage done to children in custodial settings. Restraint that involves the deliberate infliction of violence is used systematically in penal custody. In her annual report, published in January 2005, the chief inspector of prisons raised serious concerns about the use of physical force on children in prison. Twenty-nine children have died in custody since 1990, 28 of whom hanged themselves. One 15-year-old died after being restrained by three staff at a privately run secure training centre. Nine of those 29 children were on remand.

Children in penal custody are known to be among the most disadvantaged in our society. More than a quarter have the literacy and numeracy of an average seven year old. Eighty-five per cent. show signs of a personality disorder. More than half have been in care or involved with social services, and most have been excluded from school. The Commission for Racial Equality has shown that black children are twice as likely to end up in prison as at university. In 2004, 3,337 children who were assessed as vulnerable were nevertheless sent to young offender institutions.

Yes, we are being asked to tackle antisocial behaviour and crime and there is a need to do that. However, I make my final appeal: we must deal with the problem of all those children who are locked up in what appear to be very unsatisfactory conditions.

Mr. Douglas Carswell (Harwich) (Con): I apologise to the House, especially Front Benchers, for missing the opening stages of the debate. As I explained to the Chair, I was unavoidably detained. I shall study tomorrow's Hansard with even greater rigour than usual.

I have problems with the Bill because it is a centralising measure. It will centralise control over our police and criminal justice system. That is ironic, given that the Minister of Communities and Local Government has spoken about the need for localism, passing powers to local communities and "double devolution".

Since the Police Act 1964, the police have been run on the basis of tripartite local accountability. Responsibility for overseeing local policing has been shared between the chief constable, the Home Office and police authorities. There has therefore been an effective system of local police accountability, which has been gradually eroded by Governments of both parties. However, the Bill, especially part 1, marks the stage at which policing becomes the responsibility of the quango state, which will now take on top-down responsibility for running policing in this country.

Part 1 allows the Home Secretary to give directions to police forces and authorities without the need for a negative inspection report. The Government claim that the directions will be used as a "last resort" but hon. Members have been rightly sceptical about that. Such provisions set a precedent for further top-down management. Part 1 also moves provisions that govern the structure and functions of police authorities from primary to secondary legislation, partly in preparation for force restructuring. It gives central Government—the remote élites—the power to shape and restructure our local police forces at will.

I also have a problem with part 3, which contains provisions superficially to deal with antisocial behaviour. I welcome any initiative to tackle that, but I do not believe that the Bill does it in the right way. It refers to local accountability, especially two models of greater local accountability: a new role for local authority oversight committees in scrutinising crime and disorder reduction partnerships, and a new mechanism called the "community call for action". Those models of local accountability are more corporatist than democratic. I have difficulty in accepting that they enhance local accountability.

Part 4 covers merging the different inspectorates in the criminal justice system. The inspectorate that inspects the Crown Prosecution Service has a good record of revealing that institution's incompetence. A significant proportion of cases that the CPS handles are abandoned every year in error. Many hon. Members who have spoken know about the frustration that the police feel when they successfully pursue criminals through the streets only for the CPS to fail to pursue them as vigorously through the courts. The inspectorate has been good at revealing those failings, and the Government should focus on them, rather than restructuring the inspectorate.

A letter written by a serving police officer and submitted anonymously appeared in last week's Clacton Gazette and Harwich and Manningtree Standard. It is touching because it shows the sense of frustration experienced by a professional police officer who feels unable to change things and deal with the top-down management. Indeed, he or she concludes the letter by writing:

"Believe at your peril the rhetoric from the top. If you want the truth, we at the bottom know what it will mean to you."

That brings home the sense of top-down micro-management.

The Bill should provide for genuine local accountability and direct democracy. It should go in the opposite direction from the one that it takes. Power should be shifted from the Home Office to the locality. We should replace existing police authority structures, which lack effective accountability, the ability to scrutinise chief constables and, increasingly, legitimacy, with directly elected police chiefs.

Some people use the term "police commissioner" but I prefer "sheriff". We should have directly elected sheriffs instead of police authorities. It is all very well for police authority members to have a cup of tea with the chief constable. That may be nice for them, even if the chief constable is Sir Ian Blair, but it does nothing to enhance local accountability. If we had a directly elected sheriff instead of police authorities, we would experience genuine local accountability.

Stephen Pound: Dirty Harry.

Mr. Carswell: This is not Americanisation. The word "sheriff" derives from an ancient English term—the "shire reeve". We would thus restore to this country an ancient institution, which we gave the new world, and which has given it lower crime rates. It is less John Wayne or Dirty Harry and more Rudy Giuliani. He cut crime in New York by 60 per cent. in 10 years and he was locally accountable. We need directly elected people like Rudy Giuliani running our police in this country, not the unaccountable Home Office.

David Howarth: I am trying to follow the hon. Gentleman's argument, but he should know that Rudy Giuliani was elected mayor of New York city. The chief of police was appointed directly by the mayor, not directly elected. The hon. Gentleman cannot therefore use that specific example for his argument.

Mr. Carswell: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his helpful intervention—but we can use the example, because in the model that I advocate, a mayor directly elected in an area co-terminous with a police authority area could take on that responsibility. Where that did not happen, a sheriff, rather than a police authority, could make the appointment. As with the mayor of

[Mr. Carswell]

New York, there would be a separation of operational responsibilities and the ability to appoint the head of the police to exercise those responsibilities. I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving me the opportunity to clarify that. I should be happy to send him a copy of a paper that I have written on the matter, if he would like that.

The 2004 White Paper was encouraging because it covered decentralisation, but I regret to say that the Bill does not deliver that. Instead, it paves the way for the merger of police forces—for regionalisation, not greater local accountability. Almost every year, irrespective of which party is in government, we appear to have a police Bill. However, until we achieve effective local control, we shall never get the local policing that people want. Until we push power down to the local level and have democratic, not corporatist, local accountability, we will get the policing that the remote élites want us to have. Until we make the change to genuine localism, crime and disorder will continue to increase every year.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Harwich (Mr. Carswell) on yet another example of his fresh and original thinking, which is increasingly a hallmark of Conservative Members. I know how hard my hon. Friend works on behalf of his constituents and I greatly enjoyed his contribution.

I thank all those engaged in law enforcement and the criminal justice system in the Kettering constituency, and I make a plea to the Government to use the Bill as an opportunity to rename the criminal justice system the victims justice system. I do not think that I have heard the word "victim" at all in the whole debate, and I have been here since the beginning. We often forget that we are talking about victims of crime, and victims of bad acts often committed by bad people. If the Government were to change the name of the criminal justice system as I have described, that would help to change our focus on this important topic.

I have spent 18 days out of 22 on the police service parliamentary scheme, and I have four exciting days lined up, including three nights on the streets of Kettering, before the end of March. Speaking on the Bill gives me the opportunity to draw to the Minister's attention some of the lessons that I have learned while on patrol with local officers. To sum it all up, I want to get across to the Minister the fact that 90 per cent. of crime in the Kettering constituency is committed by 50 persistent and prolific offenders. All the police officers and others engaged in the criminal justice system to whom I have spoken have said the same, no matter which part of the country they come from.

Before I move on to that theme, I shall highlight two specific points. The Government are thinking about changing the powers given to police community support officers. On one of the nights when I was on patrol with the local police in Kettering, we ended up in a village called Barton Seagrave, where the police officer and the two PCSOs I was with did their best to disperse 30 youths who were congregating around the local school and the local community centre. The police officer did his very best and he could issue a fixed penalty notice and arrest another suspect. However, the PCSOs could not do anything apart from appear there in their visible police uniform. That is because at that time, Barton Seagrave was not designated as a dispersal zone. It is, I am glad to say, now designated as such a zone and those PCSOs are regularly deployed to Castle way and the streets off it in Barton Seagrave, and have the powers to disperse those youths. Without the dispersal zone status, they would not have that power. The Bill covers the powers that the Government give to PCSOs, so will the Minister give them the power to disperse people without the need for dispersal zone designation?

My other point is perhaps a little more mundane, and relates to my role as a councillor on Kettering borough council. The council helps to fund the eight PCSOs in Kettering, and the original idea was that they would walk down Kettering high street and deal with all sorts of infringements of the law—criminal or otherwise. One of the issues that the council particularly wanted them to be involved with was problem parking and car parking offences. The chief constable of Northamptonshire has ruled that PCSOs should not have that power, so Kettering still has a car parking problem. The idea of having a law enforcement officer tackling all sorts of issues, such as car parking and criminal behaviour, just by walking down the street cannot be carried out in Kettering. I understand that PCSOs in other police force areas have ticketing powers, so could the Minister address that point?

I now return to my main theme—that persistent and prolific offenders commit 90 per cent. of the crime. In the northern police area in Northamptonshire, which includes Kettering, Rothwell, Desborough, Burton Latimer and Corby borough, 50 individuals commit that proportion of the crime. The police know who they are, and their pictures and names are on the wall in Kettering police station. The persistent and prolific offenders—PPOs, to use the jargon—know that the police know who they are. The whole business is a game of catching the PPOs in the act.

The people of this country deserve better than that, and I have come to the conclusion that the only way to tackle the issue seriously is to take the PPOs out of the equation. To be brutally frank, they are bad people doing bad things. Prison is not tough enough for them. Many of them who are arrested and put in prison see it as a break. They have recreational facilities, they are well fed and they often have televisions in their cells. Many are disappointed to be released even if it is just a third of the way through their sentence.

The police are advised when the offenders will be released on to the streets of Kettering again and they try to catch them in the act the first weekend after they are released. I have drawn up the simple equation of dividing the costs for local policing in Kettering, the local court system, the local prison, the probation service and all the rest by 50, which represents the number of PPOs. That shows that a huge sum of public money goes on each of these hardened criminals.

I am afraid that we are not going to change these people's habits. They are always going to be criminals until they decide otherwise. We have to come up with some kind of system whereby such people are not allowed their liberty until they promise not to reoffend—and the Bill provides a perfect opportunity to do that. The pressure should be on them to demonstrate that they are prepared to be responsible, and not on the rest of us to try to catch them in the act yet again.

Northamptonshire police excel in two specific respects—forensics and automated number plate recognition technology. However, both are under threat. I am pleased to say that Northamptonshire police force is one of the best in the country at forensics, which basically involves fingerprint technology and the use of DNA. Twenty years ago, there were regional police forensic departments. That was changed and the service moved down to force level, and all the evidence demonstrates that forensics work best with a force of about 1,500 officers. They are particularly effective at detecting car crime and burglary, and the use of fingerprint or DNA technology accounts for the detection of 50 per cent. of all the detected crimes in Northamptonshire. One of my real concerns is that as the Government try to create the super-forces, the forensics skills base will be broken up. Once it is broken up, it will be very difficult to re-establish.

The second technology-related issue is automated number plate recognition—ANPR—and the Bill contains proposals to reorganise the computer department of the Home Office. The technology already exists and is deployed in Northamptonshire to read number plates automatically. The system is so fast that when a suspect car drives past an ANPR camera, that fact is flashed up in the control room and the reasons why the car is suspicious are also listed. Officers are deployed to apprehend the vehicle. The police know who the criminals are, which cars they drive and where the cars are. Unfortunately, not enough resources are being put into ANPR technology, and my worry is that the skills base in the Northamptonshire force will be eroded.

The technology offers huge opportunities across the country. Why do we not have ANPR technology employed on all the major motorways up and down the country? The technology is there and we could cut the motorway network off for all the known criminals in the country. That would have a dramatic effect on reducing crime.

In Northamptonshire there are now four basic command units. As of 1 April, there will be two. At the moment, Kettering and Corby form one BCU; next door, Wellingborough and East Northants form another. As of 1 April, they will become one BCU. Despite all the talk about BCUs being coterminous with borough-level local authorities, that will simply not be the case in Northamptonshire. In north Northamptonshire there will be four district authorities to one basic command unit. I am afraid that policing is about to become more remote, rather than more local.

Finally, I want to reiterate a point that is often missed. The criminal justice system should be known as the victims justice system. We know who the criminals are, we know where they live, and we know what cars they drive. The skills base and the technology to deal with them already exist; we just need to make better use of them, rather than bringing in new legislation.

7.30 pm

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): I am grateful to have caught your eye in this debate, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because the Bill is extensive and covers several important subjects, as is outlined in its long title. I want to address some of my comments to those subjects.

Attendance in the House is thin tonight, and I believe that that reflects the cosy consensus between the Front Benches of the Government, the so-called Opposition and the Liberal party. That consensus is giving a bye to important legislation whose broad thrust might not be controversial but whose details certainly call for considerable improvement in Committee or on Report, or require us to caution the Government to reflect and think again.

I notice that the long title of the Bill contains the words:

"to make further provision for combatting crime and disorder".

I speak as someone who is on the left of politics, but I nevertheless believe that the sentences that our courts dispense—at the behest of Parliament; obviously guidance on these matters comes from us—are wholly inadequate in relation to violent crime, particularly against the person and against small retail outlets whose livelihoods are threatened by theft accompanied by violence. The way in which the long title of the Bill is drawn leads me to believe that the Bill is amendable in this regard. We need to pass stronger sentences against the increasing amount of violence that is being perpetrated, regrettably, among young people.

Last Friday, I visited my constituents, Mr. and Mrs. Daly, whose son Ryan was murdered on his 18th birthday. The Crown Prosecution Service subsequently accepted a plea of manslaughter, and the sentence passed on the person who killed Ryan Daly was in my view derisory. That is also the view in my constituency, where feelings are running high about the inadequacy of a criminal justice system that allowed a wholly inadequate sentence passed on the person who killed that delightful boy on his 18th birthday. I shall reflect on that during the passage of the Bill, because I want to make it clear that we need much stronger, longer prison sentences for such crimes.

I do not wish to detain the House unduly, but the subject of police powers has exercised me since I was elected in 1992. I have raised the matter on a number of occasions under Home Secretaries Howard, Straw and Clarke, but I have done so in vain. The Bill gives me the opportunity to rehearse some of the points that the Government should consider, and which I believe they will ultimately implement. The problem under our parliamentary system is that, all too often, Back Benchers counsel the Government as to the prudent course of action, only to have their advice dismissed by Ministers because it has come from a Back Bencher, and because the Ministers take their narrow advice from people in the Home Office without listening to elected politicians, often those on their own side.

I want to address the question of police powers and the various police agencies. I hope that I shall be able to table amendments to the Bill to give effect to my proposals. First, however, I want to deal with the question of police force mergers. I suspect that many hon. Members think that the Bill deals only with mergers. It is an important issue. I recognise that we need police forces that maximise scarce resources, particularly in regard to new technologies. They also need to be highly mobile and fully kitted out. However, since about 1973, we have had an obsession with reorganisation in every part of the public service, and the end product has not necessarily been a better service.

[Andrew Mackinlay]

I notice the hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) nodding. I think that his father was the first Minister to carry out some of those reorganisations, along with Sir Keith Joseph. There was nothing wrong with doing that in the public sector, but we have since had an obsession with reorganisation, under both Conservative and Labour Governments, and I question whether this painting of the Forth bridge has really created better public services. I want to caution the Government that the mergers of the police authorities might be for their own sake, rather than being driven by common sense, and that the desired effect could be achieved under existing powers.

Mr. Jenkin: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman was in his place when I spoke in the debate earlier. He is precisely echoing my point that this is a disease of the public sector, and that it has got worse and worse. When the problems become insurmountable, we implement a reorganisation rather than tackling them.

Andrew Mackinlay: Indeed. That is a general point, but it also relates to the police. When we implement mergers, we lose talented people and we have to spend public money on retiring people early. I want to express my real irritation about this matter. I have told the Government before that the onus is on them to convince me that there is an overriding case for so-called reorganisations and mergers, both in the police and in other parts of the public service.

The existing police force in Essex is about the optimum size. If it were to stay as it is, it would not be the smallest of the new; it would still be a reasonable-sized authority. It has the full range of police duties and responsibilities. It has stewardship of Stansted airport, and responsibility for a substantial part of the M25. I should say, in parenthesis, that traffic policing is a particularly skilled and harrowing police duty that is performed extraordinarily well by Essex police. The force also has some of the longest riparian and coastal frontage of any police force in the country. It is a good, highly experienced unit, and to merge it either with Suffolk and Norfolk or with Hertfordshire and Bedfordshire would be a profound mistake. I hope that the Home Secretary will reflect on the fact that such views are held not only by Conservative Members of Parliament. As the only Labour Back Bencher representing Essex, I take the view that we should keep Essex police force as it is.

On the question of governance, I am worried that the police authorities will either become rather large, numerically, or be inadequately represented. In the Essex police force area, we have the unitary authorities of Southend and of Thurrock, and I want jealously to safeguard the direct representation of my unitary authority on the police authority. That brings us back to the compelling case for maintaining Essex as it is.

Reference has been made to basic command units, and I want to express some disappointment that Essex has merged my BCU with Basildon. Again, that is part of the obsession with reorganisation. Where there is a unitary authority, there should be a BCU, just as all the other public services should fit into the unitary authority, be it the various health trusts or other agencies. Unitaries work best when all the local government powers are being fulfilled not just by the local government unit, but by all the other related agencies, and they have the same boundaries—there is coterminosity.

That may not be a matter for the Home Secretary, but I hope that he might reflect on the fact that when he is giving advice to police authorities, he should urge them to be sensitive to unitary authority boundaries in deciding what their BCUs should be.

Mr. Francois: I thank my fellow Essex Member of Parliament for giving way and endorse his comments on the future of Essex police. Does he agree that one problem that we have had with internal mergers is the high turnover of BCU commanders and that that does not always make for good continuity with the local population? It would be ideal if, now that those internal changes have gone through, we could have some stability in who the top cops are at local level.

Andrew Mackinlay: I am sure the hon. Gentleman is correct. Without hesitation, I am happy to endorse the view that he has expressed to the House on the need for some settlement to enable our commanders to build up a relationship with the community—the formal representational community of local authorities as well as community leaders—and to undertake familiarisation. There is often far too frequent a turnover, or a revolving door, in appointments of key personnel.

I want to move on from the question of mergers, although I should express some caution about the proposal to merge the inspectorates. I would have thought that the inspectorate of constabulary should be maintained. I see great dangers in bringing those inspectorates together, as compelling as the arguments might be, although no doubt they are driven by the need to reduce costs. Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary is highly regarded and I see no compelling case for it to be merged with any other inspectorate, no matter how important. Indeed, those inspectorates are important, but that is an argument for them to be stand-alone too.

I want to discuss the question of the powers of the various police officers and police forces and community support officers. I am not being sarcastic when I say that I welcome the Conservative party's change in attitude towards CSOs. They are one of the Government's great successes and the Conservatives should be generous enough to acknowledge that. CSOs were introduced with a great deal of criticism, but now each of those officers is highly valued in our community and we need more of them.

My view, however, is that CSOs should be given constable powers. That is where successive Home Secretaries have been too nervous or have been given the wrong counsel by people in the Home Office. Hon. Members have already said that we can get some good, highly-qualified people who can exercise good judgment—they are selected for that. These are not people who are just taken from the jobcentre; they are selected people of good quality.

Often, such officers would hitherto—a decade or more ago—have been admitted to the police force as police officers. They should be sworn in as constables and, although their powers could be limited by statute, they should have the capacity to arrest over and above that power which every citizen has. That would strengthen their status, especially as, under the Bill, the area in which they can exercise their remit will extend nationwide if they are loaned to other police authorities. Currently, their powers are limited to the constabulary for which they work.

When the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) was Home Secretary and subsequently, I argued that the office of constable should be of a minimum standard laid down by statute. Many people are sworn as constables and they do a good job. I want to refer to them. There are parks police in Wandsworth and in Greenwich. Also, there are constables in some ports, but not in others. I shall return to that in a moment.

We also have some big non-Home Office forces, such as the Ministry of Defence police, British Transport police and the constabulary that looks after the UK Atomic Energy Authority's establishments. There is a variance as to their powers, which also applies to training. There should be some consistency—a minimum so that a constable, whoever he or she serves, has had basic training. That should be extended to CSOs. It would be very enhancing indeed.

I have produced private Members' Bills and have tried to interest those successive Home Secretaries in the need, in extremis, for all constables to have power to act. The Royal Parks police, which is a highly skilled force, has no more jurisdiction than you or I, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to arrest a person outside the curtilage of the royal parks. That is bonkers. Also, a ports policeman cannot use his discretion as a constable outside the curtilage of the port. That is madness—a waste.

There should be a constant standard and a policeman should have the duty to act as a policeman in extremis or in support of another police officer wherever appropriate. I would have thought this a good legislative opportunity for making such an amendment. British Transport police officers have had their powers marginally shifted in the last few years, but even officers of the MOD police, some of whom can be seen wearing policemen's uniform and wearing the traditional policeman's hat, have limited powers outside the curtilage or immediate vicinity of MOD establishments. That is ridiculous. This is an opportunity to extend, in extremis, the powers of all police officers and CSOs to act as constables and in support of any other police officer when necessary.

Special constables, who are not paid but greatly valued, are sworn as constables, in contrast with CSOs, who are full-time but not sworn. We have some good part-timers—unpaid volunteers—but they have the status of constable, which underlines the fact that it is illogical that CSOs cannot be constables.

I notice that, sensibly, special constables will now be able to carry out their functions in any part of England where they are on loan to another chief constable, but that makes it nonsensical to deprive people who are ports, parks or MOD police of that capacity. There should be a general review of the extent of the powers of all police officers.

The Bill does not cover the costs of policing our airports, but extensive reference is made to the powers of the police in what are referred to as aerodromes. That needs to be looked at expeditiously by the Home Office, because the existing arrangements are ludicrous and unfair to the council tax payer. For instance, BAA has to pay for the policing of Stansted airport, basically on the demand of Essex police authority—I think that is the correct course. Broadly, the system is that the chief constable of Essex can say, with the support of his authority, that he requires certain policing at Stansted, although there is an appeals and disputes procedure while close by in Luton there is no such payment by the airport. The council tax payer in Bedfordshire meets the full cost of policing there. There should be parity of treatment, for a number of reasons. There should be fairness to the council tax payer and fair competition; there should also be a proper standard of policing in all our airports, commensurate with the size of the airports and the number of customers using them. Surely the Bill could have made such provision, for those reasons and also in the interests of the Home Office.

Clause 8 extends the power of the police to search at aerodromes. I do not understand why it does not include seaports. Since 1992, I have drawn attention to the inadequate policing at many of our seaports, large and small. When the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe—who led the Conservative party at the last general election—was Home Secretary, I proposed the establishment of a ports police force. He dismissed the idea. At the last election, the proposal became Conservative policy. Regrettably, because of the way in which politics works in this country, my colleagues in the Labour party opposed it because it had been proposed by the right hon. and learned Gentleman. That is the kind of nonsense that happens in the United Kingdom. I think that it would be very sensible to establish ports and border police at our seaports; indeed, I consider it reckless not to make such provision.

My constituency has an extensive river frontage. We have the port of Tilbury, which does have a dedicated police force. I am very proud of that, and so, rightly, are those who work at the port. The force is small and has no critical mass, but at least it is there, and its presence greatly reduces the likelihood of organised crime such as people-smuggling. Regrettably, the force was privatised under the last Conservative Administration, but it is staffed by dedicated police officers.

On other parts of the river frontage, there are no police officers. Boats arrive from the continent two or three times a day, and there is no Home Office immigration, no Customs and Excise and no police officer. Do you think, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that those involved in organised crime do not know that? I have told successive Home Secretaries about it. They have massaged me, as it were, by allowing me to talk to the Home Office police adviser, and a delightful man he was too, but that will not stop organised crime in and through our seaports.

Successive Home Secretaries have plugged holes at Sangatte and other places, but they have not addressed the real problem. People enter the United Kingdom via a number of seaports, especially on the east coast, because there is no police force there. We need a dedicated, highly mobile force. They cannot be at every wharf or port all the time, but the mere fact that they could be there quickly and carry out operations would enable us to combat illegal immigration, people-smuggling and other crimes perpetrated by those who go in and out of our ports with containers.

I have just returned from the United States. The question of the Dubai ports was a big issue, and I was amazed that it had not been a bigger issue here. I do not want to go into the details of a debate that amounts to a scrap between Republicans and Democrats, but the United States Administration are likely to extract a price from the Dubai ports for their acquisition of P&O to proceed. They will probably pay for increased screening of containers.

I think that only about 3 per cent. of our containers are screened at our seaports. If the Dubai ports, or any other part of the port industry in north America, has to pay more for new screening technologies, that should be good for us in the United Kingdom and western Europe too. I think that there is a powerful case for seaport security and policing to be paid for by the user, per container. A small payment on each container would help to fund a dedicated ports police in this country. What happens in the United States is not our business, but if its ports industry is to pay more for technologies to combat crime, surely we are justified in saying that we should benefit from such resources too.

Clause 9 provides for additional police powers to collect information relating to flights and voyages. I support that, because I do not dismiss the gravity of the war against terrorism. I always felt that terrorism posed a serious threat, even before 11 September, and my view has not changed. That is why I feel so strongly about our seaports, and have detained the House on the issue. Nevertheless, collecting all that information on what the Bill describes as "flights and voyages" will not be much use without law enforcement officers—police—at our ports, who are able to reach the various wharves that surround the United Kingdom, particularly those on the east coast.

The Bill also confers additional powers on trading standards authorities. I imagine that the aim is to combat such offences as counterfeiting and breach of copyright, which is most necessary. Local authorities will have to use those powers. All too often, local authorities do not exercise their existing powers, because there are not enough trading standards officers to enforce them. I hope that the Bill will enable us to will the means, and persuade local authorities that trading standards are a high priority in the combating of crime, and organised crime in particular. Illegally copied compact discs on our market stalls frequently represent the end of a major criminal operation across the country.

Clause 38 extends the police complaints machinery to those who enforce asylum and immigration policies. I consider it very necessary. I have been very distressed by raids by immigration and asylum organisations and the Home Office on families asleep in their beds at 6 am on Sundays. Families do not run. Single men who are economic migrants, are by definition transient. In many instances, it is difficult for the asylum and immigration services to arrest them.

I regret to say that we are in the numbers game. When the Home Office knows that a family is involved, its personnel will move in at 6 o'clock on a Sunday morning and round up the lot. I find that extremely distasteful, and I believe that the police officers who are in attendance find it distasteful as well. It is one of the most harrowing and unjustified situations that can be created. However, when successive politicians stand at the Dispatch Box and argue about figures, rounding up a family of seven or nine on a Sunday morning looks good in terms of headline figures. The people concerned were all together. There is no necessity for such action. I believe that, regrettably, there have been grounds for considerable complaint and investigation, and I am glad that there will now be more opportunities for people to complain and to seek reviews of what has happened.

Members have mentioned the extradition provision. I am amazed that, although the United Kingdom has entered into a treaty with the United States of America and we are acting on it in good faith, the United States Senate has not endorsed it. I cannot understand why we tolerate that. It is a two-way process. Our bargaining chip is saying to Uncle Sam "You can have this facility, provided that you do right by us." When I was in the United States last week, I expressed bewilderment that the Senate had not passed the treaty. I was given a variety of reasons, one of which was that it feared that people who had left Northern Ireland might be affected.

I would not have thought, with all the legislation that we are passing now, that that was a problem, to be candid, but I think that the Prime Minister and the Home Secretary could say, "This treaty is available. The Queen has signed it. The UK has fulfilled its side of the bargain, but the treaty cannot be triggered until your legislature delivers its side of the bargain too." It is absurd. I ask the Minister to explain the logic of that. I do not say that sarcastically. I simply do not understand why we are acting in that way when the United States legislature, the Senate, is failing to implement the treaty.

The treaty has been in existence not for months but for years. I urge the Minister to reflect on that matter. Otherwise, there is a powerful case for the Bill to be used as a vehicle for amending the treaty or suspending it. I do not talk about individual cases. I have no brief. I want wrongdoers to be brought to justice as expeditiously as possible either side of the Atlantic, but there has to be parity of treatment.

For those reasons, it is useful for Parliament to explore the Bill. It contains a variety of measures, some of which are most welcome, and some of which we should treat with caution and perhaps amend during the legislative process. Above all, I hope that the Minister will reflect on the fact that the Bill is a wonderful opportunity to beef up the powers of community support officers and constables, whether they are in Home Office forces or the other forces to which I have referred. It is also a wonderful opportunity to think again about having a highly mobile, technical border or ports police, paid for by the ports industry, and to ensure that funding for policing our airports is appropriate, fair and balanced in terms of competition and the charge that should be forced on the council tax payer.

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): I am delighted to be the fourth Essex Member of Parliament to be called to speak in the debate, following very good speeches by my hon. Friends the Members for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) and for Harwich (Mr. Carswell), and by the hon. Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay). It is a particular pleasure to follow the hon. Gentleman, as he eloquently expressed his reservations about the proposed mergers in Essex, and was physical testament to the cross-party campaign that we have conducted in our county against those proposals, about which we feel strongly and to which I shall return.

I commend the speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Arundel and South Downs (Nick Herbert), who spoke powerfully and with some passion from the Front Bench. He deconstructed the problems in the Bill, not least in highlighting its centralising tendency, which I deprecate but which I fear I cannot explain as eloquently as he did.

Neighbourhood policing is a theme that, as the Government have stressed, runs throughout the Bill. That is fine in concept, but I have a couple of practical questions to ask about it. I will take an example from my constituency. We would all like to see more police, but in a particular area in my constituency, Hull Bridge, which is by the River Crouch, people have felt for some time that there has been a dearth of policing and, in particular, of regular patrols by regular officers. That has come through to me in my constituency postbag and, of course these days, also by e-mail, and while I have been out canvassing in Hull Bridge. It cropped up on the doorsteps so often that it was impossible as an MP to ignore the strength of feeling.

As a result, last summer I organised a petition to encourage local residents in Hull Bridge to express their concern and to call for a regular policing team to be allocated to the area. That, I understand, is similar in concept to neighbourhood policing.

I presented that petition of some 1,300 signatures to the House on the day we rose for the summer recess last year. I am now actively pursuing the issue with the new divisional commander who covers the area. I wrote to him about it only last week. I hope that, if neighbourhood policing is to mean something in practice, we will see local police commanders doing their best, within the constraints they face, to respond actively to local residents' strong requests for more cover. I hope that the petition will produce a definitive result.

That leads me to a related point, which I raised in an intervention on the hon. Member for Thurrock, with which I think he had some sympathy and with which I hope the Minister will sympathise, too. It is about continuity in police command appointments. In the past few years, I have seen quite a high turnover in basic command unit appointments. As I understand it, in a number of BCUs, there will now effectively be a two-tier structure—the divisional commander, who will normally be a chief superintendent, and below that a district commander. If, for example, the division covers a number of local authority areas, the district commander will be coterminous, say, with the district or borough council boundary. That is certainly the intention in one of the divisions in my constituency. Therefore, we will have both a divisional commander and a district commander.

I know who the new divisional commander of one of my divisions will be, but I do not yet know who the new district commander will be. I am keen to find out. My local police have explained to me that the appointment will be made shortly and I accept that explanation, but if those people are to become well known as figureheads in their community, so that people such as MPs can make representations to them, it is important that there is some continuity in appointments and that we do not see the relatively highly turnover in senior posts that we have perhaps seen in recent years. I hope that that is a perfectly reasonable and entirely non-partisan point. I offer it to the Minister and hope that some progress will be made.

Extradition has been raised by a number of hon. Members, not least in what was a powerful speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Johnson), who put his points across with his characteristic personality. An important point of principle is involved. When these powers were debated in the House not so long ago, Ministers argued that an extradition agreement of such power was necessary to fight international terrorism. That is why the House was asked to approve that measure. That is fine as far as it goes. We can look any other nation in the eye and say that we have stood shoulder to shoulder with our ally the United States in fighting the curse of international terror. There is nothing for which we should apologise to anyone. The problem, I understand, is that the United States authorities have begun to try to use that agreement in ways that clearly go beyond combating international terror.

I will not stray into matters that are sub judice and raise individual cases. I understand the rules, but I am given to understand that there have been a number of occasions in the past year when the US Internal Revenue Service has attempted to use the treaty to extradite people to the United States to answer charges that they have not paid sufficient tax dollars to the United States Government. I can understand why the IRS might want to try to do that, but that is not the reason that the agreement was made. It is certainly not what Parliament was told when it was asked to approve that powerful measure. As other hon. Members have said, the United States, to add insult to injury, has not ratified the agreement at their end by passing it through the Senate.

There are likely to be other occasions in the near future when the Government come to the House to ask for special powers to fight terrorism. Indeed, they did so recently when they asked for the power to detain people for 90 days. The House was not convinced of the Government's overall argument and therefore they suffered a defeat.

If the Government come to this legislature to ask for powers that restrict individual liberty in order to fight terrorism, they have a strong moral obligation to ensure that, if the House grants those powers, they are used only for the purpose for which they were requested. The danger is that, if such a situation gets worse, when the Government, whatever their colour, come to the House, perhaps in an emergency, and ask for such a strong power, the House may be reluctant to grant it. That example may be cited.

I make a genuine plea to the Minister: this is an anomalous situation and it must be cleared up. Otherwise, there is a danger that, in future, the Government, whatever their colour, will be accused of crying wolf. I hope that that is not an unreasonable point and that the anomaly can be cleared up. The point has been raised by hon. Members on both sides of the House and I hope that she will take it genuinely on board.

I now want to discuss police authority and police force mergers. The Association of Police Authorities' briefing for this Bill says:

> "This Bill deals with proposed reforms to policing which are in addition to the merger of police forces that is currently also being considered, although to some extent the Bill anticipates elements of police restructuring."

I am pleased that the Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety is at the Dispatch Box to hear me raise this issue, because I must emphasise to her in all sincerity that there are genuinely strong feelings in my county on it. If she did not believe that before this evening, I hope that the representations that she has heard tonight from four Essex MPs leave her in absolutely no doubt. Indeed, other MPs from our county have spoken on this issue in other debates, as well.

Telephone and internet polls conducted by local newspapers show overwhelming support for the view that the Essex force should stand alone. Phone-ins to Essex radio stations have produced a similar result. There is very little support at all among the general public for the Government's proposed mergers, which is not very surprising. We in Essex have a strong sense of identity, as the Minister doubtless realises, and we do not want our policing to be performed remotely by a chief constable based in Cambridge or—dare I say it, Mr. Deputy Speaker, with you in the Chair?—even in Ipswich. We want our chief constable to be based in Chelmsford, where that person can best understand the needs, security and policing of our county.

We do not want the council tax to go up, because the policing precept would have to rise. Currently, we in Essex have one of the lowest precepts in East Anglia at £105 a year for band D properties. Norfolk's precept is £145, so under equalisation our precept would undoubtedly have to rise. It is fair to say that Essex council tax payers pay enough as it is, so there is absolutely no enthusiasm for this idea on financial grounds.

Andrew Mackinlay: The hon. Gentleman makes a very powerful point about Essex council tax payers having to pay more. That is true, but the efficiency of the Essex constabulary is matched by its high performance indices. It is a very successful force because it operates at relatively low cost, but maximum efficiency. The hon. Gentleman might like to amplify that point.

Mr. Francois: I am very grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making that point, which is entirely right. In most of the examinations carried out by the police, Essex constabulary scores rather highly, so it is not as though the system is broken. The Essex force is not broken and it genuinely does not need to be fixed.

Mr. Jenkin: By way of amplifying the point, our police force is among those with the highest morale in the United Kingdom. I hope that Ministers will reflect on the fact that smaller forces tend to have high morale and larger ones tend to have poorer morale. Of course, the largest force of all, the Met, has the lowest morale.

The Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety (Hazel Blears) indicated dissent.

Mr. Jenkin: The Minister shakes her head, but I can assure her that that is the case.

Mr. Francois: When I served as a young officer in the Territorial Army, I learned a bit about morale. One of the great mottoes that was drummed into me as a junior subaltern was, "If it ain't broke, sir, don't fix it." Our police force is not broken and it genuinely does not need fixing. I agree with my hon. Friend and I hope that the Minister will take that point on board.

The Government have set an arbitrary target for Essex of some 4,000 officers, and Essex regulars currently number about 3,300. However, if the Government press ahead with building all the houses in Essex that they want up to 2021 and the population of Essex increases by hundreds of thousands as a result—I am not in favour of that policy; the Government want 123,000 new houses, which would mean an extra third of a million people, or so—it is clear that the number of police will go up pro rata. That would easily take us beyond the 4,000 limit. So if the Minister wants a rationale for her own arbitrary figure looking into the medium term, I have just given it to her.

I turn to fighting terrorism, which others have touched on. I understand that for the so-called category 2 tasks, the Minister does not favour federation. I think that such an approach has merits, but if she is convinced that that is not what she wants, I have another suggestion for her. We could meet the requirement through a beefed-up Serious Organised Crime Agency's working closely with local forces in certain parts of the country. The chief constable of Essex has suggested that certain tasks are best handled by SOCA, although in fairness, the Essex force has considerable experience in fighting terrorism because of the special facilities at Stansted. The Minister is well aware of that, and she also knows that the Essex force gave considerable assistance to the Met on 7/7. So I do not believe that we are weak in that particular department.

The Minister will have been involved in negotiations with a number of police authorities in the past few months. She will know that in several areas throughout the country—I do not mean to disparage any other part of the United Kingdom—there has not been unanimity of view. In some counties, the police authority, Members of Parliament, the county council and the chief constable have seen this issue differently and have not necessarily spoken with one voice. However, in Essex precisely the contrary is true. The police authority, the chief constable, Essex county council, the vast bulk of district and borough councils and 15 of the 17 Members of Parliament—including the hon. Member for Thurrock, the hon. Member for Colchester (Bob Russell), who has spoken on this issue before, and all Essex's Conservative MPs—publicly signed a pledge urging the Minister to listen to us and to allow the Essex police force to continue to stand alone. I cannot speak for every other county in the country—I do not have the precise data—but as I stand here this evening, I know of no other county in which there is such firm unanimity of view on this issue as there is in Essex. As I have said, that has been physically evidenced tonight.

The Prime Minister has said repeatedly that he will listen to local people on this issue. I very much hope that he will, and we in Essex look for some real evidence of that. I very much agree with what my hon. Friend the Member for North Essex said about Essex county council's actively considering holding a referendum on this issue if the Government refuse to listen to reason. In other words, if push does come to shove, we will hold a poll across the county to allow people to express a clear opinion on what the Government are trying to do. I am very confident of what the outcome would be, and I suspect that, in her heart, so is the Minister. I ask her seriously not to put us to the trouble of doing that. Our police force is not broken. It is not perfect, but it is overwhelmingly popular. There is cross-party support for it, and political support at all levels in the county. Please, please listen to us, and allow our force to stand alone.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): I want to begin with an apology. Like a number of Members who have spoken in today's debate, I was not here at the outset to hear the Home Secretary introduce Second Reading. My excuse is that I was obeying the law. Under the Criminal Justice Act 2003—or, at least, those of its provisions that repeal the Juries Act 1974—my exemption, as a Member of Parliament, from jury service was abolished. Until the passing of the 2003 Act, I was exempt from such service because of my membership of this House, because I am a member of the Bar, and because I am a judge. All three exemptions have gone and I was required to appear at the Old Bailey at 9 o'clock this morning to surrender to jury service.

I had no particular objection to doing that; however, I have had a frustrating day. Needless to say, on the first occasion that I was called to take part in a trial, I knew the judge and several members of the Bar. Furthermore, the case involved the trial of some prison officers—and given that I am shadow Minister with responsibility for Opposition policy on prisons and prison officers, it was thought perhaps inadvisable for me to take part in that trial. However, after lunch I was given the opportunity of another go. That trial, like the first, was projected to last for several months—well beyond the two weeks for which I had been summoned. Eighty of us were put into the jury-in-waiting, of whom 20 were selected to stand by for next Wednesday and participation in the jury. Needless to say, I was disqualified again because I knew the judge—indeed, I had lunch with him about four weeks ago—and a member of the Bar. All in all, it was a deeply frustrating day—because it meant that I was unable to enjoy the Home Secretary's speech this afternoon. I apologise, through you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to him and to the rest of the House, but I see that I am not the only Member who missed the opening speeches. I am at least here for the closing speeches. There is a category of Member that has missed the opening speeches and the closing speeches, although if they hurry they may catch the Minister of State's response to the debate. I look forward to welcoming those Labour Members who have not found it convenient to be detained here.

The Bill is something of a curate's egg, which is hardly surprising as it is 139 pages long. It is yet another doorstop or telephone directory of a Bill. They come out of the Home Office at regular intervals and huge acreages of Norwegian or south American forests are destroyed to produce the paper for them. There are far too many Home Office Bills and while they are not wholly imperfect, they are—as so many hon. Members have demonstrated today—riddled with imperfections that require close examination in Committee. However, this Bill will not receive the necessary close examination in Committee because it will be guillotined. All sorts of good amendments and criticisms will not be discussed as a result. We will have to rely on the other place to do our work for us. That is the end of the sermon.

The Bill can be divided into three themes—police centralisation, extradition and amalgamation of police and court functions. At least, those are the themes that have emerged from the debate today. It is uncontroversial to claim that of the 18 Members of Parliament, including the Home Secretary and the Chairman of the Select Committee, who have spoken in the debate, support for the Bill has been qualified—except from the Home Secretary. Even the absent Labour Back Benchers who read out the Whips' notes were not entirely enthusiastic about the contents of the Bill. I look forward to hearing the Minister of State's enthusiastic endorsement of whatever it was that the Home Secretary said this afternoon, but the rest of us have serious concerns about the creeping centralisation of control over the police, of which this Bill is another example.

The Government say that their powers under the Bill to exercise authority over particular police authorities—they will have an easier task when there are only 12 instead of 43—will be used only as a last resort. However, we need to place that claim in the context of the project to amalgamate police forces. I appreciate that the Bill is not about amalgamation of police forces, which will be achieved by executive decree by the Home Secretary. We have already had a written parliamentary statement from him last Friday, when a sparsely attended House was presented, at a late hour, with some proposals for the amalgamation of a certain number of police forces. I doubt whether we shall ever have an opportunity again to deal with the issue in a proper parliamentary way. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (James Brokenshire) pointed out in a telling speech, that so-called promise—undertaking might be a better word—not to use the powers except in exceptional circumstances is absent from the Bill. I have learned through bitter experience since 1997, when the Government came into office, that unless a promise is made at the Dispatch Box by a Minister and is recorded in Hansard, or is made in some other official written way, it is unlikely to be kept. So when the Government say that the powers will be used only as a last resort, I see that more as a threat than as a benign indication of intent.

The Bill is the pathfinder for the regionalisation of police forces, and my hon. Friends the Members for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin), for The Wrekin (Mark Pritchard), for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois), for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone), for Hornchurch, for Bexleyheath and Crayford (Mr. Evennett) and, of course, for Arundel and South Downs (Nick Herbert) made that very point.

It is such an obvious point that it pains me that we have to keep on making it, but the Government still seem not to have taken it on board. The essential connection between the police and the policed is being loosened.

There are more and more indications from the Government that they wish to pull in to Whitehall, disguised as strategic policy making, control over operations. Chief constables will have to follow the Home Secretary's directions or risk their jobs. I am not sure that the British public think that that is a proper way to proceed. We should always beware Government claims that the national policing improvement agency will "assist police forces to deliver . . . national . . . priorities"

and

"support national implementation of the Home Secretary's key priorities for the police, as set out in the annual National Community Safety Plan".

Such offers of help from this Government, with their history, should be viewed with great scepticism, and I trust that in Committee hon. Members on both sides of the House will follow the example of the hon. Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay). I hope that he is a member of the Committee, although I doubt that the Government will be brave enough to appoint him. He demonstrates every time he rises to his feet that the duty of a Member of Parliament, whether on the Floor of the House or in Committee, and after acknowledging the political party to which he or she belongs and that most of us were elected as members of a particular party rather than—as the fiction has it—as individuals, is to hold the Government to account. If we do not do that, we might as well pack it in and not bother. I do not need to look far across the Chamber to find many hon. Members who seem to have given up on that duty.

If crime and disorder reduction partnerships are so good and need to work with the basic command units, why will we see a reduction in their number? That point was made by my hon. Friend the Member for Arundel and South Downs and echoed by many others. Statutory basic command units and direct control by the Home Secretary seem to march hand in hand, and it is not a particularly controversial prediction to suggest that before long the Home Secretary and his Ministers will have their sticky little fingers all over the day-to-day detailed work of the police throughout the country. Power is being drawn into Whitehall—other Members have used more colourful language—and as it goes, so too does real public accountability, a point well made by my hon. Friends the Members for North Essex, for Arundel and South Downs and for Bexleyheath and Crayford and, by implication, if not expressly, by many others.

The second matter covered in the debate was extradition. The Bill is not directly to do with the UK's arrangements with the United States, but the treaty has been much discussed and it is of genuine and proper concern among the public and my hon. Friends, especially my hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Johnson). It seems to me that the purpose of all extradition treaties is to ensure that those who commit crimes, or who are suspected of committing crimes, in other jurisdictions cannot escape justice by going to another country. We do not extradite suspects to face the death penalty or torture, which is why we have memorandums of understanding with countries such as Libya, Syria, Jordan and Tunisia. Some of those memorandums have been implemented and some have not, but the mere fact that we need them suggests that the Government realise that extradition law and the need to protect our citizens from unjust extradition law—indeed, to protect any citizen, whether a UK national or not, from unjust extradition—is extremely important.

There is a real sense of the injustice and lack of fairness in our current arrangements with the United States and although we cannot deal with them tonight, nor can we amend treaties by legislation, there should be ample room for proper, full, calm and considered discussion of the United States extradition arrangements in Committee and I trust that time will be provided for that purpose. It is not right for other jurisdictions to trawl in our jurisdiction with a finer net than we can use in theirs. If the principle of comity of nations is to mean anything, we need to revisit our treaty with the United States.

The third theme of the debate was the amalgamation of police and court functions. The separation of powers should be not merely recognised as an important part of our constitution, but entrenched in legislation, especially when the conventions that uphold that separation in our largely unwritten constitution are being shown less respect by the Government day by day. For example, the issuing of penalty tickets by weights and measures inspectors may on the face of it seem a perfectly sensible administrative step, but the inspectors are being given the power to exercise those punitive powers by a police officer, not by the courts. The power of police officers to impose penalties under conditional bail arrangements should also be looked into in the context of a proper separation of powers. If we allow such things to be ignored as matters of tedious hindrance to a Bill that is at least partly meritorious, we let ourselves down, and we certainly let our constituents down.

I was unable to be in the Chamber to hear some of the speeches, including that of the Chairman of the Select Committee, and I heard only the tail end of the speech of the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Lynne Featherstone). However, I do none of the speeches an injustice, nor do I paraphrase them unfaithfully, when I say that everyone, apart from the Home Secretary and, I dare say, the Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety—[Interruption.] I never anticipate what the right hon. Lady is about to say. I do not need to; she repeats herself with great frequency on every occasion—none the less, it is always a delight to listen to her.

The three themes that I have identified are matters of concern and even though we shall not force a Division—nor, I dare say, will the Liberal Democrats—the Government cannot allow our decision to let the Bill achieve Second Reading undermine the sincere and proper criticisms that have been made on both sides of the House in cross-party fashion.

I want to finish by reminding ourselves of what the hon. Member for Thurrock had to say about police powers and mergers. He is concerned that we tend to reorganise when we do not know the answer to a problem. That problem was identified not by him, but by thinkers during the early centuries of the Roman empire.

Andrew Mackinlay: I was irritating them then, too.

Mr. Garnier: Yes, the hon. Gentleman was.

There is plenty of evidence that that governmental habit has been repeated decade after decade, so let me take my hat off to the Government—they win no prizes for originality, but they certainly win prizes for lifting up the pot plants to see what the roots are doing.

I want to end now because the Minister for Immigration, Citizenship and Nationality is getting restless, and I think that he would like to be elsewhere. I want him and his colleagues to have the opportunity to think—not something that he or they do often, but he may as well have the opportunity.

Stephen Pound: The hon. and learned Gentleman has really caught the mood of the House.

Mr. Garnier: I have, have not I?

I invite those hon. Members who will serve on the Committee in due course to use that opportunity to improve the Bill, to make it one that recognises the difference between the courts and the police and between the prosecution and judges—between the various limbs of our constitution—and if they do all that, although I am not hugely confident, the Bill that returns for debate on Report and Third Reading may well be a better one, but I shall not hold my breath.

8.36 pm

The Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety (Hazel Blears): I am sorry that the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) has had such a frustrating day. He is clearly far too well connected in the worlds in which he moves. Perhaps I can suggest that he would not have such a frustrating day if he did his jury service in Manchester or some far-flung part of the United Kingdom. I am grateful to him for finding time to come to the House, but I am disappointed that he has indulged in some fairly gratuitous remarks and some fairly patronising comments. I shall try to respond to the far more constructive contributions that have been made by hon. Members on both sides of the House. If the hon. and learned Member for Harborough is to join us in Committee, I look forward to many hours of discussing the intricacies of such decisions. Unfortunately, he may well be on jury service, and we will be denied the pleasure of his company.

Stephen Pound: In Salford.

Hazel Blears: I would not necessarily mention Salford; I said that the hon. and learned Gentleman could come to Manchester, which is very different from saying that we would welcome him in Salford.

The hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs (Nick Herbert), who opened the debate for the Opposition, emphasised, as did a number of his Opposition colleagues, that in his view, the Bill was very much about centralisation. I simply tell him that he is wrong about centralisation, and about all the provisions of the Bill. He is relatively new to his post speaking on police reform. If he cared to examine the White Paper, "Building Communities, Beating Crime", which we originally published in November 2004, he would see that it represented a significant departure from where policing had been until that point. That White Paper was about engaging local communities, building neighbourhood policing and introducing neighbourhood police teams that would work with local residents to set priorities. When we debated that White Paper, it was a bit of a revolution, because we were making a huge step change.

What I have heard in tonight's debate is that Conservative and Liberal Democrat Members have come on to our territory of localism, empowerment, neighbourhood policing and community engagement. I am absolutely delighted that the new Conservatives have now decided that the territory that is popular with the public involves talking about neighbourhood policing and how we engage communities. When I first started to talk in the House about community engagement, I used to get horrified looks from the Opposition, who were asking themselves, "What is this woman going on about? Neighbourhood teams and engaging local people—so much claptrap!" But what do we see now? They are desperate to be on the same territory.

Mark Pritchard: How can the Minister correlate moving the headquarters of West Mercia police from the three counties of Herefordshire, Shropshire and Worcestershire to the urban base of Birmingham, with making policing more locally accountable and neighbourhood policing more visible to my constituents in Shropshire?

Hazel Blears: Any decisions about headquarters are operational matters for the police authority to consider in due course. The hon. Gentleman's community will be concerned about local neighbourhood policing. Only this Government have given a manifesto commitment that every community in England and Wales—rural, urban and inner-city communities, and market towns—will have a neighbourhood policing team. Local people will know the names of those involved, have their e-mail addresses and be able to set their local priorities. The Conservative Government never said that there would be local neighbourhood policing teams, so I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman is wrong about centralisation.

The Bill is about establishing neighbourhood teams, strengthening the basic command unit and the crime and disorder reduction partnership, locally elected members from local authorities playing a much more visible role, and conducting face-to-face briefings by the BCU commander and the local community safety portfolio holder to provide accountability. It makes provision for the community call for action that enables local residents to trigger action on the issues that are of concern to them. It also covers the standardisation of powers for community support officers. Each of those measures is about decentralisation and engaging local people. I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman is way off target when he talks about centralisation.

Mr. Jenkin: I think that the right hon. Lady is a little confused. She is saying that the Secretary of State is taking powers to make those things happen. Would she like to pretend to the House that the Secretary of State is giving up powers? Is that what she is saying? No, she is not. She is saying that the Secretary of State is taking more powers to control the police. That is why we regard the Bill as a centralising measure.

Hazel Blears: I am certainly not confused. I am absolutely clear about what the Bill is designed to achieve. It is about implementing the things that were in our White Paper about devolving power to local people, engaging local communities and making sure that they have more of a say in what happens. The Government are committed to the tripartite balance that is important to ensure the independence of policing in this country. We want to make sure that we have appropriate powers at the centre, but that there are also strong operational powers, through the chief constables and particularly through BCU commanders. We will do that by putting them on a statutory footing.

We also want to ensure that the new police authorities have increased powers. For the first time, their power to hold the chief constable to account will be in statute, and they will be given further powers through secondary legislation. In particular, they will be given the responsibility to consider diversity in policing, which will be an extremely important power for them to have. As I said, the increased involvement of locally elected councillors through the crime and disorder reduction partnerships will strengthen the tripartite balance so that we do not risk the danger of our policing losing its independence.

The issue of elected police authorities was raised. More than 18 months ago we consulted, through the White Paper, about whether there should be directly elected police authorities. The rejection of that option was virtually unanimous. There were a number of serious objections, including the danger of extremist groups obtaining representation, particularly if there was a low turnout in the elections, and the potential for single issue groups to dominate. Liberal Democrat Members have raised some of those concerns in relation to the community call for action. Another consideration was a possible move to a much more short-term approach. If elections were approaching, there would be a real temptation to direct resources into the area of the greatest political and electoral advantage. There would be the potential for the politicisation of the various accountability bodies. Any move to direct elections needs to be thought about extremely seriously.

As long ago as 1994, the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) said:

> "I reject entirely the view ... that there should be directly elected police authorities. That would be a recipe for politicising the police service."—[Official Report, 26 April 1994; Vol. 242, c. 112–13.]

Presumably the Conservatives have entirely rejected their previous position and want direct election. Have they taken into account the whole series of serious objections that people have because of the possibility of direct elections skewing the important democratic balance of the tripartite relationship that has served this country extremely well by ensuring the independence, particularly the political independence, of our police service?

Nick Herbert: I am sorry that the right hon. Lady has so little faith in local democracy. She talks about maintaining the tripartite relationship. Will she comment on the concerns of the Association of Police Authorities, which has said:

> "These provisions represent a fundamental constitutional change and a significant shift in the balance of power within the tripartite relationship. The APA will vigorously oppose them."

Hazel Blears: I understand the concerns of the Association of Police Authorities about putting the membership of police authorities into secondary legislation. I can give the assurance again from the Dispatch Box, as I have given it personally, that putting the requirements into regulations in secondary legislation is simply a way of making sure that we do not have to have primary legislation every time that we need a change. Given the provisions relating to health or to education, the provisions for membership are in secondary legislation. We are seeking to ensure that membership of police authorities can be flexible so that we do not have one rigid formula. Some police authorities will need to be larger than others to ensure democracy so that members of each authority can be represented on the new strategic authority.

I am delighted that my right hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham) broadly welcomed the Bill's provisions. He talked about seeking to get the balance right between driving performance, which has been absolutely key, and maintaining independence. My right hon. Friend has asked us to consider intervention powers carefully, and try to ensure that they are tailored to deal with the situations that might arise. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary referred to a backstop and a last resort. We do not want to be coming to the Dispatch Box whenever there is an issue involving local police forces. The powers need to be flexible enough to enable us to respond to situations that might arise as a result of a public inquiry, not simply a report from the inspectorate.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen welcomed the idea of the national policing improvement agency, and asked us to ensure that there will be provision for embedding good professional practice, such as professionalising investigation projects and the work that has been done by the National Centre for Policing Excellence. I can give him that reassurance. The first three mission-critical priorities of the improvement agency will be first, embedding neighbourhood policing; secondly, responding to demands to share information, as recommended by the Bichard inquiry; and thirdly, trying to ensure that all our forces throughout the country have better provision to respond to level 2 crime—serious and organised crime. That is one of the major factors behind the restructuring process that is taking place.

My right hon. Friend also raised concerns about conditional cautions. I hope that I can give him some reassurance that it will be for the Crown Prosecution Service to decide whether a conditional caution is suitable and to identify the appropriate conditions. The hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mark Pritchard) raised the issue as well. There is also the question of whether the police might take the lead in identifying cases that they think would be suitable for a conditional caution. It will be for the CPS to consider the conditions. There will be a separation between the arresting officer and the person who decides on the make-up of that caution, whether it is punitive or one of reparation. That is probably the right balance.

I can also give the reassurance that the process is not designed to deal with serious and violent offenders. It is very much about first-time offenders, and particularly young people. I hope that if we can get the system to work quickly, someone committing criminal damage, for example, on a Wednesday, and admitting their guilt would be given a conditional caution, and could soon be out in the local park, perhaps, making reparation. I hope that there can be a quick connection between the offence being committed and punishment. That is particularly effective when dealing with young people.

Concerns have been raised about parenting orders and ensuring that registered social landlords and local authorities are sufficiently trained and have the necessary expertise. My hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend (Mrs. Moon) raised some similar issues, as did Liberal Democrats. There will be safeguards in place and we will issue statutory guidance. Many registered social landlords are now working in partnership with social services and education authorities as part of a multi-agency team to tackle antisocial behaviour, and we will ensure that they continue to operate in that way.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, South (Ms Taylor) made a telling intervention highlighting the right of the community to set priorities for local action and to ensure that both the police and local authorities are called to account to tackle those matters. That is an illustration of the fact that the Bill is about devolution rather than centralisation.

Andrew Mackinlay: Clause 15 gives district councillors a duty to refer a complaint by a constituent to the appropriate committee of his or her council. I do not oppose that procedure; I can see some merits in it. However, there are two things that concern me. First, the constituent's expectations will be enormously high. Secondly, as far as I am aware, this is the first time that such a specific duty has been given to a local district councillor; it has not been done by any other service. I share the House's nervousness and hesitation about whether our councillors, even the best, are fully acquainted with what the duty will involve and what its ramifications are. How will they deal with those matters, and has there been any guidance or discussion?

Hazel Blears: I can assure my hon. Friend that I have had extensive discussions with the Local Government Association, which is pleased that we are giving local councillors a fundamental role. They will become advocates for their local community, and that is an entirely proper role for them to undertake. It is a new and innovative power to enable local residents to call to account not just the basic command unit commander but the local authority and other partners in the crime and disorder reduction partnership when action is not undertaken. That is an extremely powerful tool.

Clearly more detail is required, including time scales, but the local councillor will play a central role. I did not want the creation of new police panels and panels to lead us to neglect the established mechanisms that work in local government. I fundamentally believe that local government and local democracy are extremely important, so making them work effectively will help to raise the esteem in which local councillors are held. If local authorities, including Liberal Democrat councils, do not use the antisocial behaviour powers as they should, local residents can use the community call for action to make them use them and address the problem of antisocial behaviour in their community.

James Brokenshire rose—

Hazel Blears: May I try to make progress in dealing with hon. Members' contributions? Otherwise we will all be here until 10 pm.

The hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Lynne Featherstone) supported some parts of the Bill, but was concerned about the community call for action. I hope that she is reassured that it aims to make councils, particularly Liberal Democrat ones, take action on certain issues. I was disappointed that she did not offer any positive proposals to try to address those issues, but in Committee she may provide more details. She also expressed concern about parenting orders, but I have dealt with the question of registered social landlords.

I am delighted that my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend welcomed the coterminosity between basic command units and local authorities, which is important in tackling antisocial behaviour. I urge all hon. Members not to forget that more half of all antisocial behaviour orders are served on adults, so it is not simply young people who are involved in antisocial behaviour. Time and time again, I say that 95 per cent. of our young people are good and decent individuals who contribute to their communities and do a fantastic job. We are talking about a small minority, many of whom are adults, who simply do not abide by the rules.

My hon. Friend raised the important issue of facilities for young people, as did several Opposition Members. The first chapter of the respect action plan talks about unlocking the positive potential of our young people. The plan highlights a significant investment by the Department for Education and Skills in youth facilities. About £500,000 for the average local authority was announced in the Chancellor's pre-Budget report, particularly so that young people themselves can be involved in shaping and designing facilities, whether an internet café or a skateboard park.

Even more significantly, £100 million of public funding will be used to back the Russell commission's proposals to enable 1 million extra young people to become involved in a range of exciting volunteering opportunities. There will be short-term and long-term opportunities. Some will be full-time and others part-time, and they will give young people a chance to do the things that, in some cases, only better-off young people have had the opportunity to do. Youngsters from disadvantaged communities will have the chance to undertake if not a gap year, a gap three months or a gap six months, which will help to widen their horizons. There will therefore be a huge amount of extra help in the respect plan to give young people more places to go and better things to do. We want to make sure that we involve people in more constructive activities to reduce crime and antisocial behaviour on our streets. I hope that my hon. Friend is encouraged by those proposals, but we need to make sure that Conservative local authorities take them seriously and involve young people in drawing up those proposals.

The hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) was off the mark when he said that the Bill was about centralisation and talked about the powers of intervention. A few years ago in the police service there was not even a framework for performance. Police forces will admit that over the past few years there has been a huge transformation, with the introduction of the policing performance assessment framework, which I am sure the hon. Gentleman's local force will tell him about. If he thinks that localism means hands off and a free-for-all, and allowing high crime areas not to improve as fast as low crime areas, he is not doing his constituents a service.

Localism or devolution is possible, but it must be balanced by proper standards. Among the police forces that the police standards unit have engaged with, in underperforming forces crime has fallen at twice the rate that it has in forces with which the unit has not engaged. That shows that intervention can work to drive up performance and reduce crime. Without such intervention we would not have seen the massive falls in burglary, vehicle crime and robbery over the past few years, for which all our constituents are grateful. The hon. Gentleman must get the balance right between giving people autonomy and allowing a free-for-all which leads to a postcode lottery in crime.

I am disappointed that the hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Johnson) is not in his place now. He has come and he has gone. Perhaps that will be his epitaph. He made an amusing reference to his constituent having been hoovered across the Atlantic—I am not sure whether he was referring to J. Edgar in those terms. He raised concerns about the Extradition Act 2003, and serious concerns have been expressed by several hon. Members about extradition.

Clearly, the Bill does not deal with the different evidential tests in the UK and in the United States of America, but I acknowledge the concern about the failure of the US to endorse the treaty. I can assure hon. Members that we are constantly pressing for the matter to be properly considered. I am sure it will be raised in Committee and that Members will want to make their points. The difference between the tests—that is, in terms of probable cause or information—is a product of the US Bill of Rights, which clearly cannot be amended. We have probably got the best balance that we can get in the treaty, but I understand hon. Members' genuine concerns about making sure that it is endorsed, and we will continue to press for that.

I am delighted that the hon. Member for Bexleyheath and Crayford (Mr. Evennett) wants to help to build a culture of respect in the community. I am sure that he will support his police and local authority in doing that. He also supports community support officers. I can tell him that there will be 18,000 more CSOs over the next couple of years, in addition to the present 6,000 officers, and the community call for action will be a practical power to make sure that a light is shone on problems that may have persisted for months if not years, so that we can get things done. If neighbourhood policing works as we want it to, there will be less and less need to use the community call for action, because local people will genuinely be involved in getting things done.

In an excellent contribution, my hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East and Washington, West (Mrs. Hodgson) welcomed the powers for CSOs, especially in connection with truancy. She knows that children who are not in school are far more likely to be involved in crime and antisocial behaviour. She also raised issues concerning the ability of police officers to monitor football banning orders and to have access to people travelling to football matches.

I undertake to consider my hon. Friend's proposals extremely carefully. I have no doubt that they will be raised in Committee. She made some telling points, which I know were well informed by her local Police Federation representative, with whom she is in close touch. She also supported the proposals for the extra search powers at airports, and I am grateful for that. As usual, she is practical and in touch with her community, and makes an excellent contribution.

The hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mark Pritchard)—

The Minister for Immigration, Citizenship and Nationality (Mr. Tony McNulty): By contrast.

Hazel Blears: Yes; the hon. Member for The Wrekin is not present. He raised the subject of West Mercia police, which is an excellent police force, but is not currently assessed on level 2 issues involving serious and organised crime. His contribution was reasonable, and I assure him that the proposals are designed to strengthen protective services and provide resilience for neighbourhood policing. The commitment to the provision of neighbourhood policing, together with the national quality of service standards, should mean extra neighbourhood policing in both rural areas and high-crime areas.

The hon. Member for The Wrekin said that he had not had an opportunity to debate the amalgamations on the Floor of the House, although he has had the opportunity to debate CSO powers. However, the Police Act 1996 was introduced by a Conservative Government, and we are proceeding under those provisions. The 1996 Act did not provide for referendums, so we are proceeding in the accepted way.

I entirely reject the proposition advanced by the hon. Member for The Wrekin that morale in the police service is low. The Police Federation, the superintendents, the Association of Chief Police Officers and Unison all see merit in the proposals to move to larger more strategic forces, which will give us more capacity and resilience.

The hon. Member for Hornchurch (James Brokenshire) discussed centralisation, which I have dealt with. He also discussed the establishment of the single inspectorate, which is not about saving money. We anticipate spending the same amount of money, although we may make some marginal efficiency savings. The inspectorate of prisons is important, particularly given the human rights issues concerning the treatment of prisoners in custody. We must bring the inspectorates together, but we have given an undertaking that we will not abolish the role of the prisons inspector until we are satisfied that the new combined inspectorate can deal with such issues properly.

The hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke) discussed children and young people. I am delighted that she now welcomes the role of CSOs, and if she examines clause 4(2), she will see the provision on proper training and CSO powers. I confirm that I am working incredibly closely with the Minister for Children and Families in the Department for Education and Skills, the Minister of Communities and Local Government in the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, and the Department for Culture, Media and Sport on all the issues in the respect plan.

I was delighted by the generosity of the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole in admitting that parenting orders can be extremely effective. Many parents say that they wish that they had had parenting orders years ago, and that those orders are the best things that have happened to their families.

The hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) discussed persistent and prolific offenders. He wants the Bill to give police community support officers the power to disperse people outside as well as inside dispersal zones. The proposals for dispersal orders were fought hard by Liberal Democrat Members, and we now have provisions to disperse groups within an area. General dispersal orders would probably stretch things too far, but I understand the passion with which the hon. Gentleman made that point, because he wants to ensure that the community is safer. I think that we have struck the right balance on dispersal orders, which local authorities can use to make communities significantly safer.

The hon. Member for Harwich (Mr. Carswell) wants to see the introduction of elected sheriffs and, as he described it, "real localism". As I have said, we have some concerns about politicisation and the possibility of police authorities being taken over by those who shout loudest, and there is the possibility of extremist involvement, too.

My hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay) made some excellent points about longer sentences for violent crime, and he knows that the Violent Crime Reduction Bill includes measures covering guns and knives. He said that he has "a large river frontage"—although I think that it is his constituency that has the large river frontage, rather than him. That means that he has an excellent knowledge of immigration issues and problems involving ports and borders. He called again for the creation of a dedicated force to address such matters, and we are making sure that the police force, special branch and immigration officials work more closely together to deliver a joined-up service. The current system probably does not go far enough for my hon. Friend, and I am sure that he will continue to press us. He also mentioned travel information and extradition; I am sure that he, like us, will continue to press for the endorsement of the extradition treaty.

The hon. Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois)—an abundance of Essex men spoke in the debate—welcomed neighbourhood policing, and asked for continuity in police appointments. That is a genuine point. North Wales adopted a system whereby the neighbourhood policing teams committed for a period of two to three years on a contract basis, which has enabled them to build relationships with their local community. That is the kind of development that I would want to see. However, these are operational matters for the chief constable; they are not to be dictated from the centre but decided locally.

I acknowledge the hon. Gentleman's strength of feeling about mergers, which he shares with other Members from Essex. We will take advice from the professionals at Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary, who will give us their considered assessment of the ability of the forces to cope with level 2 serious and organised crime. I know that the hon. Gentleman will want to ensure that his constituents are properly protected and at the same time have good, effective neighbourhood policing.

Mr. Francois: I am grateful to the Minister for acknowledging the strength of feeling in the county of Essex. She said that the Government would take advice from the professionals. No doubt they will. Will they also take advice from the most senior police officer in Essex—the chief constable, Roger Baker, who also wants his force to stand alone?

Andrew Mackinlay: And advice from a senior Labour Back Bencher?

Hazel Blears: How can I possibly resist the blandishments of my hon. Friend?

I can assure all Members that I take the views of chief constables extremely seriously, including those in areas where they have reached the conclusion that larger more strategic forces are the right way forward, because they have the capacity and resilience to cope with major crime, counter-terrorism and public order issues. I am awaiting the final assessments from HMIC for the local force of the hon. Member for Rayleigh, and announcements will be made in due course. I acknowledge his concern, but I query his saying, "If it ain't broke, don't fix it." HMIC's advice to us has been that the 43 force structure is no longer fit for purpose. Any responsible Government would be negligent if they ignored that advice and did not take steps to ensure that we fix it as far as we possibly can.

I was a little disappointed by some of the responses from Conservative Members. I think that they have lacked a bit of courage. Let me commend to them the recent speech on police reform by the right hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron), who said:

"the Conservative Party I lead will not flinch from saying what needs to be said, and doing what needs to be done . . . Unless we have the courage and the determination to pursue radical police reform, we will never build the safer communities we all want to see."

The hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs (Nick Herbert) talked about the royal commission that lasted two years and was followed by a further period of implementation. If we wait for four years to do anything about police reform, we will not be taking the radical steps that we need to make a difference.

I say this to hon. Members: have courage, be prepared to reform, and do not cleave to the old ways that are not serving our communities as we want them to be served.

[Hazel Blears]

We need to strengthen neighbourhood policing. The Bill will put in place structures, accountability mechanisms, devolution and involvement of local communities to enable us to do exactly that, while providing us with forces that are able to protect our communities against the threats from serious and organised crime that will unfortunately grow in future.

I hope in Committee to be able to persuade hon. Members from all parties that they can be brave enough to go with radical reform that will drive down crime and give us the kind of policing service that we can continue to be proud of, and which will serve our communities even more effectively in the years to come. I commend the Bill to the House.

Bill accordingly read a Second time.

POLICE AND JUSTICE BILL (PROGRAMME)

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 83A(6) (Programme motions),

That the following provisions shall apply to the Police and Justice Bill:

Committal

1. The Bill shall be committed to a Standing Committee.

Proceedings in Standing Committee

2. Proceedings in the Standing Committee shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion on Tuesday 28th March 2006.

3. The Standing Committee shall have leave to sit twice on the first day on which it meets.

Consideration and Third Reading

4. Proceedings on consideration shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion one hour before the moment of interruption on the day on which those proceedings are commenced.

5. Proceedings on Third Reading shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion at the moment of interruption on that day.

6. Standing Order No. 83B (Programming committees) shall not apply to proceedings on consideration and Third Reading.

Other proceedings

7. Any other proceedings on the Bill (including any proceedings on consideration of Lords Amendments or on any further messages from the Lords) may be programmed.—[Mr. Alan Campbell.]

Question agreed to.

POLICE AND JUSTICE BILL [MONEY]

Queen's recommendation having been signified—

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 52(1)(a) (Money resolutions and ways and means resolutions in connection with Bills),

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Police and Justice Bill, it is expedient to authorise-

(1) the payment out of money provided by Parliament of—

(a) any expenditure incurred by a Minister of the Crown by virtue of the Act;

(b) any increase attributable to the Act in the sums payable by virtue of any other Act out of money so provided;

(2) the payment of sums into the Consolidated Fund.—[Mr. Alan Campbell.]

Question agreed to.

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): I propose to put together the Questions on motions 4, 5 and 6.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 118(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation),

Criminal Law

That the draft Community Order (Review by Specified Courts in Liverpool and Salford) Order 2006, which was laid before this House on 19th January, be approved.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at the sitting on Tuesday 7th March, notwithstanding the provisions of Standing Order No. 16 (Proceedings under an Act or on European Union documents), the Speaker shall put the Questions necessary to dispose of proceedings on the Motion in the name of Mr Ivan Lewis to take note of various European Union documents relating to financial management not later than three hours after their commencement; proceedings may continue, though opposed, after the moment of interruption; and Standing Order No. 41A (Deferred divisions) shall not apply.—[Mr. Alan Campbell.]

WELSH AFFAIRS

Ordered,

That Mrs Madeline Moon be discharged from the Welsh Affairs Committee and Albert Owen be added.—[Joan Ryan, on behalf of the Committee of Selection.]

Royal Tournament

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Alan Campbell.]

9.9 pm

James Brokenshire (Hornchurch) (Con): I am grateful for the opportunity to highlight the royal tournament, which was a feature of the national calendar until 1999. Each year for 119 years, it was a showcase event for the armed forces and a way for the public to gain appreciation of their work. It featured much pageantry, with mass bands, cavalry displays by the Royal Horse Artillery and other set-piece demonstrations of the skill and training of the armed forces. I am delighted that the Under-Secretary has entered into the spirit of that pageantry with his smart and elegant dress this evening. That pageantry was part of the royal tournament for 119 years and we have a little of that here tonight.

The royal tournament also highlighted the serious side of the work of the armed forces, with mock battles fought by Gurkhas, Royal Marines and other special units. There was the royal naval field gun competition—in many ways, the high point of the event—which showed the physical strength and prowess of those involved. I remember watching the royal tournament every year on the television as I was growing up, and the sense of spectacle that brought the work of the military service into focus. It gave an important sense of nationhood and country as well as offering the opportunity to appreciate the work of armed forces personnel past and present.

In 1998, the Ministry of Defence announced that the tournament would be scrapped, to be replaced by a more modern event. In a BBC press report, the then Defence Secretary, now Lord Robertson, said:

"The Royal Tournament has served us well for a great many years, but as we approach the millennium, it is timely for us to take a look at this traditional event. This is a new beginning, not an end of the tournament and my aim is to make it more relevant and modern whilst retaining an element of pageantry."

The event that was held at Earl's Court for many years had experienced some problems with attendance and it was probably the right time to hold some sort of review of it. Lord Robertson's comments when the announcement of disbanding the traditional royal tournament was made gave the impression that a review would be conducted and that something would continue.

A Ministry of Defence Press release, which was issued at the start of the final royal tournament in 1999, echoed those sentiments. Lord Robertson said:

"The Royal Tournament has served us well for a great many years but as we approach a new millennium it is necessary to take a fresh look at this event. The Royal Tournament has in recent years lost audiences, money and deepened overstretch in the forces. It is time to reinvent and reinvigorate the shop window of Britain's military mission. From 2001 onwards we will carry forward the spirit of the Royal Tournament by running a major showcase event in London. This will be a new Military Tattoo held each summer within the spectacular and historic setting of the Horse Guards' Parade, with ceremonial elements, massed bands and pageantry."

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing the debate on such an important subject. Does he share my view that the long-established and much-regarded royal tournament fell victim to the unfortunate and misguided principles of cool Britannia, which dominated the early years of the current Administration?

James Brokenshire: It is difficult to judge. The Under-Secretary may be the best person to respond to that point, but there was a sense at the time that more traditional things were out of fashion. It is possible that the royal tournament was caught in the attempt to go for a more modern approach. Indeed, the statements by the then Defence Secretary emphasised that sense of modernity, even though I have to say that there was a need to review the role and structure of the royal tournament to reflect changes within the armed forces and the more modern service that we now have. There was certainly a good opportunity for a review.

Although one can debate the merits of the argument, Lord Robertson certainly appreciated the need to retain a high-profile national event to showcase the tremendous work of our armed forces. On the basis of those comments, I wondered why I could not recall reading or hearing about what sounds like a significant high-profile event that was intended to follow on year after year. I therefore asked a written question on how many times the royal tournament had been replaced by a military tattoo at Horse Guards parade in London, as Lord Robertson's comments had suggested would be the case. The Minister replied:

"Following the last Royal Tournament in 1999 it has been replaced once by a military tattoo at Horse Guards Parade. The Department continues, however, to participate in a wide variety of smaller events such as Open Days, ships visits, County Shows and showcase events such as the Edinburgh Military Tattoo and the Fairford Royal International Air Tattoo".—[Official Report, 20 December 2005; Vol. 440, c. 2763W.]

Despite Lord Robertson's initial statements that there would be a military tattoo in London each summer, the much-vaunted replacement was, in fact, only a one-off.

I hope that the Minister will be able to explain in his response what changed. Lord Robertson clearly recognised that the royal tournament was a significant and important event to showcase the work of our essential modern military forces. As we have heard, he described it as "the shop window of Britain's military mission".

With significant overseas commitments and increasing financial constraints on our armed forces, if it is now simply impossible to organise such a large-scale event on an annual basis, perhaps we could understand the decision-making process that has taken place. However, I am not aware—I am sure that the Minister will correct me if I am wrong—that any such formal explanation has been given. If that is not the reason, why has Lord Robertson's commitment not been followed through?

Against that backdrop, it is hardly surprising that one of my constituents, Mr. Steve Thomas of Bruce avenue, Hornchurch, wrote to me in the following terms:

"Do you remember the Royal Tournament, which was held at Earls Court every year and which was chopped by the Government in 1999? You probably saw it as a kid. I went to it many times over the years from age 10. It was always a great night out and we all got to meet our armed forces in person. I believe it was also very effective in gaining future recruits to the service. It was a tragedy when it was so brutally ended after 119 years. Yes 119 years of history means nothing to this present government. At the time it was claimed that it was costing too much and that it was far too patriotic . . . what nonsense. It was a very popular show right up to the end. We need to restore some pride in our country and there's no better way than to have an annual display of 'skill of arms' held in London as it was for 119 years."

I am sure that that sentiment is shared by many people in the House and across the country. Perhaps those comments were compounded by the lack of a proper replacement for the royal tournament as was previously promised, a lack of clarity as to why circumstances had changed and about what was to follow and by the fact that we do not really have a national event to mark the service of our armed forces and to recognise their tremendous efforts for this country.

I note that the Minister has announced the formal establishment of a veterans' day on 27 June, which we are told will happen each year and act as an important opportunity to thank veterans for their contribution to our life in the UK today. In his letter to all hon. Members, he said:

"It will be a day to focus on veterans of all ages and to celebrate and raise public awareness of their achievements and the contribution they have made and continue to make to society. We will also seek to highlight the support and advice available to veterans from official and voluntary sources and the role of ex-Service organisations. Finally the day will offer opportunities to celebrate the service by those currently serving in the Armed Forces".

I welcome this event. It is important that we have a veterans' day to mark the service of all those who have made such a huge contribution to the life of this country. Obviously, we have Remembrance day each November, on which we remember those who have given their lives in the service of this country, and it is important that we continue to recognise their service year after year. I am proud that we have a significant Remembrance day event each year in Hornchurch; it is an important part of our calendar, and rightly so. I hope that veterans' day will sit alongside that, to recognise the veterans of the armed forces who have given service to this country, but who are still very much alive, even though they may have suffered injuries and other trauma as a consequence of that service.

I welcome the proposals for a veterans' day. I hope that it will be a successful event every year, that it will result in the individual events that the Minister hopes will take place up and down the country, and that it will become an important part of our national life. Before this debate, I was heartened to see that there was to be some recognition of armed forces personnel, and that the veterans' day was in part intended to recognise the service of current members of the armed forces.

I was also heartened to see that the inaugural event would involve a high-profile celebration in London. I wonder whether I may read into the Minister's announcement that that might be some kind of high-profile tattoo or replacement for the royal tournament, as was promised by Lord Robertson. However, the Minister's letter did not go on to say that the high-profile event in London would be an annual event. My concern, therefore, is that we could end up in a similar situation to the one that pertained before, namely, that we should be given the promise of an inaugural event to mark veterans' day, but that after that it would be spun off into smaller, more local or regional events—as the Minister's letter seems to suggest—important though those are.

It is important to have a high-profile national event in London to attract the attention of the media and of the public to something as important as this. I hope that the Minister will be able to clarify this matter because his proposals appear to be for a one-off event, rather than a commitment to an annual high-profile event in London that would act as a proper way to thank armed forces personnel, past and present.

We need a meaningful opportunity to demonstrate the capabilities and sheer professionalism of our soldiers, sailors, air crew and support staff, and that was what the royal tournament did. It provided that focus. Yes, perhaps it needed reform, but it had the ability to garner support and to focus the attention of the television companies and the media generally on the tremendous work that our armed forces do in the service and defence of this country. Our armed forces do an outstanding job in defending this country and its interests overseas in increasingly difficult, dangerous and complicated situations. It is important that there is a significant national event in London, the capital, to recognise that work and show our appreciation for everything they do.

The royal tournament provided that opportunity for 119 years. For all the men and women who put their lives on the line for this country, I urge the Minister and his Department to have a rethink and provide a suitable replacement for the royal tournament so that we have a proper opportunity to pay tribute to our armed forces personnel and everything they do.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Don Touhig): I thank the hon. Member for Hornchurch (James Brokenshire) for his kind comments on my sartorial elegance this evening. I have just come from a dinner in Speaker's House, where I was addressing the armed forces parliamentary scheme. Due to the change of business, it was necessary to come to the Chamber as quickly as possible. Perhaps I shall set a new standard.

I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on securing this debate and thank him for his early-day motion, in which he pays great compliment to the servicemen and women of this country. I am sure that we all agree with his sentiment that the vital work the services do should be publicly appreciated. Our difference will be on the best way to do that and, in particular, how best we inform the public about the work of our services.

Historically, we have used a range of means to do that, including tournaments and tattoos, but those activities have, by necessity, changed and evolved with the times. Old formats have given way to new, and what once was a good way to inform and entertain people is no longer judged to be so.

The hon. Gentleman is right in saying that the royal tournament ran for 119 years, and for much of that time it was hugely popular. The then Secretary of State recognised that fact in the House in October 1999, when he paid a warm and well deserved tribute to those who had organised and participated in the tournament over the years. On the same occasion, however, he had to point out that attendance at the last few tournaments had dwindled quite considerably. In turn, that meant that the 1998 tournament incurred a loss of £400,000. The tournament was a charity, so making such a loss was a significant problem.

There may have been a number of reasons for the fall in attendance, but we could not avoid the fact that, in part, it was due to changed public tastes and interests. The tournament was no longer attracting either the size or type of audience we wanted, which meant it no longer provided us with the showcase we needed.

Those problems were compounded by the considerable demand on personnel that the tournament imposed. As the House was informed in October 1999, a minimum of 30,000 man-days per year were needed to run the tournament. Had it still met our publicity needs, that might have been justifiable, but when it no longer did so, the commitment became unacceptable. In sum, the royal tournament was an event of its time. It had served us well, but as times changed a new approach was required, as the hon. Gentleman conceded.

The hon. Gentleman also rightly pointed out that the initial plan had been to replace the royal tournament with an annual tattoo on Horse Guards parade and a regional event. Those activities were referred to as the Defence 2000 series of events. Between 2000 and 2002, events did take place. There was a tattoo on Horse Guards, which he referred to, in 2000, and in 2002 the Royal Navy's international festival of the sea was used to showcase equipment and capability. They were a success, but circumstances and tastes were still changing.

It has always been our aim to make the best use of existing regional events. The services already participate in hundreds of public events annually, as the hon. Gentleman conceded, and those range in size from school visits through to major set piece national events such as the royal international air tattoo at Fairford and the Edinburgh military tattoo. Those all provide opportunities to inform and educate the public on the outstanding contribution made by our servicemen and women.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): When the royal tournament was running, was it not given complete television coverage each year? Does that not represent something of a loss in publicity terms?

Mr. Touhig: I believe that it did receive television coverage, although I do not know how many people watched. However, my point is that numbers dwindled considerably over the last few years of the tournament.

Mr. Hollobone: The Minister mentioned the Edinburgh military tattoo, which is a huge success. Why does he think that it has continued to attract crowds, whereas crowds were lost from the royal tournament?

Mr. Touhig: I cannot say. I believe that the tattoo is a special event in Edinburgh and that there are celebrations at that time, but I can speak only from experience of the royal tournament, whose audience was dwindling. What I say later may help the hon. Gentleman to understand my argument.

I think the House will agree that since the announcement of the inception of the Defence 2000 series of events, our armed forces have been increasingly busy. I am sure that the House will also agree that operational commitments must always be paramount. In May 2004, my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Ministry of Defence and the Minister responsible for the armed forces told the House that the Defence 2000 series was to be discontinued. The principal reason was that during a period of high levels of operational commitment and the associated demands placed on service family life, it was felt that the greatest benefits would be gained from focusing on existing events. Resources were already committed to those events, and many were already sharply focused on specific audiences such as visiting schools and potential recruits.

However, the decision was also based on changing public tastes. Our research shows that people increasingly look to a more complex range of sources for their information. That applies particularly to the young people who are potential recruits, and who were once the backbone of those who attended the royal tournament.

In the era of the internet and multi-channel television, tastes have changed and diversified. That does not mean that shows and events no longer have a place; rather, it means that we must now engage the public with a broader spectrum of more sophisticated approaches. Of course, our cadet organisations still provide a marvellous opportunity for young people around the country to enjoy challenging activities in a military context. Given the impressive range of events and activities in which the services are already involved, it was concluded that there was no longer a requirement for another military tattoo. Our position on that has not changed. For that reason, we cannot agree with the hon. Member for Hornchurch that we should examine the options for re-establishing an annual military tattoo in London.

The hon. Gentleman also spoke about veterans day. Veterans day follows last year's very successful veterans awareness week. That week came at a difficult time. We experienced the July bombing, and the country rallied. There was also the special commemoration of the anniversary of the end of the second world war. We decided that there should be a veterans day every year. I have proposed 27 June: on whatever day of the week it falls, the date will remain the same. I believe that on that day there should be a national event of some sort in the capital.

I also want it to be understood that veterans come in all shapes and sizes. Every year, 23,000 people leave the forces. A veteran is not necessarily someone who fought in the last war or did national service; a veteran could be someone in his thirties who has done some service and has now returned to civvy street. I want to convey that message to the country.

When I attended an armistice parade in my constituency, I talked to a chap who was covered in medals. I said, "Today we are announcing the extension of the veterans badge." He said, "It does not apply to me, Don: I am not a veteran." I asked him what he meant. He said, "I did not fight in the last war." There is a perception that a veteran is someone who fought in the last war. We need to get the message across that veterans do come in all shapes and sizes, and in all ages. Although I think it important for us to have a national event in London, I hope that Members throughout the House will promote events in their constituencies to honour our veterans. Such events would not be intended to replicate armistice day, a solemn and special occasion on which we remember our dead. They would be more of a celebration of the commitment and sacrifices that people have made to our services over the years.

James Brokenshire: I am heartened by what the Minister has said in the context of veterans. I agree that veterans come in all shapes and sizes. Indeed, I argue that veterans include current service personnel who have served and defended this country. Will he clarify what is intended by the national event? What he has said goes some way to assuaging my concerns about having a national event that recognises and celebrates the work of service personnel both past and present.

Mr. Touhig: I am tempted to stray down the path that the hon. Gentleman entices me to go down but, if he will bear with me and be patient, I expect to make a statement very shortly setting out details of how we propose to celebrate veterans day this year. If he and other colleagues will be patient another week or so, I hope then to bring forward quite extensive information and proposals on what we plan to carry out.

Having explained our position, may I briefly outline what we are doing to keep the public informed about the excellent work of our servicemen and women? First, we are focusing resources on some of the existing shows and events that we attend. Both within and between each of the services, there is increased emphasis on supporting high-priority events. Those hon. Members who were at the London boat show in January will have seen a combined Navy and RAF presence. Further similar joined approaches are being considered. We are piggy-backing on to events where we can offer the forces a showcase, which perhaps would not have happened if we had stayed with the tattoo.

In addition to the boat show, the services participate in the London motor show and the London air show. When those are added to the considerable number of state ceremonial events that take place in London, there is certainly no lack of opportunity for members of the public to see the services in London.

Secondly, we are increasingly using events designed to commemorate past endeavours to highlight current achievements. Again, those of us who witnessed the marvellous celebrations last summer that marked the 60th anniversary of the end of the war will have seen plenty of evidence for that. The historical link between the generations was one of the commemoration's main themes. Plans are in train to mark the 150th anniversary of the Victoria cross and the George cross. Those will be among the activities on which we propose to make announcements this year.

Across the Department, an increased range of activities is being more specifically targeted at key audiences. The wide range of activities in schools and colleges bears testimony to that. Those go from service career adviser visits through to a highly developed curriculum support activity, delivered by a mixed team of military and civilians, on the theme of citizenship.

Having already talked about our increasingly sophisticated audiences, I should mention the work being done on all the MOD websites. Both the Army and the RAF sites are currently undergoing significant enhancements and the new look MOD website went live three weeks ago. Even more technologically ambitious projects are ongoing, including the streaming direct on to mobile phones of images from the Army team that will shortly be climbing Mount Everest. As the hon. Gentleman conceded, we are looking for new ways to promote knowledge and understanding of the experience of our forces.

As I said, I have just come from a dinner at Speaker's House. I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman was not there. If he had come, he may have talked to colleagues in the services. They appreciate the huge contribution that the royal tournament made in the past, but from the conversations I had—the few conversations, I admit—they do not think that resurrecting the royal tournament would be the answer in seeking to promote knowledge, understanding and appreciation of the value of our forces.

I happily endorse the praise that has previously been given to the royal tournament and similar events. They served their purpose well in their time, but times have changed and so have the public's expectations. Increasingly, we must take a more sophisticated approach, embracing new technologies and new communication channels. The existing range of public events still have their place in our portfolio, but they must now be supported by other approaches, which are often more effective. Our modern, high-tech, mobile and agile armed forces want and deserve to be shown off. The medium of a military tattoo is, I fear, not the right way to do that, but I am open to any suggestions, advice or comments from any Member of this House, so that we can ensure that we get across to our people the message of the huge commitment made by our servicemen and women.

I have no doubt that our servicemen and women serving us around the world are held in very high regard in the hearts of the British people; we owe them a great debt and it is important that we continue to acknowledge that. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will join me in recognising that fact, and if there are other, more appropriate ways in which we can demonstrate what our armed forces do in the service of their country, we will certainly pursue them. I welcome any such proposals.

I am sorry that I cannot give the hon. Gentleman, who wanted restoration of the royal tournament, better news, but I hope that, having considered my remarks, he will feel that we are going down the right road and that he, too, has a contribution to make in helping us to find new ways to promote interest in, and knowledge and appreciation of, our armed forces.

Oral Answers to Questions

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH

The Secretary of State was asked—

Rehabilitation (Visual Impairment)

1. Mr. David Amess (Southend, West) (Con): What the responsibilities of local authorities are to provide rehabilitation services for blind and partially sighted people. [56290]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Liam Byrne): Local authorities and the NHS are responsible for providing rehabilitation services for the visually impaired that are based on need. We have increased investment in both to ensure that commissioners have more money over the next two years with which to develop services.

Mr. Amess: In a written answer to me on 28 November last year the Minister said that it was the responsibility of local health and social care bodies to commission facilities according to local needs. As he will know, Guide Dogs for the Blind conducted a survey which showed that 20 per cent. of such bodies did not provide rehabilitation services because of lack of funds and lack of qualified staff. Will he please do all that he can to deal with that?

Mr. Byrne: The hon. Gentleman is the secretary of the all-party parliamentary group on eye health and visual impairment, and has done a great deal to draw attention to the issues. I think there is consensus in all parts of the House that local communities are best placed to design the shape of services, but we made it clear in a recent White Paper that the director of adult social services will need to undertake a strategic assessment of local needs. Given that more than 300,000 people in the country are blind or visually impaired, we expect their needs to be given prominence in the plans.

Mr. John Baron (Billericay) (Con): Despite what the Minister says, the fact remains that, as we have heard from my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess), some local authorities are simply not providing essential services. Given that Guide Dogs for the Blind estimates that at least 80,000 people are not receiving any dedicated rehabilitation services just because of where they live, and given that the Minister's Department has even refused to be represented on the Guide Dogs for the Blind project group that is looking into the issue, will the Government stop washing their hands of the problem, and end the postcode lottery by establishing minimum entitlements to care for all blind and partially sighted people so that they can lead more independent lives?

Mr. Byrne: We set out clearly the standards that we expect to operate in the national service framework that was published last year. It is incumbent on us to specify the right pathways of care, and we have done that, along with Guide Dogs for the Blind. It is also incumbent on us to ensure that the right level of resources is there, which is why local government is entering its ninth successive year of real-terms increases.

The Opposition cannot on the one hand say that we should abolish all targets and have some sort of clinical free-for-all, and on the other hand say that there must be some kind of central direction. They cannot have it both ways. What we must do is ensure that the framework is right and the resources are there, and that is exactly what we have done.

Home Oxygen Service

2. Sandra Gidley (Romsey) (LD): If she will make a statement on recent changes to the domiciliary oxygen service. [56291]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Jane Kennedy): The home oxygen service has seen little change since 1948. Patients and health professionals have been pressing for a modernised service for some time. Of the approximately 60,000 patients who use the service, 30,000—the majority of the highly dependent patients—transferred to the new service before 1 February following an agreement between the suppliers.

Sandra Gidley: The Under-Secretary of State for Health, the hon. Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint), the Minister responsible for public health, is on record as stating that the new oxygen service "was always planned to be phased in over a six-month transition period and not 'suddenly switched'."

Will the Minister confirm that if the new oxygen regulations had been in force as planned, doctors would not have been allowed to write prescriptions after 1 February and pharmacists would not have been able to supply according to those prescriptions? They would not have been able to bail the system out as they have, in effect saving lives. Will the Minister acknowledge that an administrative blunder has actually eased the situation?

Jane Kennedy: It is a shame that the hon. Lady added that last point. I very much appreciate the way in which community pharmacists, in particular, have worked with primary care trusts to deal with the problems that occurred during the first few weeks of the new service. As for the first part of the hon. Lady's question, if we phased in the service we clearly had to phase in the way in which we managed patients—exactly the way in which we have managed the 30,000 patients who are the most dependent of all. Obviously we must ensure that the oxygen service gives each patient the service that he or she requires, and that is why, when it is operating fully, the new service will prove very effective indeed.

Mrs. Linda Riordan (Halifax) (Lab): Is the Minister aware that, in west Yorkshire, Air Products, which was contracted to supply home oxygen from 1 February, has failed to do so, leaving patients high and dry? Local pharmacists who have lost their contracts with Air Products are kindly supplying the much-needed oxygen and keeping hospital admissions down. Will the Minister explain why the system has been changed, given that it was working so well before?

Jane Kennedy: The system was not working well. Only 55 per cent. of pharmacies supplied oxygen cylinders. Supplies were delivered to the most dependent patients by other suppliers. This is not a process of privatisation; it will deliver a better service to patients—precisely the service that patients and health care providers have been asking us to deliver.

Andrew Rosindell (Romford) (Con): Does the Minister not accept that the system that her Government have imposed simply is not working? Many of my constituents are suffering as a result, as are constituents of my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (James Brokenshire). Many of the patients of Mr. Tariq Mahood, a pharmacist in the Mims pharmacy in North street, Romford, have not had the oxygen that they desperately need. Will the Government please review this policy as a matter of urgency?

Jane Kennedy: We have been doing that, and I followed the operation of the new service not only from 1 February but during the weeks beforehand. We have seen a surge in the number of general practitioner orders for patients with continuous or long-term needs, and it is not yet clear precisely why that has happened. There could be a number of reasons, including GPs reviewing the number of patients using high volumes of cylinder oxygen, or people beginning to exercise choice across the wider range of services now available. We are working closely with primary care trusts, GPs and patients to ensure that patients receive precisely the service that they need. As I have said, I am grateful for the way in which pharmacies and PCTs have co-operated with suppliers to ensure that these early problems with the service are ironed out very quickly.

Dr. Phyllis Starkey (Milton Keynes, South-West) (Lab): One of my constituents has experienced the problem of oxygen cylinders that delivered the previously prescribed speed of oxygen no longer being available. That has prevented him from going to a day care centre, which is not willing to cope with the potential medical crisis. Might not such problems have been avoided if the scheme had been piloted? That way, they could have been identified in just one area and the lessons learned before the scheme was rolled out across the country.

Jane Kennedy: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising the case of her constituent; I will look into the detail of it. Clearly, the intention is to improve the service on offer, not to diminish it. The new service was consulted on extensively and it is a response that we have been planning since 2003. My hon. Friend suggests that we could have piloted it, but as I have said, 30,000 patients went on to it before 1 February and the suppliers have co-operated to ensure delivery. Once we have ironed out the early problems that some patients are experiencing, the new service will prove very popular indeed.

Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): Back in the middle of January, I challenged the Minister in a written question on the changes to the home oxygen service, making specific reference to the impact on patient safety. Her reply was blandness itself. Does she now accept that the change-over has been botched and that, potentially, lives have been lost? Will she take responsibility?

Jane Kennedy: I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on his re-appointment to the Front Bench as health spokesman. His question was posed in characteristically robust terms, but no, I do not accept that patients' lives are at risk in the way that he describes. As I explained in my earlier answers, I am aware that there have been problems, and we are working very hard to address them. As I have also said, it is important that the new service delivers oxygen to those who need it when they need it. These early problems have come about for a range of reasons, and I anticipate that we will get over them very rapidly.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) (Con): Does the Minister not understand that this has been a shambles? The position is very simple. She says that there are many reasons for the problems, and no doubt she will find many people to blame for the shambles, but the reality is that pharmacists were de-stocking on oxygen cylinders because they expected the contractors to provide them, and GPs believed that they could send orders through to the contractors and did not seem to realise that they should do so only for repeat prescriptions. The net result is that the contractors ended up with thousands of orders that they had no means of prioritising or responding to. The Minister says that she examined the new service beforehand, but as I say, it is a shambles. She should have thanked the pharmacists for bailing the Department out in her first answer to the hon. Member for Romsey (Sandra Gidley), not in her second. She should also say sorry to the patients, pharmacists and GPs who have had to cope with the Department's failed administration.

Jane Kennedy: I have not blamed anyone for the shambles—[Interruption.] Opposition Members should wait for my answer. I have said that there were problems, and that we are working hard to overcome them. As perhaps we should have anticipated, one of the problems was that some patients would ring up to inquire about the new services on offer. We did not have the number of telephone lines that we could have made available had we anticipated those inquiries, and we can learn lessons from that. The suppliers have experienced difficulties in responding to telephone orders, and have increased the number of lines available for dealing with queries. Equally, there have been variations in the amount of details being given as we have changed from using prescriptions to using proper order forms for arranging supplies. The order form requires GPs to give more details than was the case in the past.

We are learning from all those factors, and we are working with suppliers and the health service to ensure that the service that we deliver is precisely the one that we intend to deliver, and the one that suppliers are committed to delivering in the future.

Colorants

3. Mr. John Leech (Manchester, Withington) (LD): What assessment she has made of the level of use of colorants in the manufacture of medicines; and if she will make a statement. [56292]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Jane Kennedy): The addition of small levels of colorants to medicines can often be justified as a way of identifying and distinguishing the different types and strengths of a medicine. That can be very important to patients taking several medicines, for example. However, the use of any substance in a medicine, as well as the drug itself, must be justified under EU legislation before it is granted a marketing authorisation.

Mr. Leech: I thank the Minister for that answer. I became interested in this matter when a constituent told me about the difficulty of finding a medicine that did not have a particular colorant. My constituent needed the colorant-free version because of an allergy. However, I was surprised to be told by the Medicines and Healthcare products Regulatory Agency that one reason for the use of colorants was to improve appearance. Given the obvious danger that young children will consume medicines and pills because they think that they are sweets and drinks, and the recent tragic case—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. The hon. Gentleman must sit down when I stand up. Will he now please put his question precisely?

Mr. Leech: I am sorry, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Does the Minister agree that we need to rethink the use of colorants as a way to improve appearance?

Jane Kennedy: I do not accept that that is necessary. The MHRA will investigate any reports of an adverse reaction to a medicine, whether that is due to the colorants or any other additive, or to the medicine's basic ingredients. It will also investigate any reports suggesting that there is a wider problem related to a particular colouring additive that may alter the benefit from the use of that medicine. Any company that wants to use an additive in a medicine has to receive approval for its use. I believe that the system is working pretty well. I shall look at the point raised by the hon. Gentleman, but I do not think that there is any need for a review at the moment.

Access to GPs

4. Mr. Mark Todd (South Derbyshire) (Lab): What assessment she has made of access to general practitioners in South Derbyshire. [56293]

The Secretary of State for Health (Ms Patricia Hewitt): I should like to take this opportunity to express my heartfelt thanks to Sir Nigel Crisp, who announced today that he will retire at the end of this month, after more than five years as chief executive of the NHS and permanent secretary at the Department of Health. Under his leadership, there have been record improvements in NHS performance. I want to thank him for that and to congratulate him on his elevation to the other place. I have placed a copy of the full announcement in the Library of the House.

To turn to the question, in February 2006 the Derbyshire Dales and South Derbyshire primary care trust and the Greater Derby PCT reported that all primary care practices in their areas were able to make an appointment with a GP within two working days, and with a primary care professional within one working day.

Mr. Todd: The preface to that answer made me think that Sir Nigel was taking a personal interest in South Derbyshire, and I was saddened by the announcement. How adequate does my right hon. Friend think are the tools to deal with rapid population growth, such as the Swadlincote area has experienced over the past 10 years? There has been a predictable increase in demand for primary care, and many of my roughly 10,000 extra constituents concentrated around Swadlincote often struggle to get registered with a GP. Relying on a local improvement finance trust scheme to deliver that service means that they face a very long wait.

Ms Hewitt: I understand my hon. Friend's concerns and I am glad to say that in the allocations that we have made and announced for the next two years for primary care trusts we take account as far as we possibly can of anticipated as well as previous population growth. He refers to the new health and social care facilities at Swadlincote, and they will be an enormous improvement in the facilities that are offered to his constituents. I am sure that the local primary care trust, with the additional funding that it will continue to receive over the next few years, will do everything possible to go on improving services for his constituents, as we have been doing.

Business Services Authority

5. David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): If she will make a statement on progress with the establishment of the Business Services Authority. [56294]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Liam Byrne): The Business Services Authority was established in October 2005. It will gain legal status on 1 April when the arm's length bodies that are merging into it are due to be abolished.

David Taylor: It is richly ironic for there to be no published business case for the creation of the Business Services Authority, which has been beset by undue haste, poor advice and wildly optimistic time scales. I extend my sympathies to my hon. Friend on inheriting that mess. Does he agree that the BSA has become an expensive parking bay for the five NHS agencies involved? Has he made any estimate of the cost of that sad and sorry saga so far?

Mr. Byrne: Our priority is front-line care, where patients are served, and we are increasing resources at such a rate in the NHS that there is an obligation on us to use the money well. Plans for the BSA have brought together existing ideas for all four separate agencies and I hope to meet hon. Members soon to brief them. I know that my hon. Friend is concerned about one point in particular, and I wish to give him a word of reassurance. Where those plans will have an impact on working people, we will seek views from the Public and Commercial Services Union, Unison and others, because we recognise that they are working hard to protect their members' interests.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): Will the Minister confirm that the BSA will underwrite all the costs of change and the redundancies inevitable in the transfer and outsourcing? If not, it will hide the true cost of the outsourcing and effectively shift the risk on to the public service, leaving the bidding contractors to cream off the maximum profit. Will he assure the House that that is not the case and will not happen?

Mr. Byrne: I assure the hon. Gentleman that no final decisions have been taken, but as the business cases are finalised over the months to come, I can assure him also that if there are transfers of staff, we will observe best practice and ensure TUPE protection for any staff who are transferred. Furthermore, we will follow the joint statement of good practice that was agreed between Government, industry and unions in October last year, which sets out the standards on pay, conditions and service that we all expect to be observed.

Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): Apparently, PricewaterhouseCoopers put out a report suggesting that the contracting out of the pension scheme administration would be challenging and pose a degree of business continuity risk. Is not this simply an attempt to privatise, driven by dogma?

Mr. Ken Purchase (Wolverhampton, North-East) (Lab/Co-op): I think so.

Hon. Members: Answer!

Mr. Byrne: One answer or two? As my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Kelvin Hopkins) knows, about 50 per cent. of the Pensions Agency work is already outsourced and, under the terms of that contract, the winning contractor—out of the 33 organisations that bid—has first rights to bid on any expansion of that contract. That bid is under development now and our first assessment will need to be whether that bid is value for money, before it goes any further.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien (Eddisbury) (Con): Without scapegoating strategic health authorities or the as yet non-operational NHS Business Services Authority, will the Minister give a guarantee that, in line with the Government's target, the Department will now stop the deliberate policy of long and damaging delays of due payments to suppliers to the NHS, such as PJ Care Ltd. in Milton Keynes and the Shred Safe Ltd. of St. Neots, which have waited more than 120 days to be paid? Is he not a little embarrassed that NHS trusts, by those unfair means, seek to mask their deficits, which were incurred as a direct result of implementing Government policy?

Mr. Byrne: The obligations of everyone in the public sector to pay their bills on time is well set out. If there are instances of that not being observed which the hon. Gentleman wants to bring forward, I will happily look into them.

Clinical Advisory Liaison Services

6. Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): What advice she has given to primary care trusts concerning the setting up of clinical advisory liaison services. [56295]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Jane Kennedy): The Department's director of access wrote to all PCT chief executives in July 2005. The letter stated that referrals to community-based clinical assessment services and other such centres should happen only where that adds genuine clinical value for patients.

Tony Baldry: How on earth can it make sense for GPs who have not seen the patient to be paid £60 an hour to second-guess and vet the referral letters of GPs who have seen the patient and who know their patients? How can it make sense for every referral letter from every GP in Oxfordshire to be sent to some central lubyanka in the middle of Oxford in some Stalinist process to be second-guessed? What on earth does that say about the system's confidence in GPs to make appropriate referrals and the integrity of GP commissioning?

Jane Kennedy: The hon. Gentleman opened his question with the phrase, "How on earth". He must be on a different planet, because the description that he just gave is not what I recognise. If he is referring to the concerns that the British Medical Association has raised recently, I should say that even the BMA acknowledges that there is real benefit to be had in a different way of managing referrals, so that the patient goes to the person whom they need, depending on the nature of their complaint.

Dental Services

7. Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton) (Lab/Co-op): What recent assessment she has made of the supply of dentists and capacity for dentists' training. [56296]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton): The most recent assessment of dentists' numbers was the 2004 "Report of the Primary Care Dental Workforce Review". Since April 2004, we have recruited the equivalent of an extra 1,100 dentists in the NHS. Last year, we announced that we would increase dental training places by 170 each year, and in January we announced the opening of a new dental school at the Peninsula medical school.

Linda Gilroy: I welcome the resources that my hon. Friend and her Department have found for the new dental school in Plymouth, especially as it will bring 150 jobs and capacity equivalent to about 20 dentists even in the early years. However, does she agree that preventive health care will make the biggest difference to dental treatment and the availability of dental health care to our constituents? Will she urge the new dental school to consider what it can do to drive that agenda forward?

Ms Winterton: I congratulate my hon. Friend on her assiduousness in pressing for the dental school in her constituency. She is absolutely right to say that that preventive care is extremely important. Not only do we have a public health strategy for oral health, but an important part of the new contract is that it allows dentists to spend time on preventive health care, as well as other treatments.

Sir Paul Beresford (Mole Valley) (Con): I declare an interest—it is becoming a habit. I am fascinated by the Minister's reply. She will be aware that dental students need academic clinical teachers. Does she agree that the 6 per cent. reduction in the number of academic clinical teachers over the past year could present a problem? Some 20 per cent. of those teachers are over 55, and 33 per cent. of them are aged 45 to 55. Does she agree that we must face the fact that there is a possible problem with a new school, more places and more students, but fewer teachers?

Ms Winterton: The hon. Gentleman raises an important point, which we have been looking at in relation to the way that we deliver dental training. As well as training to recruit more academics, we can consider other things, such as outreach schools, where students spend more time perfecting their skills in the community, as well as in the school. He is absolutely right to suggest that this issue is important, and I can assure him that we are looking at it.

Mr. Paul Truswell (Pudsey) (Lab): Is not one of the immediate problems about the supply of NHS dentists the fact that those who opt out of the service are writing to patients inviting them to opt into a Denplan contract on a first-come, first-served basis, before those patients know whether there will be any NHS re-provision in the area? Would that not have been prevented if the cut-off date for agreeing the contract had been somewhat earlier?

Ms Winterton: We had the cut-off date for the contract fit in with the financial year, which also gave the NHS time to prepare for it. My hon. Friend is absolutely right, however, to say that some patients have found the position misleading, which has angered many people in the primary care trusts. The impression has been given that NHS dentistry is not going to continue if a dentist withdraws, but the fact is that the PCT will, under the new system, have money locally. Whether a dentist decides to take up a new contract is up to the dentist, but the primary care trust will re-provide dentistry from elsewhere, and many NHS dentists are coming forward to say that they want to do that where others do not.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): Given that NHS dentistry is largely unavailable in Lincolnshire, and given further that there is a precedent for the national health service paying for operations that cannot be performed within it within a stated time, why is the same principle not applied to private dental fees incurred by patients who cannot get NHS dentistry because it is not available? Why, in those circumstances, does not the NHS pay those private dental fees?

Ms Winterton: Most NHS dentists are, in fact, independent contractors. The NHS contracts with them, and in future that will be done in an improved way. We have had no control: if a dentist left the NHS, there was no way in which the local primary care trust had the money to recommission local dentistry. The reforms that we are introducing change all that.

I am aware that there are particular problems in Lincolnshire, which has received substantial access money to increase availability. As I have said, however, that money will be available locally. Meanwhile, it would be interesting to know whether purchasing in the way that the right hon. and learned Gentleman outlined is now Conservative party policy.

Dentists' Earnings

8. Steve McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green) (Lab): What estimate she has made of average earnings of NHS dentists under the new contract; and if she will make a statement. [56298]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton): Under the new contract, a highly committed NHS dentist can expect to earn, on average, around £80,000 per year, with additional money for practice expenses. That will be guaranteed for three years, along with a 5 per cent. reduction in work load.

Steve McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green) (Lab): Eighty thousand plus! Given that figure, is it right for dentists in Birmingham to claim that they are being ripped off by the Government? In some cases, like doorstep cowboys, they have been attempting to blackmail elderly people into purchasing private insurance that they do not need and cannot afford. Surely that is no way for professional people to conduct what is essentially a trade dispute.

Ms Winterton: My hon. Friend is right to point out that we are offering £80,000, plus practice expenses, guaranteed for three years, and a 5 per cent. reduction in work load—which seems to me to be a fair offer to dentists—as well as introducing a system that will greatly benefit patients. He is quite right, too, to say that many primary care trusts have been worried by some of the information disseminated to patients, which quite frankly has been unnecessarily alarmist. Patients should not feel that they must be driven into private insurance. If a dentist decides not to come with us but to leave the NHS, the money will be available locally to recommission dentistry from other dentists.

Mr. Mark Lancaster (North-East Milton Keynes) (Con): I understand why the Minister does not allow dentists to use 0870 telephone numbers, but why has she allowed the practice to persist in the NHS as a whole, particularly for patient hotlines?

Ms Winterton: I am not sure whether I understand the hon. Gentleman's point. Is he saying that patients have to use a different number to make an appointment? That is not current practice. Most people contact their dentist by ringing an ordinary number.

Mr. David S. Borrow (South Ribble) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that it is totally unacceptable for dentists who have rejected the contract and who have moved into the private sector to tell elderly patients with false teeth that they must sign up to Denplan, which costs £200 a year? They do not need their teeth cleaned or examined; all they need is access to a dentist when their false teeth need repairing or upgrading.

Ms Winterton: My hon. Friend is right to say that that practice is unacceptable. We are making changes to the registration of denturists, who can undertake some of the work that he has mentioned; with appropriate training, they can undertake some of those tasks separately, too.

Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): Given that the Government are making an offer that dentists apparently cannot refuse, and that the deadline passed at the end of last month, will the Minister tell us whether more NHS dentists will be providing services after 1 April? Has there not been a distinct lack of dentists signing up to the new contract in the Minister's Doncaster constituency? As a result, more patients will pay more for treatment, if they can get it, while dentists who do sign up will be paid less for performing the same work.

Ms Winterton: All the indications suggest that the vast majority of dentists will sign up to the new contract. As I have said, if dentists do not want to sign up, local primary care trusts now have the money to recommission dentistry.

Tim Loughton: Where from?

Ms Winterton: Some NHS dentists say that they will expand their lists if other local dentists do not want to sign up. Over and above that, international recruitment has taken place, and 1,000 recruits are going through the international qualifying examination. In addition, there are corporate bodies that want to undertake NHS dentistry. An extra £315 million is going into NHS dentistry compared with two years ago, so we can increase capacity and access for patients. The deal is good for dentists, but, importantly, it is good for patients, too.

Primary Care (West Bromwich, West)

9. Mr. Adrian Bailey (West Bromwich, West) (Lab/Co-op): What steps her Department is taking to improve access to primary care services in West Bromwich, West. [56299]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Caroline Flint): I am pleased to say that in my hon. Friend's constituency primary care practices report that the number of patients able to see a GP within two working days increased from 73.8 per cent. in June 2002 to 100 per cent. in December 2005. Our recent White Paper, "Our health, our care, our say", looks at ways to develop and extend choice, and to make sure that those reports match patient experience.

Mr. Bailey: Although I recognise the huge improvement in primary care services in my constituency, we are still under-supplied with doctors, who are being helped out by United States accredited physicians' assistants. What is the Minister doing to improve the training, and thereby the number, of British accredited physicians' assistants to help constituencies such as mine?

Caroline Flint: We are expanding training generally, and I shall be happy to write to my hon. Friend on that particular issue. I am pleased to see that his constituency contains two primary care access centres to support GPs, a pharmacy minor ailments scheme that has been developed across Sandwell and two local improvement finance trust schemes, one of which is already open; the other is due to open later this year.

NHS Expenditure

10. Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): What estimate she has made of the total level of overspending in the NHS in 2005–06. [56300]

The Secretary of State for Health (Ms Patricia Hewitt): The month six forecast was for overspending of £620 million in this financial year. I stress that the majority of NHS hospitals and other organisations are not only improving patient care, but doing so within their increased budgets. As the hon. Gentleman knows, we have already provided additional management support to the small number of organisations with the worst problems, and I am determined to do everything possible to return the NHS to financial balance by the end of the next financial year.

Mr. Bellingham: Is the Secretary of State aware that PCTs in Norfolk, Suffolk and Cambridgeshire now face a combined shortfall of almost £100 million? Is it true that hospitals in Norfolk have been told to halt additional sessions, peg operating capacity at current levels and put a brake on making further inroads into waiting lists? The Secretary of State keeps saying that everything in the NHS is perfect, but she should try saying that to consultants and staff who are now closing wards and cancelling operations.

Ms Hewitt: What I have said on several occasions, both to the House and to the hon. Gentleman when I have met him to discuss the situation in his constituency and the wider area, is that although most NHS institutions are continuing both to improve patient care and to live within their budgets there are serious financial problems in a small number of organisations and in some areas. We are therefore working with the strategic health authorities to do everything possible to ensure not only that we continue to meet our targets—for example, waiting no more than six months for an operation anywhere—but that we deal with the financial problems in that minority of organisations.

Jim Cousins (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend bear in mind the position of hospital managers in Newcastle, who are containing spending and growing services against a background of trying to carry out a big PFI project and to cope with money following patients, no certainty about the future structure of commissioning bodies, a big switch of resources away from acute care and into primary care, and the possibility of their application to become a foundation trust being turned down next month because they cannot guarantee long-term stability in their financial base? Will she consider the situation of managers faced with that sort of uncertainty?

Ms Hewitt: I would like to take the opportunity offered by my hon. Friend's question to pay tribute to the excellent managers whom we are fortunate to have across the national health service. They are helping to ensure that one of the largest and most complex organisations in the world is treating more patients better and faster than ever before. That is due to the superb work of our front-line staff, supported by management and backed up by the investment that we have made.

I would also like to point out that the tradition over many decades in the NHS has been for overspending in some areas, notably the south and the east of the country, to be matched by underspending in the north. That is not fair, it is not efficient and it cannot continue.

Dr. Richard Taylor (Wyre Forest) (Ind): Will the Secretary of State tell the House how many trusts have minimised their deficits for this year by one-off brokerage, which cannot be repeated in 2006–07?

Ms Hewitt: The hon. Gentleman raises an important issue. The sort of informal one-off brokerage to which he refers has been a feature of NHS financial management for the best part of 60 years, and I do not regard it as a good feature of financial management. Part of our work this year and next will be to ensure much greater financial transparency, so that we can both get better services for patients and obtain best value for patients and for public money. I hope that the whole House endorses that aim.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley) (Lab): Will the overspending in the NHS that my right hon. Friend describes be dealt with by those who overspend, and not by the wider health community?

Ms Hewitt: My right hon. Friend makes an extremely important point. Unfortunately, the scale of the overspending and the accumulated deficits in a small minority of areas and organisations is such that it is simply not possible for those organisations—or even, in some cases, the wider areas in which they sit—to solve the financial problems on their own. We are working closely with strategic health authorities to put in place the necessary action to ensure that the NHS returns to financial balance at the end of the next financial year.

Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): I support the Secretary of State's requirement that primary care trusts should balance the books and I want that to succeed, but will she ask for a report into the consequences of that for Amblescroft unit at Fountain way in Salisbury, where 12 elderly vulnerable people have been told to leave by the end of April because the unit is being closed, and for the Greencroft centre, where 150 people with mental problems face the closure of the centre, because of the interface with the county council and the provision of social services? A tab of some £2 million has been picked up this year because of overspend in the health service. Much as we might wish to reduce that debt, it has consequences for a small number of the most vulnerable people.

Ms Hewitt: I will be happy to look at the two specific cases that the hon. Gentleman has raised; perhaps I could write to him on that point. More generally, I stress the point that we made in our recent White Paper that it is absolutely essential in future that we get the social services authority and the primary care trust working much more closely together, with joint care plans, particularly for the most vulnerable people, and, where possible, pooled budgets and joint commissioning.

Rosie Cooper (West Lancashire) (Lab): Will the Secretary of State comment on the difference in the treatment of debt between trusts where brokerage is available and those where the trust debt is treated as in deficit control, and the impact that that might have on the financial recovery of trusts such as Southport and Ormskirk in my constituency?

Ms Hewitt: Most organisations that at month six predicted an overspend for the end of this financial year have a relatively small problem. With a little extra focus and effort, it should be possible to bring the situation back under control in the very near future. There are, however, other organisations, including particularly the 15 or so where we have appointed additional financial management support—the turnaround directors—where the problems will take longer to resolve. That is why strategic health authorities have the necessary discretion to treat different organisations differently depending on the nature of the problem that they face.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) (Con): Four months ago, in reply to our debate, the Secretary of State said that she had all the recovery plans in place to deliver a net deficit in the NHS below £200 million this year. Now she says that it is £620 million as at month six, and she simply will not tell the House what her latest figures on months 10 and 11 are telling her. We can see the reality from board papers across the country; the deficit is approaching £800 million.

I am sure that the House joins the Secretary of State in appreciating Sir Nigel Crisp's contribution to the NHS, not only in his present role as chief executive, but in previous roles. Perhaps he does not yet appreciate to what extent he is going to give a last service to the NHS, or at least to the Secretary of State, by acting as fall guy for the lack of financial control in the NHS. Will the Secretary of State at least have the courtesy to come to the Dispatch Box and tell the House her current estimate of the projected deficit this year, which has caused the Department of Health to send threatening letters to chief executives the length and breadth of the NHS? Will she say now that she will take responsibility for the end-year financial outturn?

Ms Hewitt: I regret the tone of the hon. Gentleman's comments about Sir Nigel Crisp, who has made an outstanding contribution to the NHS in a variety of roles. I can tell the hon. Gentleman that the £200 million end-year deficit that I told the House last year I hoped that we would be able to achieve looks increasingly unlikely. We are, however, absolutely determined to keep the end-year deficit as low as possible. We are putting all our efforts into working with the strategic health authorities and the individual organisations with the worst problems to ensure that that is the case. As soon as I have the end-year management figures I shall, of course, publish them for the House, as I did last year. I underline the point that I was making: not only are we determined to keep this year's deficit as low as possible, but we are already putting in place the necessary steps to return the service to balance in the next financial year.

Mixed-sex Wards

11. Tom Brake (Carshalton and Wallington) (LD): How many NHS trusts in England have hospitals with mixed-sex wards. [56301]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Caroline Flint): Some 97 per cent. of NHS trusts now provide single-sex accommodation. The Department does not collect information at the level of individual wards. The position of each NHS trust on this matter was published on 26 May 2005 and is available on the Department of Health website and in the Libraries.

Tom Brake: I thank the Minister for her response. Can she say exactly how many trusts are still affected? Can she say also how many patients have been through mixed-sex wards in the past 12 months? Can she comment further on why at Sutton hospital, nine years after the Government made their pledge, the work has still not been completed?

Caroline Flint: I will seek some detailed information, if it is available, on the hon. Gentleman's question. I understand that there are about three places in which there is still some work to be done to do with building. I understand from the strategic health authority that covers his area that work is being completed at the Epsom general hospital and elsewhere. It is hoped that there will be 100 per cent. compliance by the end of this year.

Readmission Rates

12. Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): What the readmission rate was for in-patients at acute general hospitals in England in the latest period for which information is available. [56302]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Liam Byrne): Information is collected only on the number of emergency readmissions, and on a PCT basis. The latest available data for the fourth quarter last year indicates a readmission rate of 6.7 per cent.

Mr. Hollobone: I have been contacted by a constituent who writes to say that in order to meet Government targets his daughter, who is a hospital ward manager, has been ordered to discharge patients against her recommendations when they are not ready. Many of these patients have had to be readmitted. Does the Minister share my concern over this news?

Mr. Byrne: If that is the case, I would share the hon. Gentleman's concern. I would be pleased if he were to write to me with the specifics so that I could investigate the matter further.

PCT Mergers

13. Philip Davies (Shipley) (Con): What steps are being taken to maximise public involvement in the merged primary care trusts. [56303]

The Secretary of State for Health (Ms Patricia Hewitt): It is important that public and patient involvement is not only retained but strengthened in the new PCTs. That is why I have been clear that strategic health authorities, when preparing their reports on the local consultations now under way, need to set out how the excellent work of many of the patient and public involvement forums will be safeguarded and developed in the new organisations.

Philip Davies: I thank the Secretary of State for that reply. The merger of PCTs in Bradford will clearly mean a reduction in the number of members of the public directly involved in decision making on health care provision throughout the district. Will the right hon. lady perhaps encourage the new PCT to adopt the excellent example set by the North Bradford PCT in having its own consumer council, which will enable the consumers' voice—the patients' voice—to be heard strongly?

Ms Hewitt: The hon. Gentleman is right. Where PCTs merge there will be fewer PPI forums in future, but that does not necessarily mean that there will be fewer people involved in them. The work of the consumer council, to which the hon. Gentleman referred, is a good example of the different ways in which it is possible to involve patients and users of services in decisions about how those services are improved in future. Harry Cayton, from within the Department, is leading an expert panel to examine the different ways in which we can promote exactly this sort of user involvement.

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware that at the public meeting on the reconfiguration of PCTs in my constituency about 300 people were packed into a room, and that there were about 100 or 150 people outside who could not get in? When she comes to evaluate the proposals put to her by the strategic health authority, will she bear in mind the overwhelming volume of public opinion in my area that favours a merger between the Waveney PCT and the Great Yarmouth PCT, which is backed by every strand of medical opinion locally?

Ms Hewitt: I compliment my hon. Friend, who has made a strong case on behalf of his constituents and the two local PCTs. Of course, the strategic health authority, in evaluating the consultation, will take account of all representations. I will consider the matter extremely carefully when the time comes to make a decision.

Telephone Charges (Hospitals)

15. Helen Jones (Warrington, North) (Lab): If she will make a statement on charges made to hospital patients for telephone calls. [56307]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Liam Byrne): Bedside telephones represent an enhanced service, providing additional choice for patients. Outgoing calls cost 10p per minute. Patients not wishing to use those services, which are made available at no cost to the NHS, remain free to use hospital payphones, as they have always been able to do in the past.

Helen Jones: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that reply, but what would he say to a constituent of mine, a pensioner, who found that she was being charged 49p per minute to ring to her husband in hospital via Patientline and was forced to listen to a minute of blurb from Patientline before she even got through? It was also costing her husband 20p before he got through to her. Does that not represent an exploitation of vulnerable people? Will the Minister issue some guidance to trusts on negotiating those contracts to ensure that patients are not exploited in this way?

Mr. Byrne: My hon. Friend raises an important point, which was highlighted by Ofcom recently. Partly as a result of that report, the Department of Health has set up a review group to explore the issue of costs to users of those systems, including the price of incoming calls. The first meeting of that group is today.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): The hon. Member for Warrington, North (Helen Jones) has raised an important matter, but what she failed to say is that if someone rings Patientline and listens to the two minutes of blurb but the patient is not there, they are still charged 49p a minute. It is outrageous. We do not need a review; we need that stopped.

Mr. Byrne: The hon. Gentleman makes an interesting point. However, market research shows that 72 per cent. of patients thought that the system offered good value for money—[Interruption.] As my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, North (Helen Jones) has pointed out, there are concerns, but it provides a service worth £150 million at no cost to the NHS. However, this is an issue that needs further consideration. That is why the review group has been set up.

Smoking

16. Meg Hillier (Hackney, South and Shoreditch) (Lab/Co-op): What steps the Government are taking to tackle smoking; and if she will make a statement. [56308]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Caroline Flint): A comprehensive tobacco control programme is in place to reduce smoking in England and I am pleased to say that we are making good progress. The current smoking rate—25 per cent. of adults—is the lowest on record, and indicates that the Government are on track to meet the target of 21 per cent. smoking prevalence by 2010.

Meg Hillier: In my constituency good work is going on and the primary care trust is trying to reduce smoking, the incidence of which is unfortunately above the national average with 31 per cent. of men and 25 per cent. of women lighting up. Can my hon. Friend give assurances to people in my constituency who suffer from heart disease and cancer—the two biggest killers in our borough—about the future of cancer and heart services at Barts hospital?

Caroline Flint: Of course we want to show the progress that we have made with cancer and heart treatment, and we want it to continue. However, prevention has an important role, rather than relying on treatment. We know that smoking is a killer. The more we can do to discuss services outside hospitals, and legislation to ban smoking in all enclosed public places, the more we will help with prevention. I hope that my hon. Friend will join me in campaigning in her constituency and elsewhere for prevention as well as treatment.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): Will the Minister join my campaign to ban smoking in prisons?

Caroline Flint: As the hon. Lady will be aware—I am sure she has followed the debate closely—some prisons, particularly young offenders institutions, already have a smoke-free policy. As I said during the debate on the Bill, we are in discussion with the Home Office on how we can balance the rights of individuals in their private space with a much more comprehensive smoke-free atmosphere in our prisons, for prisoners and staff. I shall be happy to discuss the issue with the hon. Lady at a later date.

Dental Services

17. Mr. Stephen Crabb (Preseli Pembrokeshire) (Con): If she will make a statement on NHS dentistry. [56309]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton): In the past two years we have invested an additional £250 million in NHS dentistry, recruited the equivalent of an extra 1,459 dentists and funded an additional 170 training places per year. From April, the NHS will implement major reforms, including devolving commissioning to local level and introducing new contracts for dentists.

Mr. Crabb: Last week, in a debate in the House, Members from across the country expressed concerns about the possible negative impact of the new NHS dental contract. Will the Minister promise to review the new contract if, as many people predict, it leads to a further exodus of dentists from the NHS?

Ms Winterton: I can assure the hon. Gentleman that all the early indications are that the vast majority of dentists will take up new contracts. None the less, I understand that there are big changes for dentists and I have written today to a number of organisations to announce that I intend to set up an implementation review group to look into how the changes are bedding down so that we can discuss their effects with all involved. However, as I have said, I believe that the deal will be a good one for dentists and for patients.

Mrs. Betty Williams (Conwy) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that the problems in NHS dentistry that we are experiencing in England and Wales are due to the previous contract, and that it needed to be reviewed? Does she agree that the closure of dental schools, too, was a cause of the problems that we face now?

Ms Winterton: I could not have put it better myself—but I shall try. My hon. Friend is right to say that immense problems were caused by the previous contract, and also by the cut in dental fees that the Conservatives introduced when they were in power. We have had to reverse the damage done by the Conservatives, which is why we are introducing a new contract that will take dentists off the drill-and-fill treadmill and allow them to spend more time with patients, for reasonable remuneration of £80,000 a year for a highly committed NHS dentist in return for a 5 per cent. lower work load, guaranteed for three years. As I said earlier, I believe that the vast majority of dentists will take up the new contract, but where they do not, it is now within the power of PCTs to recommission dentistry from other NHS dentists in the area.

Immigration (Work Permits)

3.31 pm

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab) (Urgent Question): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the new managed migration points system for work permit holders.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Charles Clarke): I am today publishing the Government's response to the recent consultation on a new points-based system for managed migration. This is being published as "A Points-Based System: Making Migration Work for Britain", and copies are available in the Library.

I am very pleased to be able to publish our detailed policies for a new managed migration system, which are a result of an intensive consultation process involving face-to-face contact with 1,200 stakeholders, as well as 517 written responses. The United Kingdom needs a world-class migration system to attract the brightest and best from across the world, while being robust against attempted abuse. The new system will give employers and educational institutions a stronger role in the managed migration system, and will introduce a more transparent and objective method of points-based structured decision making, which will significantly improve the quality of decision making and reduce the opportunities for abuse.

Keith Vaz: I thank my right hon. Friend for his statement and welcome the Government's attempts to simplify a complicated system. However, I remain gravely concerned that the new scheme will not address certain skills shortages in some areas—for example, chefs in south Asian restaurants. There are 10,000 south Asian restaurants in Britain, contributing £3.2 billion to the British economy, and there are 20,000 vacancies. The scheme will not address their problems. Today, the Home Secretary has also abolished the sector-based scheme for certain quotas. I welcome his commitment to EU labour markets, but the people coming to the UK under the EU enlargement process take employment in those areas for only a short period and then move on quickly, creating even longer periods for vacancies in the sector. Will my right hon. Friend give the House an assurance that there will be the longest possible transition time, that the scheme will be monitored carefully and that if there are any problems with it he will report them to the House immediately so that a new scheme can be instituted?

Mr. Clarke: As the House knows, I very much respect my hon. Friend's contribution on these matters and am keen to agree with him on the best way to introduce our proposals, but I have to say that on this narrow question I do not really agree with the substance of what he says. If there are skills shortages in the catering sector, and I certainly believe that there are—my personal catering adviser, Delia Smith, tells me that we are about 10,000 catering staff short—

David Davis (Haltemprice and Howden) (Con): Is that the right hon. Gentleman personally?

Mr. Clarke: No. Personally, I am well looked after from the catering point of view, including in south Asian restaurants in my constituency.

On a more serious level, there is an important issue to address—skills development for catering. Centres for vocational excellence, including those in my constituency, are doing some strong work on that. The correct route, if there are skills shortages in south Asian catering, is to invest in skills development in that sector. I said so in Leicester some time ago to develop that precise area. We will of course monitor the situation closely, as my hon. Friend suggests, and we will do our best to make sure that if problems arise they are dealt with, which is why the skills base panel will assess the need for skills throughout the sector.

Damian Green (Ashford) (Con): As I live next door to a south Asian restaurant in my constituency, I am tempted to stick to the fairly narrow point made by the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz), but we should widen the discussion. We welcome the principle of a points-based system for economic migration. We have been calling for one for some time because we believe that a firm, fair, controlled immigration system is best for people who want to come here and best for people who already live here.

The introduction of the new system is an implicit admission that the current system has failed. The Government have no control over our borders and no proper information about the most basic facts and figures. For instance, they thought that about 13,000 people would come here from the new EU member states, but in fact 200,000 come here every year. They also have a history of grand announcements on immigration, such as the plan to remove 30,000 failed asylum seekers a year, which win a day's headlines but are then quietly dropped. I hope that the new system will be an improvement, but I wish to ask the Secretary of State a few helpful questions. First, what is the cost of setting up and running the system—or at least the current Home Office estimate? Does he agree with his predecessor, who said that there was "no obvious upper limit" to immigration into this country? If not, is the new system designed to increase or reduce the numbers coming here to work? Under tier 3 of the system, which applies to low-skilled migration, the document says that there have been concerns that employers should be required to recruit from the domestic labour force first. Do the Government intend to enforce that requirement?

At the heart of the system is the skills advisory board, which decides how many people can come in under tiers 2 and 3. Why are the Government only considering the skills aspect, which means that other vital factors, such as the increased need for new houses and extra pressures on public services, will not be taken into account? There is no discussion of those absolutely central issues in the document. Why not? We may know the answer to that question. There is much common ground on the principles. We all want a civilised and credible immigration system, but there are serious questions about the plan. We wish it well, and we hope it does not go the way of previous failed Government immigration policies. This country needs a properly controlled immigration system and we will support measures that genuinely bring that about.

Mr. Clarke: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's best wishes, and I congratulate him on abandoning "Fantasy Island" policies, including withdrawal from the United Nations refugee convention and the absolute ceiling on numbers, both of which were authored by his right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) in the Conservative manifesto at the last election. As for the points made by the hon. Gentleman, the cost will be subject to a tendering process, which is exactly the right way for any Government to proceed. As for whether the measure will increase or reduce the number of people, it is important to acknowledge—I think that the hon. Gentleman does so in his article in The Observer—that migration to work and migration to study are important to our economy and society, so we should welcome and encourage them. Illegal migration, however, is not acceptable, which is why the system is in place.

On the proposal that employers should be required to recruit from the domestic work force first, our straightforward position is that we encourage people to work, both from this country and from the European Union. If people come from outside that area to work, they should do so on the basis of this country's national priorities. It is therefore right to set skills as the top issue. It is because skills are absent in this country that we need to say that we should draw in people with the skills to fill the gaps. That is why the skills advisory board plays an important role. It does not decide what happens in tiers 2 and 3 but, none the less, it is an important advisory board.

Mr. Andrew Smith (Oxford, East) (Lab): Can my right hon. Friend say more about the basis and procedure for determining what counts as a skills shortage? In relation to his argument that we ought to be training people in the United Kingdom to fill vacancies, does not that argument apply equally to all areas of skills shortage? Can he therefore give me an assurance that south Asian catering workers—would-be chefs—will be treated no less favourably than anyone else?

Mr. Clarke: I can give my right hon. Friend that assurance, and I agree with him completely. We should look at skills in the round, and if there are particular sectors where there are skills shortages, for example, south Asian chefs—I cite that example because our hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz) raised it—that is the area where we need to develop the skills capacity to deal with it. In his role in developing skills in the economy over recent years, my right hon. Friend made a major contribution in that regard. It is precisely because that work has been done that we can, in the document published today, talk about a skills advisory body based on that knowledge, which enables us to take it forward. That is the central issue that we must address, as we will do. It is important that we monitor it throughout because the way in which the skills advisory bodies will work is based on the sector skills councils, each of which has an analysis for its sector of the strengths and weaknesses of labour supply in its part of the economy. That will inform the judgments that are made about migration into the UK and points to be allocated on that basis.

Mr. Nick Clegg (Sheffield, Hallam) (LD): I, too, on behalf of Liberal Democrat colleagues give a cautious welcome to the announcement. Anything that takes the politics out of the immigration system and introduces a degree of objectivity to a system that has too long been plagued by subjectivity and arbitrary criteria is welcome. However, I have questions about two aspects. If I had been longer in my present position, I would probably have a longer list of question, but as I have not been, my questions are blissfully short. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] I thought that might elicit a positive response in all parts of the House.

First, the credibility of the system will necessarily hinge on the operation of the skills advisory board. Could the Home Secretary provide more detail on the composition of the board? An assumption has been made in the past that employers' organisations, trade unions, the public sector and the private sector would all be represented. The composition of the board is essential to ensure the right balance in an assessment of skills. Is it the right hon. Gentleman's expectation that the skills advisory board would try to pin down quotas—a specific quantification—for the skills in each sector? If so, that would have a great effect on the operation of the new system.

The second aspect on which I seek clarification is the effect that the system will have on the immigration of unskilled labour. If the purpose is to make the immigration of skilled labour more organised, we hope that that will not have an unduly restrictive and punitive effect on sectors that still need unskilled labour. In certain parts of the country fruit pickers are short of unskilled labour and, as we saw in Morecambe Bay last year, excessive amounts of unskilled labour going under the radar would lead to exploitative behaviour by employers.

Mr. Clarke: First, I welcome the hon. Gentleman to his role. The longer he is in the role, the shorter his questions will be, in contrast to the way some parties operate. I look forward to working with him.

On politics and subjectivity, we will never remove politics from this area of national life, but I agree that objectivity and transparency in the system are exceptionally important. The system is intended to raise the quality of decisions. I hope that we can work together to ensure that the national debate on these matters is conducted in constructive and positive terms, rather than in the terms in which it has sometimes been conducted in the past.

On the hon. Gentleman's particular questions, the skills advisory board will be directly related to the sector skills councils and therefore the Sector Skills Development Agency, which organises and develops those councils. It will also directly involve trade unions and business in a wide variety of sectors that will report directly to the board. I think that many hon. Members are still not fully aware of the developing role of sector skills councils and the way in which they are drawing in employers, vocational trainers and employees in each area. As they develop their work, they will be able to give detailed assessments of the skills shortages in their sectors. That is unlikely to lead to quotas in the sense of specific numbers, but it is likely to lead to information that will help the system to decide how many points should be allocated to people with particular skills in certain areas.

That, too, will be the principle on the unskilled labour side, which will particularly inform tier 3 of our five-tier system. It will address the lack of skills in those sectors just as in all the others. As a former Secretary of State for Education and Skills, I would say that the right response to unskilled labour is to develop the quality of our skills training across the whole range.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich) (Lab): Will the Home Secretary, in conjunction with the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, take a hard look at employment agencies that are recruiting and importing large numbers of workers from eastern European states, exploiting them by charging them for every conceivable service, leaving them with very little of their own money, and suggesting that there is an enormous pool of unskilled jobs to be filled in the United Kingdom? That is not in anyone's interests and does this country's reputation enormous harm.

Mr. Clarke: I am rather shocked to say it, but I agree with every word of my hon. Friend's remarks.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I will not tell anyone.

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend is notable for her reticence, so I am sure that we can be confident that nobody will discover this unaccustomed level of agreement.

It has been a scandal in many parts of our national life that people have been able to work illegally in a system where people are drawn in from across the world to work in the most appalling and exploitative circumstances. My hon. Friend is right to say that that needs to be addressed. It was a central theme of the five-year strategy that we published last year. The gangmaster legislation has also been important in this regard, and we have published proposals jointly with the Department of Trade and Industry, the TUC and the CBI. The system is working better now, and we have had a significant number of arrests and convictions in precisely the areas that my hon. Friend describes. However, she is entitled to press still harder to ensure that we enforce the existing law in the most rigorous way. As she suggests, there is still a long way to go.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry) (Con): The Home Secretary will be aware of the importance attached by large areas of the agricultural and, in particular, horticultural industries to the role of unskilled seasonal workers in the harvesting of perishable crops. Can he assure me that those arrangements, which have worked successfully under the seasonal agricultural workers scheme, will not be materially affected by his proposals?

Mr. Clarke: I cannot give that absolute assurance. I have discussed the matter at length with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, and we have agreed that by 2010 the scheme that the hon. Gentleman mentions would be wound up and the system that applies everywhere else would be in operation. I can give him the assurance that he seeks until 2010—[Interruption.] I am advised that we will not be in government then, to which I would say, "Wait and see." Beyond that, I can give the hon. Gentleman the assurance that we continue to monitor the situation closely in conjunction with the farming communities and the agricultural industry, and that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs and her colleagues keep it under review.

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington) (Lab): The whole House welcomes the Government's efforts to improve the system and to bear down on abuse. However, I return to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East. The south Asian restaurant sector, which is only tiny, has the particular problem that even top-quality chefs on the sub-continent are unlikely to have paper qualifications the like of which this scheme turns on. Equally, they are less likely to be in large sector-based organisations to make their case. All that we asking is that the Government pay particular attention to that sector so that our Indian, Thai and Chinese restaurateurs may be assured that the Government understand the significance of their sector and the contribution that they make to the quality of life in our big cities.

Mr. Clarke: I can give two assurances. First, the Government understand the importance of the sector. My hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East gave some important figures about the economic contribution of its members to the economy. It is fair to say that that contribution is not only to our economy, but to the breadth of our society and culture. I therefore give the assurance that my hon. Friend seeks and stress that we will continue to monitor the position closely. The real answer is investment in people in this country to develop their skills. The Government are committed to making that happen.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. May I say to the Home Secretary that I know that he is trying to make eye contact with the questioner, but it means that he loses contact with microphone?

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): The House, I am sure, applauded the Home Secretary's comment about the need, in the first case, to train people locally. In the light of the quadrupling of the number of work permits since the Government took office, from approximately 40,000 a year to about 160,000, will he answer the question of my hon. Friend the Member for Ashford (Damian Green) about what that means for overall numbers?

Mr. Clarke: I am delighted to have eye contact with the hon. Gentleman. I cannot and will not answer the question because it derives from a proposition that, somehow, migration to work and study here is undesirable. I do not accept that. If one were to talk to people from many sectors of the economy, they would say that they welcome and need migration. I accept that it is necessary to tackle illegal migration and people who try to evade the system in various ways. The new system is designed to address that. It does not signpost a specific number—up or down—of people who migrate here to work or study. One of the reasons for the country's opposition to Conservative party policy at the general election was that people clearly understood that one could not simply pick some arbitrary number, but that the system had to be run well and effectively. The proposals are designed to achieve that.

Mr. Neil Gerrard (Walthamstow) (Lab): The Home Office expects the largest number of people who come here to do so under tier 2. The document states:

"Applicants will need to have a job offer from an employer who is registered with the Home Office on a list of approved sponsors".

How will that system of approving sponsors work? One could envisage many small organisations and companies, such as the restaurants that have already been mentioned, wanting to bring in a skilled employee. I hope that the system will be neither bureaucratic nor without an appeal mechanism for someone who is refused inclusion on the list of approved sponsors.

Mr. Clarke: I can strongly assure my hon. Friend that the proposal is not intended to be bureaucratic. Indeed, the reverse is true. We want to work in partnership—perhaps a new word for the Home Office in the context that we are considering—with large and small employers and universities, who ask people to come here to study and get much of their business from it, to administer and run the system in a non-bureaucratic way, thus resolving many of the problems of people needing to extend or change matters, sometimes using 80 different lists of migration routes into the country. I give my hon. Friend an absolute assurance that we will guard against a bureaucratic approach and work with large and small employers to make the system work effectively.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): Does the Home Secretary accept that there must be some limit on the overall number of economic migrants every year because of the pressure on water resources, transport capacity, housing and land, or will he tell us how those problems can be solved so that we can have unlimited economic migration?

Mr. Clarke: A similar argument could be made for limiting by state diktat the number of people born every year. The country will operate on the basis of the number of economically active people who are in this country. Migrants fall into that category and they should and will contribute to the country's economic development, rather than the opposite. I know that the right hon. Gentleman acknowledges that that is the case in general. I hope that he agrees that our focus should be to stamp out abuse of the system rather than simply stopping people migrating here.

Mr. George Mudie (Leeds, East) (Lab): Speaking as one who represents an inner-city seat in Leeds, may I offer the Home Secretary a warm welcome for his proposals? I also congratulate the Home Office on the extent of the consultation that has taken place on these measures. In the document, it is suggested that applicants will start at the first tier and move through the tiers. Will the Home Secretary tell the House how long it might take someone to go through that process and finish the scheme? What will happen to applications in the meantime?

Mr. Clarke: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his support. I know that, from his knowledge of Leeds—one of the great cities to have benefited from migration over the years—he will agree with what we are trying to achieve. We envisage a time scale of between 18 months and two years for implementing the whole process. We will simply go through the process stage by stage, steadily implementing the proposals, if they get the support that will enable them to be carried through in every part of the country, as I believe they will.

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): Does the Home Secretary acknowledge that no sane plan can work unless we curb the activities of illegal gangmasters, snakeheads and organisations such as 14K? Does he also acknowledge that that will require better security and intelligence at our regional ports and airports?

Mr. Clarke: The House will be shocked to hear that I agree that the activities of gangmasters and snakeheads are antisocial and should be driven out. The answer to the hon. Gentleman's question is that we will go through this whole approach policing rigorously the system to deal with organised crime. As I said to my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), measures to deal with people trafficking are a central priority in the system, and we shall carry that proposal through.

Mr. John McFall (West Dunbartonshire) (Lab/Co-op): The Governor of the Bank of England, among others, has stated that immigrant labour has been essential to maintaining the buoyancy of our economy. Will the Home Secretary ensure that those workers who come here and make a contribution can stay for as long as possible? Will he also take the opportunity to work with vice-chancellors to ensure that people from China and India who can provide graduate skills can stay here, perhaps using a similar system to the American green card, to make a contribution to our economy?

Mr. Clarke: Yes, I can give my right hon. Friend that assurance, provided that the contribution continues to be made. The important thing for everyone who migrates here is that they should continue to make a contribution. Working together with businesses and universities is the best thing for us to do, because they are best able to guarantee that that contribution is being made.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale) (Con): As the Home Secretary knows, the Council of Europe Migration Committee, on which I am happy to serve, is looking at these issues in considerable detail. I warmly welcome what he has said—these are some of the most challenging issues for the Government, and it represents a great step forward that we have all-party consensus on these proposals. I particularly agree with the comments of the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody). Sadly, there is a great deal of evidence of abuse of migrant workers, not only irregular migrants but those who are here legally. Will the Home Secretary give the House an assurance that, across Government, those abuses will not be tolerated, and that these people will be given the welcome that they deserve?

Mr. Clarke: First, may I pay my respects to the work that the hon. Gentleman has done in this field? I strongly agree that achieving cross-party consensus on this matter is the best way to proceed, and I am grateful for what he said on that. I can absolutely give him the assurance that he seeks. I had a press briefing earlier today with the TUC and the CBI, both of which are utterly committed, with the Government, to maintaining precisely the civilised standards of employment that are a requirement that should operate for everyone in this country. I acknowledge, as I did to my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs Dunwoody), the fact that there remains a great deal of work to be done in this area. However, we are all committed to moving in the same direction.

Gwyn Prosser (Dover) (Lab): I want to add my welcome to the new proposals, not least because they will enable us to crack down on the abuse of the immigration system in this country, just as past and present measures have enabled us to crack down on the abuse of our asylum system. The new proposals will involve the reintroduction of embarkation controls, which the Tories abandoned in 1994. How does my right hon. Friend propose to reintroduce embarkation measures in busy ferry ports such as Dover without interrupting the essential flow of traffic and people?

Mr. Clarke: There are two things to say about this. The first is that one of the effects of the scheme will be that it will be much easier to make applications internationally, so that many people seeking to enter the country who might previously have arrived at Dover will not need to go anywhere near it, because they will already know where they stand, the decision having been properly made in the country from which they come. The second, more substantive, answer to my hon. Friend's question is that our e-borders proposals, which we have already published, and the development of biometric documentation will enable us to address these questions at ports such as Dover much more effectively.

Stewart Hosie (Dundee, East) (SNP): I warmly welcome the move to a points-based migration system. Paragraph 111 states that the UK skills advisory body will publish "a Scotland-wide Shortage Occupation List."

Given the recognition of specific problems in Scotland and the comments published by CBI Scotland, would it not make more sense for the Scottish shortage occupation list to be developed fully by the Scottish Parliament? Will the Home Secretary consider that during the passage of any legislation?

Mr. Clarke: If the hon. Gentleman is suggesting, as I think he is, that we should change the law to devolve migration issues to Scotland, I am afraid that I cannot agree. We believe, I think rightly, that this is a UK-wide issue. I am glad to say, however, that we are working closely with our colleagues in the Scottish Executive. We consider its fresh talent initiative to be a positive contribution that sits within the frame of the document. However, I think that it would be a grave mistake to establish key labour-market issues simply on a Scotland-England, or indeed a Scotland-England-Wales, basis. It should be done on a UK basis, and we will ensure that that continues.

Dr. Phyllis Starkey (Milton Keynes, South-West) (Lab): I share many of the concerns raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz), among others, about the effect of the scheme on south Asian restaurants. The Home Secretary seems to be suggesting that the problem will be solved by the provision of more training, but Milton Keynes has a dynamic local economy in which plenty of other jobs are available, providing much more attractive hours and conditions than those in the catering trade. I fear that if the supply of labour from the sub-continent is not allowed to continue many restaurants in my city will close, to the detriment of those in my constituency, including me, who enjoy them as part of a range of restaurants there. Will my right hon. Friend assure me that he will keep the matter under review and will be able to act quickly if the fears raised by my hon. Friend and others prove to be justified?

Mr. Clarke: I can certainly give that assurance. As I said in answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz), we will indeed keep the matter under close review. As I have said, however, what we want in all our productive industry—including the service industry, which involves catering—are high skills, high wages and high productivity. That is what we should seek to achieve, in those sectors as well as others. Individual businesses and shops that keep going on a basis of low skills, low productivity and low pay do not represent the future of this country in the most effective way. That is why I have returned consistently to a central theme of the points-based system, namely, the skills basis for assessment of skills shortages.

That said, I accept my hon. Friend's point completely. We certainly do not want to cause serious damage to a very important sector of the country's economy and society. That is why we will keep the matter under close review.

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): Given the new responsibilities that the policy will place on Her Majesty's diplomatic service, will the Home Secretary be having words with his colleagues in the Foreign Office to stop the closure of British diplomatic missions and embassies across the world?

Mr. Clarke: We have worked extremely closely with our colleagues in the Foreign Office, and I have discussed the issue with my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary on a number of occasions. The main agency, UKvisas, is a Foreign Office agency, but works closely with the Home Office in providing a service throughout the world.

I was in some north African countries last week, discussing precisely this question. It is possible to outsource some of the work in certain circumstances. It is also possible, by means of the distance approaches established by the points-based system, for many applications to be made online in a very direct way. My answer to the hon. Gentleman's question is yes—we will continue to work closely with the Foreign Office to ensure that the service is available as widely as possible.

Small and Medium-Sized Enterprises (Exemption from Regulation)

4.3 pm

Nick Herbert (Arundel and South Downs) (Con): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to exempt small and medium-sized enterprises from regulation; and for connected purposes.

Small business makes an immense contribution to the economy. Small enterprises—those with fewer than 50 employees—make up over 99 per cent. of all businesses and half all employment. As the economy moves toward higher, value-added activity, the share of it taken by small firms will only grow, so the weight of regulation now pressing on small businesses and hindering their wealth creation is an issue for us all. The Better Regulation Commission has estimated that the total cost of regulation facing the economy is now some £150 billion. The Hampton review found that national regulators alone send out 2.6 million forms a year.

Inevitably, this burden falls disproportionately on small businesses. Large companies are able to employ people to deal with regulation; small businesses simply do not have that option. Academics from the London School of Economics have found that regulatory costs per employee are five times higher for small firms than for larger ones, that small employers spend five times as many hours per employee dealing with regulation, and that they spend almost 5 per cent. of their annual turnover on compliance. Equally, the Federation of Small Businesses has shown that the administration of pay-as-you-earn costs a business with fewer than five employees £288 per employee per year, yet for a firm with 5,000 employees, the cost is just £5 per employee. The Government's Carter review concluded that "there is no doubt that the weight of payroll obligations falls disproportionately on small businesses".

Other regulations of particular concern to small businesses include the quarterly VAT return, the very frequent inquiry forms from Government Departments and the Office for National Statistics, and the new employment regulations, of which there have been 17 since 1997. The growing weight of regulation strongly suggests that the deregulation efforts of successive Governments have not been sufficient. Over the last two decades, the Enterprise and Deregulation Unit has been replaced by the Better Regulation Task Force, which, in turn, has been replaced by the Better Regulation Commission, but still the red tape has grown. The Regulatory Reform Act 2001 has had less than half the predicted impact; the total cost of regulation has increased by 50 per cent. in less than nine years. The Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill now before the House does not actually refer to deregulation. My hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) tabled an amendment to it proposing "specific provision to reduce the regulatory impact on small businesses where appropriate".

I regret that his amendment did not pass, which helped to persuade me that an entirely new approach is needed.

My Bill would confront the problem of regulation in three ways. First, it would give Ministers a duty to consider alternatives to, and exemptions from, existing regulations affecting small and medium-sized firms, and a power to create those exemptions. Secondly, because the impact of regulation on microbusinesses—those with nine employees or fewer and an average annual turnover of just £130,000—is particularly disproportionate, the Bill would create a presumption that microbusinesses are exempted from any future regulation. That would protect over 4 million businesses from future regulation. Thirdly, in respect of all future regulations the Bill would impose a statutory requirement to carry out a regulatory impact assessment—surprisingly, that is not a current requirement—and to consider alternatives to regulation in doing so.

Many precedents already exist in terms of exempting small businesses from legislation. There are small business exemptions of one kind or another relating to tax and VAT returns, statutory audit requirements, trade union and employee representation, stakeholder pensions and Sunday opening hours. Other developed countries have also adopted the practice of exempting small businesses from regulation. Last year, France deregulated firms with fewer than 20 employees in order to encourage higher youth employment. In Italy and Germany, there are small business exemptions relating to statutory audit requirements, and trade union and employee representation. There are also numerous examples of small business exemptions in many states of the United States of America.

This idea would be popular with businesses themselves. Last year, a Federation of Small Businesses survey found that 80 per cent. of small businesses support regulatory exemptions for the sector. The federation is in favour of the principle of exempting small businesses from regulation wherever possible, and it is particularly supportive of the idea of placing a duty on Ministers to consider alternatives to regulation. However, it is not just commercial enterprises that would benefit. Small charities, which often rely on voluntary help, find coping with regulation particularly difficult. My right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) has proposed social enterprise zones with lower regulation, in order to assist in the development of the voluntary bodies that can play such an important part in delivering support to our most deprived communities.

The Bill is a balanced measure that would not automatically abolish existing regulations for small and medium-sized businesses such as those affecting the rights of disabled people in the workplace, or, indeed, other employment rights. It would simply give Ministers a duty to consider alternatives to regulation, and suitable exemptions. They would then have a power to create such exemptions, subject to proper parliamentary approval. Similarly, in relation to microbusinesses, Ministers and Parliament would still be able to override the presumption of exemption from regulation if they so wished.

The idea of exploring alternatives to regulation is simply to ask whether its benign objectives could be achieved by other means. For example, we should be anxious to maintain strong standards of health and safety, but we should be ready to examine whether they could be achieved through insurance mechanisms for the smallest firms, where the risk to employees is low.

It might be argued that the Bill would create a disincentive for businesses to expand. The Better Regulation Commission considered that question and concluded that there was little evidence to support it. I believe that we should be looking to reduce the regulatory burden on all businesses, but the disproportionate impact on small businesses justifies special measures to help them.

The Prime Minister has argued that "excessive regulation ... impairs wealth creation as well as corroding welfare."

The Chancellor has said that much current regulation is "ridiculous", but words are not enough. As CBI deputy director general John Cridland says in a letter to The Times today,

"What business asks is that we begin delivering on deregulatory promises from all parties."

If we are going to be serious about lifting the regulatory burden, a new settlement is needed, creating a presumption of deregulation for the smallest businesses, placing the burden of proof on the regulator, while maintaining proper parliamentary scrutiny of the process. That is the purpose of this Bill.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Nick Herbert, Mr. Richard Benyon, James Brokenshire, Greg Clark, Mr. David Gauke, Mr. Greg Hands, Mr. Adam Holloway, Mr. Nick Hurd, and Mr. Shailesh Vara.

SMALL AND MEDIUM-SIZED ENTERPRISES (EXEMPTION FROM REGULATION)

Nick Herbert accordingly presented a Bill to exempt small and medium-sized enterprises from regulation; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 16 June, and to be printed [Bill 140].

Merchant Shipping (Pollution) Bill [Lords] (Programme)

4.12 pm

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): I beg to move,

That the Order of 25th January 2006 (Merchant Shipping (Pollution) Bill [Lords] (Programme)) be varied as follows:

1. Paragraphs 4 and 5 of the Order shall be omitted.

2. Proceedings on consideration shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion two hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion for this Order.

Proceedings on Third Reading shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion three hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion for this Order.

Given the expedient way that we dealt with this Bill in Committee, I have no doubt that we can do equally well in the two hours that we have allowed for the small number of amendments selected, and the hour for Third Reading.

4.13 pm

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): I share the Minister's confidence, but want to put on the record that it is an extraordinary testimony to the Government's control-freak tendencies that we should have a programme motion when there is so little business to get through. However, I do not oppose it.

Question put and agreed to.

Orders of the Day

Merchant Shipping (Pollution) Bill [Lords]

As amended in the Committee, considered

New Clause 1

REPORT ON BREACHES OF ANNEX VI

'The Secretary of State shall publish and lay before Parliament annually a report listing breaches of Annex VI of the MARPOL Convention that have taken place in United Kingdom waters and the action that was taken in respect of those breaches.'.—[Paul Rowen.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

4.13 pm

Paul Rowen (Rochdale) (LD): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With this it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 5, in page 3, line 2, clause 2, after 'ships)', insert

'and any subsequent review of Annex VI agreed by the International Maritime Organisation subject to an order in Council laid before and approved by resolution of each House of Parliament.'.

Paul Rowen: Annex VI of the MARPOL convention extends pollution control of shipping to include air pollution for the first time. Although it is admitted that pollution from ships is small compared with other sources—with 4 per cent. of sulphur dioxide emissions and 7 per cent. of nitrogen oxide emissions—it nevertheless has a significant effect on our environment.

Aside from the Malacca straits, the waters around the UK are the busiest in the world. It is predicted that by 2020, the size of the merchant fleet will have doubled and the size of ships is steadily increasing. It is also estimated that the provisions contained in the annex will save £3 million a year in damage to buildings and structures from $SO_2$ emissions, and the reduction in ozone emissions will result in 20 fewer deaths and savings of £26 million a year.

I am pleased, therefore, to see in the draft copies of the secondary legislation that have been placed in the Library the adoption of the North sea as an $SO_2$ emission control area. That will involve more stringent controls on sulphur emissions, with a reduction to 1.5 per cent., compared to 4.5 per cent. in other areas. Those controls were discussed and agreed by the Marine Environment Protection Committee at its 53rd session in July 2005. Given past concerns on pollution in the North sea, and the fact that air pollution knows no boundaries, I am pleased to see those limits adopted.

Some 23 states have already adopted the annex and I hope that more will do so. All UK ships have to have an international air pollution prevention certificate and other ships in UK waters that have adopted the annex must also have one. The purpose of the amendment is to ensure that there is an annual reporting mechanism for breaches of the convention and action is taken. I know that concerns have been expressed in previous debates about flagships that have not adopted the annex, and while I appreciate that we cannot control those breaches, we need to ensure that appropriate action is taken against all ships that have signed up to the agreement but do not meet its controls. The new clause seeks to introduce a regular reporting mechanism so that Members can see what progress is being made in what is a first for shipping—the introduction of controls on air pollution.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): The official Opposition have little problem with new clause 1. The MARPOL convention is a cornerstone of international maritime regulations and we welcome being provided with more information on it. We should remember that shipping is arguably the greenest method of transport. In ball-park terms, goods going by sea in a typical bulk carrier cause one tenth the emissions of $CO_2$ of an equivalent crate of goods going by land. Abiding by the MARPOL convention will make that difference even greater.

The publication of the report will add an incentive to ensure inspections are carried out regularly and will essentially name and shame any offenders. I hope that the convention will also encourage shipping companies to follow the example I gave on Second Reading of P&O's The Pride of Kent—I approve of the name, as I am sure does the Minister, given that he represents South Thanet—which has seen its sulphur emissions slashed to zero and its nitrogen oxide emissions down by four fifths since the introduction of a newly invented water scrubber. The more technology is encouraged in this area, the faster we will see our emissions fall.

As far as I can tell, the hon. Member for Rochdale (Paul Rowen) has got into a bit of a muddle with amendment No. 5. The intention is to ensure that revisions to the treaty cannot be incorporated without an Order in Council following a debate in the House. That is not, in fact, what the amendment would do.

The advice that I have been given is that the amendment would allow the Government to amend the treaty without recourse to a full Bill. I see the Minister nods in agreement. When even the Government who proposed the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill, which is designed to bypass parliamentary scrutiny on a range of issues, do not require further extra parliamentary powers on this issue, I am strongly disinclined to give such a power. I cannot believe that that is what the hon. Gentleman intended, and I am certain that he will not want to press the amendment to a vote.

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Rochdale (Paul Rowen) for his interest in the Bill, and I assure him that I understand what he is trying to get at. The Government take every bit as seriously as he does the need to enforce the national legislation that implements the MARPOL convention and its annexes.

We take any breach of the MARPOL convention very seriously. Of course, when we find that someone has breached the convention, we prosecute them, and information on all successful prosecutions are put on the Maritime and Coastguard Agency's website. What the hon. Gentleman is asking the Government to do in the new clause represents a disproportionate response—we are already doing what he suggests. It would be much more efficient if those people who were interested in such information simply referred to the MCA website, where successful prosecution are always listed. Of course, unsuccessful prosecutions, where they do occur, would not be listed there. However, since 1997, no such prosecution has been unsuccessful. With the reassurance that the information is put in the public domain, that we take all breaches seriously and that we will ensure that they continue to be put in the public domain, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will agree that making another report to Parliament would not be a good use of resources and therefore that he will be happy to withdraw the motion.

The hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier), who is my parliamentary constituency neighbour, was absolutely right about amendment No. 5. I obviously do not know what was in the mind of the hon. Member for Rochdale when he proposed the amendment, but it would make it unnecessary for us to introduce primary legislation to implement any future revision of annex VI of the MARPOL convention. I certainly do not want to quarrel with his aim in any way at all—I certainly would not want that to be done by primary legislation—but he is probably not aware that, by virtue of clause 2, an entry for the protocol that adds annex VI to MARPOL is inserted in the list of agreements covered by section 128(1) of the Merchant Shipping Act 1995. Consequently, the amendment is redundant, because the Bill—in combination with the 1995 Act—will achieve the required effect. I hope therefore that the hon. Gentleman will be happy not to press the amendment to a vote.

Paul Rowen: I should like to respond to a couple of the points that have been made. The Minister rightly says that successful cases are published. My noble Friend Lord Bradshaw quoted some statistics when speaking in the other place to show that there were about 500 instances of pollution from ships in UK waters last year, yet only 10 of them went to court. Obviously, we are dealing with a new issue—airborne emissions, which have not been subject to controls previously. I will happily withdraw the motion, following the Minister's assurance, but in proposing the new clause, I was seeking to ensure that there would be some measurement of the extent of pollution and the number of pollution cases that were successfully brought to a conclusion.

With regard to amendment No. 5, the National Environment Protection Council at its 53rd session in July last year agreed that there would be a review of the nitrogen oxide technical code of annex VI, with a view to taking account of revisions and improvements in technology, further to reduce emissions from ships, including particulate matter, and to look at extending emission controls to ships adopting fuels alternative to diesel. That will result in a report in 2007, and as the Minister says that he already has the enabling legislation to let a revision be adopted after that report, I am happy to beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 1

POWER TO GIVE EFFECT TO REVISIONS OF THE INTERNATIONAL ARRANGEMENTS RELATING TO COMPENSATION FOR OIL POLLUTION FROM SHIPS

Mr. Brazier: I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 1, line 9, at end insert—

'(c) "international agreement" means any agreement adopted by the International Maritime Organisation.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 2, in page 2, line 26, at end insert—

'(e) make such provision only in concordance with an international agreement.'.

Mr. Brazier: When the sacred chickens failed to eat their grain and give Appius Claudius Pulcher the omens he desired when commanding the Roman fleet against the Carthaginians, he had them thrown into the sea, proclaiming, "Let them drink if they will not eat." I say that not just to suggest that he might have made a good new Labour Cabinet Minister, but to remind people that discharges of one kind of another go back a long way.

The amendments are intended to prevent the use of the wide powers delegated to the Minister by Orders in Council under the Bill to incorporate EU directive 2005/35/EC into British law, or indeed to prevent future Governments from having the ability to incorporate into law by secondary legislation any international treaty that does not enjoy the blessing of the International Maritime Organisation.

There are two issues. First, the directive is highly dangerous to our maritime interests. Secondly, the Conservatives, and much of the shipping industry, from the British Chamber of Shipping to the unions, are strongly opposed to the development of regional agreements instead of proper, IMO-approved international ones. I am aware that the Government are themselves suspicious of the directive, and I am sure that I will receive reassurances in a moment from the Minister that the Government have no intention of adopting it. The amendments are intended to ensure, however, that no future Government—we may have a less maritime-friendly Minister in post at some point—can misuse the term "international agreement" to apply to an agreement between member states of the EU alone.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): I am glad my hon. Friend has tabled these amendments. Is not the danger of the EU directive that it introduces the concept of serious negligence? Conservatives believe that people should not be prosecuted for something that they did not intend to do.

Mr. Brazier: Indeed. My hon. Friend is exactly right and echoes the lengthy debate we had on that matter in Committee. We are not allowed to cover exactly the same ground on Report, and Mr. Deputy Speaker would rightly restrain me from doing so, but my hon. Friend is right to say that one of the problems with the directive is that it suggests that criminal sanctions should be brought against people guilty neither of intentional discharge nor of reckless disregard in that matter.

[Mr. Brazier]

For the benefit of Members unaware of issues behind the amendments, I may say that the European Commission passed the directive last year, and it seeks to criminalise the accidental discharge of oil in the way mentioned by my hon. Friend in cases of "serious negligence". That term is so far undefined in law but major shipping companies fear it will be interpreted strictly, as has already started to happen in France, where it has already been incorporated into law. The consequences of including it in UK law would be grave. Hans van Rooij, president of the International Salvage Union, representing the salvage boats that act as the last line of defence against the kind of catastrophic pollution for which the Bill seeks to compensate, said:

"If a directive introduces the 'serious negligence' concept, salvers will have no choice but to seek immunity before intervening in the waters of EU states with a reputation for aggressive behaviour in maritime accident situations."

That is surely an unintended consequence.

The directive would have a serious negative effect on rescue efforts when ships sink in EU waters and create considerably more pollution in the event of an accident than the Bill will ever prevent. It would also undermine the Government's effort to recruit and retain merchant seamen. Indeed, a joint press release from a coalition of interested parties, which includes the largest cargo and tanker firms, Lloyd's of London and the International Salvage Union, declared:

"The Directive already has had a detrimental effect on the morale of seamen, and this will have adverse implications for the retention and recruitment of high quality crews."

4.30 pm

The directive is particularly worrying because it involves one region unilaterally making maritime law without reference to the rest of the world, which is our second objection. One of the most impressive changes to the international shipping regime in the past 50 years has been the international nature of the laws and treaties implemented by flag states around the world. There is broad agreement that, if we want to criminalise or discourage certain activities, the correct forum in which to do so is the International Maritime Organisation and that the correct method is a genuinely international treaty.

The directive affects only the European Union, and consultation has taken place only within the European Union. Both the UK and the European Union are lobbying hard to persuade the United States to stop acting unilaterally and to join major international treaties, but I fear that we would have no credibility in such lobbying if we were to act unilaterally, which is why we support the amendment. We would like reassurance that the Bill cannot be used to slip that unpopular directive or some part of it through the back door.

We would also like to know whether the only use of the royal prerogative permitted by the Bill is to implement genuinely international treaties—in other words, treaties approved by the IMO.

Mr. Brazier: I am grateful to the Minister for nodding, but he knows that I must put that point on the record in Hansard. I am aware that he swears that the legislation will not be used to implement the directive, and I believe him, but future Ministers will not necessarily share his scruples in similar situations, and the amendment would make it doubly certain that the porthole is locked and bolted.

As I said to my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone), we are not against criminalising intentional discharge. Appius Claudius, to whom I referred earlier, was condemned to death for impiety. However, accidental discharge does not demand punishment or prohibition unless it is the result of deliberate recklessness, which is especially true of punishment or prohibition conducted by one part of the world without reference to the other maritime states. I commend the amendment to the House.

Paul Rowen: Britain has a proud maritime history. We were founder members of the IMO and have played a great part in the IMO's development and the adoption of many of the conventions that we now take for granted. I agree with the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) that in this particular case an EU directive, which is only a regional agreement, should not be allowed to take the place of any international agreement that may come into force. If there is such an EU directive, it should be subject to normal IMO procedures, which is the soundest way to ensure that unilateralism is not exercised by the US or other states. I hope that the Minister will support the amendment.

Dr. Ladyman: I am always impressed by the ingenuity that hon. Members use to secure an opportunity to make a specific point that is completely irrelevant to the business on the Order Paper. The hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) should be proud of the ingenuity that he has shown on this occasion, but I do not think that he seriously believes that the Government would use the Bill to put the European directive on the statute book. I am fairly sure that he knows that we could not, even if we were minded to do so. However, he has taken the opportunity to make some important points about the failings and weaknesses of the directive, and I share his view on those.

I assure the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Rochdale (Paul Rowen) that the Government are wholly committed to the IMO and to having maritime agreements agreed internationally. We made that clear during our presidency of the EU in the last six months of 2005, and we are continuing to do so now, as we assist Austria on maritime issues during its presidency—for obvious reasons, Austria's resources in relation to maritime issues are limited. We have made clear our belief that such agreements should only be agreed internationally.

A few weeks ago, when I attended a ministerial conference in Copenhagen, I found unanimity among the maritime nations of Europe on the necessity of such agreements being not regional, but international. One of the pleasures and honours that I have had in the past 10 months as a Minister has been meeting the Shipping Ministers of pretty much every partner state in the European Union. I have found absolute unanimity on that point—complete agreement that we should not impose restrictions on our European fleet that would make it uncompetitive, that we should seek international agreement wherever possible, and that only in the most extraordinary circumstances should we impose in the Union an agreement that has not been agreed by the rest of the international maritime sector.

To put our view on the record, the powers in clause 1 are restricted to the implementation of the supplementary fund protocol and the implementation of instruments that revise or replace the civil liability convention, the international oil pollution compensation fund convention, or the supplementary fund protocol. Each of those instruments was adopted through the IMO and it is inconceivable that they would be amended other than through the IMO. There is therefore no need for the suggested definition of an international agreement in amendment No. 1.

Amendment No. 2 would provide that an Order in Council would only make provision in accordance with an international agreement. Combined with amendment No. 1, that would mean an international agreement adopted by the IMO. I hope that I have already made it clear that there is no scope in clause 1 to give effect to anything other than an international agreement and that such agreements will inevitably be adopted by the IMO.

I hope that I have given the hon. Member for Canterbury the specific reassurance that he seeks. More generally, I assure him that I share his concern that the European maritime sector should remain competitive and that maritime issues should be dealt with through the IMO and not unilaterally.

Mr. Brazier: I am happy to beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Order for Third Reading read.

Dr. Ladyman: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

I thank the House and the Opposition parties for the constructive and helpful way in which they have approached the Bill. It was deliberately made a short and focused Bill to speed its passage through Parliament. The whole House agrees that we urgently need the protection of the legislation. Once it is on the statute book, it will improve greatly the compensation available for oil pollution and give us powers to introduce measures to reduce air pollution from ships.

The international oil pollution compensation fund currently provides up to £168 million of compensation, but, unfortunately, in the case of major incidents such as the Prestige, that amount is not always sufficient. During our consideration of the Bill, the hon. Members for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) and for Scarborough and Whitby (Mr. Goodwill), for example, noted that compensation payments in respect of the Prestige were for a long time limited to just 15 per cent. of the amount claimed. The IOPC funds have now arranged for payments to be increased to about 30 per cent. of the amount claimed, but, unfortunately, there is no more money available and we know that those claims will never be paid in full.

Even when the overall costs of an incident do not exceed the limit of the IOPC fund, full payment of claims has often been delayed until the full extent of the damage is known and the final costs of an incident can be accurately assessed. Depending on the incident, that process could take months or even years. We experienced such delays following both the Braer and the Sea Empress incidents. With the Bill, I hope that we will not have to face such a situation again.

In Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for Great Yarmouth (Mr. Wright) drew our attention to an incident that occurred some years ago. The Eleni V ran aground in May 1978, spilling 5,000 tonnes of persistent oil, which affected shellfish areas and recreational beaches. I understand that the local authorities incurred considerable costs in responding to the incident and payment of compensation was delayed for three or four years. The IOPC fund entered into force five months after the incident. Had it been in force, I suspect that those claims would have been settled much more quickly. That incident demonstrates the importance of implementing such instruments as quickly as practicable. A delay of months, or just weeks, can have serious consequences, so I am grateful for the support and co-operation that we have received from both sides of the House as the Bill has progressed.

The Government intend to accede to the protocol as soon as possible. We have drafted the Order in Council that will be used to implement the supplementary fund protocol under clause 1. An advanced draft of the Order in Council was sent to all Members who attended Second Reading. Copies were also placed in the Library. The draft order is now undergoing final checks, which will be completed in the very near future so that the order is ready by the time that the Bill receives Royal Assent. I repeat my grateful thanks to the House for its co-operation and commend the Bill's Third Reading to the House.

Mr. Brazier: I, too, am pleased that we are reaching the end of the legislative process for the Bill and I, in turn, congratulate the Minister on the way in which he has handled the proceedings. He was always open with us in Committee and during the earlier stages. Like any good mariner after a long voyage, I am pleased to see the lighthouse ahead and know that the journey is nearly over—and that we have not had any spillage during the process, accidental or otherwise.

Without wishing to introduce a sour note, it is a pity that we have missed another opportunity to slip the Harbours Bill into port as well. It is uncontentious and both sides would have welcomed it. I hope that we will hear from the Minister shortly that the Government intend to schedule a little time for it. That said, it is important that the Bill is passed into law as soon as possible, and I am delighted to hear that that will happen. The crash in the Suez canal just last week involving a Liberian tanker—it was a relatively small affair compared with the incident that the Minister mentioned, but, nevertheless, involved the spillage of 3,000 tonnes of crude oil—emphasises the urgency of the matter.

The two treaties ratified by the Bill are the product of many years of careful negotiating. They have been agreed by the International Maritime Organisation and, although one is not compulsory, have the blessing of the international community as a whole. For the international law of the seas properly to work, it is essential that all such treaties are agreed to at as wide an international level as possible and that regions do not splinter off and agree their own rules, as we discussed earlier in relation to the amendments. I was glad to receive the assurances from the Minister.

There are some areas in which the Government could have been proactive. We hope that there will be a little action before long on getting the large shipping registers to sign up to the supplementary fund protocol, which is the main subject of the Bill and something on which we spent time in Committee.

Conservative Members are pleased that the Government have heeded the calls that we made in Committee and those of environment groups such as the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds for the introduction of marine environmental high-risk areas, which were recommended 13 years ago by Lord Donaldson. It is one thing to use supplementary funds to provide compensation after an oil spill, but it is much better to prevent a spill in the first place, especially in sensitive areas. Redirecting ships away from areas of outstanding beauty or environmental significance is a sensible way of achieving that.

I disappointed that the announcement on the MEHRAs made them merely advisory. I hope that the Government intend to consult relevant interested parties and, after a suitable period, find out how well the scheme is working. Given the effort that was put into establishing the areas, it would be a tragedy if they were simply ignored by the ships that were most likely to cause a disaster.

Putting those small points aside, I am pleased to support the Bill. The statistics that have been cited throughout our debates need no repeating. Although major oil spills are thankfully very rare, when they do happen they cause untold and often irreversible damage to the environment, wildlife and economy of an affected area. The supplementary fund will of course be used very rarely, but when it is used, it will be needed precisely because the scale of the disaster will be so big.

The incorporation of the latest stage of the MARPOL convention into British law will reduce emissions from ships, especially harmful nitrous oxides. That will make what is already the cleanest major form of transportation even cleaner and help the UK to hit its emissions targets.

The Government have had the support of the Opposition throughout the Bill's passage. I commend the Bill to the House, and, once again, urge the Government to find time for consideration of the Harbours Bill.

Paul Rowen: On behalf of the Liberal Democrats, I am pleased to support the Bill. I commend the work of the Minister in Committee and on the Floor of the House. Although the Bill is short, it will have an important and wide-reaching effect because it ratifies two important treaties and agreements on oil pollution and controls on air pollution by ships, which are being introduced for the first time.

The catalyst for the first aspect of the Bill was the Prestige disaster, and we heard in Committee about its catastrophic effect. Some 64,000 tonnes of oil were spilled and there was a bill of more than $1 billion. Our one worry about the supplementary allowance is that it would not have paid 100 per cent. of the cost of the Prestige disaster, but nevertheless we realise that we have come a long way since the Torrey Canyon disaster in 1967. Remarkable improvements have been made on both the amount of oil spilled each year in international waters and the way in which we have dealt with it. I remember my geology professor, Lord Energlyn, who advised Harold Wilson on how to deal with the Torrey Canyon disaster, talking about the technology used at the time, which included the use of Buccaneer bombers to disperse the oil. The way in which we deal with such disasters and the compensation arrangements available have come a long way since then. We support the provisions of the Bill that will help people much more than was the case in the past.

There are still legitimate worries about flags of convenience and the state of such fleets. It is estimated that at least one in 12 vessels that visit British ports are unseaworthy and that the figures for other ports are much higher. Nevertheless, with continuing pressure, more states will ratify the agreement. It is to be hoped that that will reduce some of the consequences that we had with the Prestige disaster.

I move on to the MARPOL index. It is a start in dealing for the first time with air pollution. It is limited, and the number of signatures to the convention is low. Like the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier), we look forward to hearing what the Government will do with regard to the ports Bill. We would have liked to see an opportunity to tackle air pollution of ships while in port. That is called cold ironing, and it already operates in Los Angeles and Vancouver. When the Bill is introduced, we hope to have an opportunity to consider that process as going one stage further in dealing with pollution, not only on the high seas but within UK ports.

I commend the Bill to the House in recognition of the work that will be done under its provisions.

4.51 pm

Mr. Hollobone: I welcome the Bill. As the Minister said, a sharpened focus is no bad thing. Perhaps other Departments could draw a lesson from the way in which the Bill made its passage through Parliament. It chimes with the environmental concern of our times and, if it makes our planet a healthier place, that must be a good thing. I have enjoyed listening to the debates on the Bill. Perhaps for the first time in my brief time in the House, I can say that this is a Bill that I can wholeheartedly support.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ivan Lewis): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of European Union Documents No. OJ C 301, the European Court of Auditors 2004 Annual Report; No. 11216/05, European Court of Auditors Special Report No. 1/2005 concerning the management of the European Anti-Fraud Office; No. 11452/05 and Addenda 1 and 2, Protection of the financial interests of the Communities: fight against fraud, Commission's annual report 2004; No. 12493/05 and Addendum 1, Commission Report: follow-up to 2003 Discharge Decisions–Council recommendations; No. 12494/05 and Addendum 1, Commission Report: follow-up to 2003 Discharge Decisions–European Parliament Resolutions; No. 12712/05, Commission Staff Working Document: follow-up to the 2003 European Court of Auditors Annual Report; and No. 13532/05, Member States' replies to the Court of Auditors 2003 Annual Report; and supports the Government's promotion of measures to improve the level of assurance given on the Community budget.

I am pleased that we can have this debate on the report and other relevant documents that are before us for the first time in a long time. It is an indication of how importantly Parliament regards EU financial management and the protection of EU taxpayers' financial interests. I heard a rumour that the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) is on his way to join us in the Chamber. I advise all Members that if we can make the debate snappy, we may have half a chance of an early night. However, the purpose of the debate is to secure transparency and scrutiny, even if we have to listen to the hon. Gentleman. It will be interesting to see whether he reflects the new Conservative party's movement to the centre, certainly in terms of domestic policy, and in terms of the EU moving ever further to the right. It is an interesting development and one in which we shall see whether the debate reflects where the Conservative party is at the moment on the EU.

I shall cover three areas in my opening remarks. First, I shall set out the main points that are presented in the various reports that are tabled for debate and the Government's response to these various issues. Secondly, I shall highlight what has been done to address problems identified previously and debated in the House. Thirdly, I will set out what we see as the key next steps.

There have been, and continue to be, improvements in our view in both the quality of financial management of the EU budget and in financial management information. However, we cannot be complacent or satisfied with the status quo. There is much more for us to do.

What are the main issues and what are the Government's views on them? The main issues are presented formally in the annual report that is presented by the European Court of Auditors, the ECA, on how the Commission has implemented the Community budget. The ECA has also been required, since 1994 under the treaty on European Union, to give a statement of assurance as to the reliability of the accounts and the legality and regularity of the underlying transactions.

The first part of that statement of assurance has always been positive. The ECA has observed every year that, despite some qualifications, the accounts faithfully reflect the revenue and expenditure for the communities for the year and their financial position at the year end. The qualifications relate to the recording of sundry debtors, assets and liabilities, which the Commission's accounting system was not designed to handle adequately.

The other half of the statement of assurance concerns the legality and regularity of the underlying transactions. Frankly, that is where the problems lie. But it is not all bad news: the ECA audits revenue, commitments and payments and has always given a positive statement of assurance for revenue and commitments. It is in payments where we find the most difficulties.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con) rose—

Mr. Lewis: I am delighted to give way to the hon. Gentleman, having referred to him earlier in his absence.

Mr. Cash: I have been absent for only the best part of 30 seconds of the Minister's speech, but he seems to have introduced my contribution rapidly.

Does the Minister agree that the Government's explanatory memorandum states:

"The reservation is that in the absence of effective internal controls the ECA cannot be certain that transactions relating to the sundry debtors item were properly recorded"?

For practical purposes, it is clear that the Government believe that the Court of Auditors is right to say that there should not be a discharge because it does not know exactly what is going on.

Mr. Lewis: Yes. The Government's position is reflected in the statement that the hon. Gentlemen read out, and we continue to have that concern. However, as the debate progresses we need to take a balanced judgment on the true situation, how much progress has been made in recent times and what we can hope to achieve in the near future. I do not disagree with his comment.

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, South-West) (Lab/Co-op): I draw to the Minister's attention that I was motivated to come to this debate when I heard him refer to the absence of the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash). Indeed, I was pacing out to arrive here as quickly as I could when I was overtaken by the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), who passed me at a rate of knots. I suggest that the Minister refer to other Members who might be brought into the debate.

Mr. Lewis: Had I known what effect my original reference would have, I might not have referred to the hon. Member for Stone, but I am always delighted to see my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, South-West (Mr. Davidson) in the Chamber, as well as the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), who has a long track record on these issues and who I am sure will want to contribute.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): To put this report in the context of a public limited company, were a plc to announce its annual results and have its accounts qualified, there would be a huge impact on its share price. Yet, the European Union carries on from year to year with no effect, and with no real concern from Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Lewis: It is a shame that the consensus has broken down. To say that there is no real concern from Her Majesty's Government is unfair nonsense. During the course of our presidency, I, together with others, made this a priority. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that, if he is talking about the credibility of the European Union and the relationship between it and taxpayers in the nation states, the issue is incredibly important. As long as the accounts continue to be qualified, they undermine and damage the credibility of the European Union as an institution. Perhaps the difference between us is that I am unhappy that the credibility and integrity of the European Union are undermined whereas I suspect that Conservative Members and, perhaps, one or two of my hon. Friends, are delighted for this continual undermining of the European Union as an institution to continue. The difference is that I want an improvement in the situation so that we cease to qualify the accounts with the consequence that the relationship between the European Union and taxpayers is improved. We should all share that objective. It is also true that the qualification is not, as it is often explained, largely to do with fraud; it is largely to do with inappropriate accounting methods and the difficulty of monitoring expenditure. I do not make any excuses, but sometimes 100 per cent. of the problem is defined as fraud, which is misleading and inaccurate. I share the reservations of the hon. Gentleman, and as long as the European Union's accounts are qualified, any democratic politician should be concerned. Indeed, anybody who believes in the EU as an institution should be concerned and want the situation changed.

Mr. Cash: In respect of proportionality and in terms of whether a discharge is given, does the Minister agree that the amount of money involved is highly relevant? Does he dispute the fact—I doubt that he will as I have the document here—that, with regard to irregularities in expenditure under the European agricultural guidance and guarantee fund, the total amount for 2004 was €82,064,000 and that on structural measures the amount was no less than €531,744,438 in the same year? Does he agree that that is a considerable sum for irregularities?

Mr. Lewis: Yes. There is no difference between us in respect of the continuing concerns about the inability to give full endorsement of the accounts year on year and about the fact that it still appears to be difficult to monitor expenditure under significant budget headings. That is especially a source of concern for Members who believe that the EU is a positive institution, making a positive contribution to the world. The question is not whether we condemn or criticise, but what action we can take—

Mr. Cash: To find out.

Mr. Lewis: Indeed, but also to improve the situation. As I shall explain, we moved things on during our presidency; we did not solve all the problems but we said that the issue must be given more prominence and importance at Council level. As a result, progress has been made.

I acknowledged earlier that we had found most problems in respect of payments. In most years, the ECA has been able to give a positive statement of assurance only for administrative payments that were a small part of the budget—about 6 per cent. I am pleased to note that, in the 2004 report, the ECA considers that a substantial part of the agriculture budget—59 per cent.—merits a positive statement of assurance. That is the part managed under the integrated administration and control scheme—IACS—and it amounts to €26 billion from a total agricultural payments budget of €44.3 billion in 2004.

Mr. Robert Goodwill (Scarborough and Whitby) (Con): It must be true that none of the funds has been deployed wrongly by the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs this year, because no farmers have received their cheques. No fraud is taking place this year because so far no money has been given to our hard-pressed farmers.

Mr. Lewis: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman has raised that point with my ministerial colleagues in the relevant Department, but if he wants me to look at the situation after the debate I shall be happy to do so and write to him.

The ECA considers that IACS, where it is properly applied, is effective in limiting the risk of irregularities to an acceptable level. In addition, the 2004 report concludes that pre-accession aid also merits a positive statement of assurance. Taking the large share of agriculture spending, and all pre-accession aid and administration costs, about 35 per cent. of the 2004 budget has been assured by the ECA. As I am sure Members will be at pains to point out, that still leaves a long way to go, but it is an improvement over previous years.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): The Minister has a difficult task and I am grateful to him for giving way. The OLAF report shows that the financial impact of cases acknowledged by 31 December 2004 was a massive €5.8 billion, yet figure 27 shows that the office has managed to retrieve only €198 million. Can the Minister give us some idea of how much more might come back? I presume that much more is owed to taxpayers.

Mr. Lewis: I cannot give the right hon. Gentleman a direct answer, but I can attempt to find that information for him. At this stage, I am not in a position to give him a definitive answer, but I am grateful for his expression of sympathy for my responsibility in this debate. I assure him that there was not a queue of Ministers wishing to lead on these matters.

There have been relative improvements in the 2004 audit, but two thirds of the EU budget does not meet acceptable standards. The sum involved is about €68 billion, or £46 billion, but honesty and transparency are required, as the true extent of the problem must be defined. Fraud has taken place—I shall comment on that—but there are also errors or irregularities. If the ECA's audit leads it to believe that amounts calculated by member states differ in value by more than 2 per cent. from what it assesses to be the correct figure, it cannot give a positive assurance on that part of the budget. That does not mean that the whole budget sector is subject to error—it is still only a relatively small part. We must be careful, too, to distinguish between irregularities, where payments have been made in contravention of the rules, or where it was not possible to show that the correct procedures have been followed, and fraud, where money has clearly been stolen or used for entirely inappropriate purposes.

Those issues are examined in detail in the "Fight against Fraud" report that was published by the Commission and which incorporates data from the European anti-fraud office—OLAF—to which the right hon. Member for Wokingham referred. For the first time, in the 2004 report, OLAF has succeeded in identifying the amount of suspected fraud reported in agriculture and the structural funds. The relevant figures were 13 per cent. of the total agriculture irregularities and 17 per cent. of the irregularities in the structural funds.

Angus Robertson (Moray) (SNP): I apologise for missing the start of the debate, which began earlier than I expected. Does the Minister accept that many concerns about irregularities in the budget are the result of action by so-called whistleblowers such as Miss Andreasen, Dorte Schmidt Brown and Jules Muis? Will he comment on how the European Union has dealt with those whistleblowers? Does he believe that the situation will improve, as we depend on such people raising concerns if we are to get to the bottom of issues such as fraud in the EU budget?

Mr. Lewis: I am not going to comment on individual cases. There are different sides to stories about personnel and human resources in any organisation. The hon. Gentleman is right to make the general point that we should welcome the fact that people working in the organisation are willing to expose legitimate material that is being withheld from democratically elected politicians or the public for no good reason. We should only do so, however, if they do not contravene their employment responsibilities as employees of that organisation. There is a fine tradition of people working in organisations who are willing to expose unsavoury practices that the organisation would prefer to leave unexposed.

Mr. Davidson: My hon. Friend welcomed whistleblowing provided that it does not contravene employment responsibilities, but is not that the exact argument that the European Union consistently uses to try to hammer whistleblowers into the ground? Does he agree that the true difficulty in the EU is the culture, which is much more about covering up errors than welcoming people who reveal them? Unless we break that culture, the future for whistleblowers is extremely dark.

Mr. Lewis: I agree with much of what my hon. Friend said, but there is also a history of employees in various organisations—not just the European Union—justifying behaviour that represents an unacceptable employment practice by saying that they are fulfilling their wider public duty. That does not always prove to be the case, because people have an axe to grind, a problem with management or their own agenda. All I am saying is that we must be careful not to generalise, without referring to people's responsibility to abide by their contracts of employment. If we do not acknowledge their importance, we may as well not have contracts of employment. However, if people choose to disclose evidence that the European Union is seeking to cover up information that should be in the public domain or be available to democratically elected politicians, that has historically been an important part of getting organisations to face up to the difficulties and challenges confronting them. Ideally, as my hon. Friend suggested, the belief that it was management's responsibility to take these matters seriously would be built into the culture of the Commission and other elements of the European Union. We will be able to improve the credibility of the EU only if we tackle these issues head on—if we are honest about them, rather than pretending that they do not exist or trying to hide them. Ultimately, that will do nothing to enhance the reputation of the EU or the relationship between the EU and the taxpayers of Europe.

Lorely Burt (Solihull) (LD): The Minister speaks about the culture in the European Union and in member states. Does he agree although we have grave concerns about the amount of fraud and other irregularities, the problem is largely that other countries—not necessarily the UK—are not meeting the basic audit standards? That is causing much of the problem. Does the Minister agree that—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. The hon. Lady is relatively new, but interventions must be brief.

Mr. Lewis: I agree with the hon. Member for Solihull (Lorely Burt). It is true that much of the problem is connected with the ability, capacity and willingness of nation states to monitor expenditure. That is another reason why the attacks on the European Union or "Brussels" are sometimes inaccurate. In the end, it is a matter of nation states not fulfilling their responsibilities.

Later, I shall come to what we were able to do during our presidency to improve the situation. A central part of that is the willingness of nation states to take their responsibilities for monitoring expenditure more seriously than they have done.

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con) rose—

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con) rose—

Mr. Lewis: I give way first to the hon. Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois), who is on the Front Bench.

Mr. Francois: I thank the Economic Secretary for his courtesy in giving way. He was making an argument a few moments ago that, in order to help restore credibility, it is important that the European Union and its institutions should be as transparent as possible about their financial circumstances. No doubt we would all agree with that sentiment. Does he agree in principle that that should also apply to Her Majesty's Treasury in relation to information that it holds about our financial relationship with the EU?

Mr. Lewis: Of course I agree with the statement that we ought to apply those principles to Her Majesty's Treasury. I am not sure where the hon. Gentleman's intervention is leading, though I am sure I will find out later on. The same principles of transparency and openness should apply. In the context of a debate such as this, it is important to state that, in this country, in the political process and the government—not this Government, but the government of the country—we are remarkably free of corruption, compared with many other countries. We parliamentarians and politicians should be proud of that. The way our democratic system works should be a cause for celebration.

I give way to the hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone) and wish him all the best in the World cup.

Mr. Bone: I appreciate the Minister's comments. I should perhaps declare an interest as a chartered accountant. I am aware that auditing in this country and in western Europe is of a very high standard, and it is a bit rich to suggest that member states are somehow to blame for the fact that the European Union—this Alice in Wonderland organisation—cannot get its own accounts audited.

Mr. Lewis: I am not sure that there would be universal acclaim for the idea that accountants are the most perfect human beings in the world; indeed, I can hear hissing and booing from the Benches behind me. However, as Economic Secretary to the Treasury, I have to acknowledge—urgently, before I get into serious trouble—that our accountancy standards are very high by any international standards.

The EU is sometimes presented as "Brussels"—an homogenous institution that spends and accounts for all this money as one entity. That is not true. Much of the expenditure is ultimately filtered through nation states, and much of the difficulty as regards the ongoing qualification of accounts is connected to their inability always to account properly and appropriately for the way in which the money is spent. Frankly, it suits some Conservative Members, and perhaps one or two of my hon. Friends, constantly to use that as a stick with which to beat the concept of the European Union. Many elements of this issue play into that view in the context of the broad debate about the integrity and reputation of the European Union and the fact that a massive gap has opened up between the people of Europe and the EU as an institution.

Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): My hon. Friend is making a strong case. He correctly said that corruption is less common in Britain than it is in the European Commission. Indeed, there are many examples in the papers that we have before us today. Is not that a powerful argument for Britain and other member states doing more and the European Union doing less?

Mr. Lewis: Since I have been spending time in the European Union, I have certainly found that some people's instincts are to want to authorise every increase in budgets for the Commission although in some cases the most effective way in which to tackle the problems relating to the budget headings that we are discussing would be through nation states. They sometimes want to create ever-increasing budgets to build an empire within the European Union even when, to achieve effective outcomes, it would be better if the money were filtered through nation states.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): The Minister said that he recognises the gap that has grown up between people and politicians. He now says that the solutions to some of the problems that are emerging should be retained within the nation state. Are not we getting ever closer to the time when it is necessary to have a referendum to confirm, or otherwise, the British electorate's approval of the European status quo? Should not we give them an opportunity to say whether they approve of the direction of European policy?

Mr. Lewis: I thank my hon. Friend for giving me the opportunity to become a very famous politician overnight by responding positively to his invitation, but I am certainly not going to. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] I am sorry to disappoint; that is the story of my life, I am afraid.

It is important that we are clear about where we stand. My position is that much about the European Union could be better and that much about certain people's vision of what it should be about is very damaging to the relationship of the people of Europe with the EU as an institution. Nevertheless, I wholeheartedly believe that this country's place should be at the heart of Europe, arguing and fighting for it to be reformed and made more relevant to its population. That is where I part company from some Conservative Members and some hon. Friends who would like the solution to be our departure from the European Union. I believe that that would be incredibly damaging to our foreign affairs and our economy. It would not reflect the global realities.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind all hon. Members that we are debating EU finances.

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher and Walton) (Con): I am grateful for that guidance, Madam Deputy Speaker. However, I endorse the Economic Secretary's most recent comment. It would be absurd for this country not to be in the EU, and that is why we take such an interest in improving it. To avoid a sense of sharing sanctimonious pleasure, will he confirm that the UK Government distribute approximately £2 billion in benefit fraud per annum, which far exceeds fraud in the whole EU? That puts the matter in context, not least because the National Audit Office has qualified the accounts of the Department for Work and Pensions on more than one occasion.

Mr. Lewis: I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman is in the mainstream of his party on the issues that we are considering. The Tory party is undergoing change, and I am therefore unsure whether he is in the mainstream. Of course he is right to say that such issues must always be put in context—unless one is deliberately setting out to prove an argument that portrays the EU as a negative and corrupt institution. Some people want to present the EU in that light because they believe that the country should leave the EU. That is a legitimate point of view, but it would be wrong to portray the budgetary position out of context, in a way that misleads public opinion in an unfortunate direction.

Angus Robertson: I agree with the point that the Economic Secretary is making, but does he accept that it is incumbent on those of us who support the idea of the EU working properly to point out its shortcomings? The most recent Commission report on its reform claims that adopting accrual accounting based on International Federation of Accountants standards could help it to become a leader in the field. That is not credible.

Mr. Lewis: It is important that organisations should not be in denial. It is vital that we tackle the fundamental problems, are honest about them and do not run away from them. This is reminiscent of those who are rightly passionate about the EU but continually want to go down ever more federalist paths, when the people of Europe do not want that sort of EU. However, that position is not the status quo in the EU.

It is important to make the case for the EU, and the best way to do that is to show people how it adds value, makes a difference to their everyday lives and responds to some of the genuine challenges that face us in a global economy. The EU adds considerable value in the best interests—indeed, the national interest—of this country and its citizens. Those who claim otherwise are disingenuous about the sort of world in which we now live.

Mr. Cash: The answer to the question of whether the money belongs to the EU is clear. It is stated as categorical fact that the moneys that devolve into the EU's budget are those of the EU. Is it not disingenuous—to use the Economic Secretary's expression—to say to member states that fraud happens in the nation states but all the money belongs to the EU? It cannot do the job properly. Why cannot our Public Accounts Committee and National Audit Office audit the moneys that go into the EU's coffers? After all, we are talking about our taxpayers' money.

Mr. Lewis: On the subject of the auditors' inability to give a statement of assurance, they and independent reports by respected European parliamentarians have identified one of the problems at the heart of the matter as individual nation states' inability or unwillingness to account for money that they end up spending. There is no point in denying that. The Court of Auditors has identified it as a major reason why the qualification of accounts is to continue. There has to be co-operation between the nation states and the Commission if we are going to crack this nut and eventually arrive at a point at which the accounts do not have the qualification attached to them. That is simply plain fact. If we do not get the nation states signed up to working in partnership with the Commission on these issues, we are always going to struggle.

Lorely Burt: rose—

Mr. Lewis: I shall give way once more, then I must make some progress. I have been incredibly generous in giving way.

Lorely Burt: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way. He talks about the individual nation states taking their share of the responsibility. Does he agree that the EU should perhaps not allocate subsequent funding to nation states that do not fulfil that responsibility? Would not that bring them into line very quickly?

Mr. Lewis: We are trying to achieve co-operation and consensus on this matter. Of course, at some stage in the process the concept of using a stick might well come into play. If it were absolutely clear that certain rogue states were unwilling to be held to account for their use of these resources, sanctions would of course be an option that ought to be considered. However, at the moment, that is not part of our strategy for reaching a point at which the accounts do not have the qualification attached by 2009. That might be part of the solution in future, but I hope that it will not be necessary. Sanctions are not part of the plan, but they might become part of the solution.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op) rose—

Mr. Lewis: As my hon. Friend has not yet contributed to the debate, I shall give way. Then I must make some progress.

Mr. Drew: I thank my hon. Friend for giving way. I want to be constructive and helpful to him. That marvellous organisation called OLAF, which deals with anti-corruption measures, was set up with a great fanfare as an improvement on the previous arrangements. I have been reading the documents, and surely one of the problems is that it has not had much impact at all. What are we going to do with these cases of fraud? Clearly they just get kicked into the long grass, and everyone gets more cynical. That is no good to anyone, is it?

Mr. Lewis: I think that my hon. Friend is being a little unfair. OLAF has made a difference. We are debating the year 2004, and obviously, quite a bit has happened since then. The overall judgment on OLAF is that it has been a good thing. It has begun to address some of the cultural issues, and to get them taken more seriously. Has it been the solution in itself? Until now, certainly not—but I do not think that that was ever the intention. However, to say that it has not made a difference is unfair, given some of the improvements that are now under way. I do not know whether my hon. Friend would agree with that, but perhaps we can discuss the matter on another occasion. OLAF is a pretty new organisation, and there is evidence that improvements and progress have been made.

I shall now return to my speech. The relevant figures were 13 per cent. of the total agriculture irregularities and 17 per cent. of the structural funds irregularities, or about €11 million in agriculture and €118 million in the structural funds. These figures are a far cry from the allegations typically made in the media claiming fraud and waste of €5 billion. There is hard evidence to back up OLAF's figures. Of course, that is nothing to be complacent about; it is not acceptable. But I support and commend OLAF's efforts to put the figures on the table, so that we are better informed about the extent and nature of the fraud.

The "Fight against Fraud" report also contains an analysis of the amount of irregularity—as opposed to fraud—reported by member states. In 2004, 9,463 cases were reported, involving a total amount of €982 million. That is an increase over 2003 levels, although the increase was mainly in the structural funds sector. Indeed, irregularities in own resources and agriculture decreased. The overall increase is, of course, bad news, but, as I have said throughout, it must be seen in proportion. On the expenditure side, reported irregularities accounted for 0.19 per cent. of the agriculture budget and 2 per cent. of the structural funds budget. To be responsible, we must put the figures in context, particularly if we are to have a meaningful dialogue with the public.

Mr. Davidson: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Lewis: I will give way one last time.

Mr. Davidson: The Minister is being very generous. The fact that we can have a dialogue of this kind shows the benefits of our system. Does the Minister agree, however, that it is misleading to say that those very small figures represent the limits of waste, in particular? The number of value-for-money studies that the European Commission undertakes is minimal, unlike the number undertaken by the National Audit Office here. We have no comparable examination of waste in the European Union; all that we have is an examination relating to theft and misappropriation. The questions of waste and efficiency of spending are not adequately measured and never have been, and that is not proposed even under the Barroso plan.

Mr. Lewis: That may be so, but I think it unfair to suggest that there is no desire or attempt, as part of the future management of finances, to examine the whole question of value for money, best value and waste. If my hon. Friend had said that the commitment was not as great as he would like it to be, perhaps we could agree—but to suggest that there is no desire to tackle the issue of waste in the European Union seriously is slightly unfair.

The second issue that I want to discuss is what is being done to improve financial management. The issues in the reports are all too familiar to Members, but, as I have said throughout, that does not mean that nothing has been done to address the problems. In recent years, the United Kingdom has championed a number of measures that have demonstrably improved the quality of financial management by the Commission, and that of the information that we receive. Many of them were introduced under the direction of Lord Kinnock—I am sure that that will prompt applause from Opposition Members—when he was vice-president of the European Commission. For example, the revised financial regulation clearly defined the roles of those accountable for the budget, introduced an independent internal audit facility, required all directors general to sign an annual declaration of assurance on the budget, and ensured that all expenditure was subject to the setting of objectives and the evaluation of their achievement.

A little earlier, the UK was instrumental in shaping the structure and remit of the anti-fraud office, OLAF. The Chancellor called for a strong independent anti-fraud office, which would have the power of immediate and unannounced access to all European institutions.

Anti-fraud measures have been adopted. The Commission's report for 2004 summarises achievements such as the conclusion of an agreement with the cigarette company Philip Morris International, which will establish an effective system to combat cigarette smuggling and counterfeiting in the future. The Commission also considers the issue of co-operation with member states, particularly on the effectiveness of the mutual assistance provisions for the exchange of information concerning irregularities detected, and the methods and practices used in suspected fraud cases.

As for the quality of financial management information, Members will know that the Commission introduced a modern accounting system ahead of most member states, on time and within budget, on 1 January 2005. It will provide full accruals accounting, and should sort out the qualifications raised by the European Court of Auditors. The proof of the pudding will be in the ECA's report on the 2005 budget, which we expect to receive in November this year.

On the institutional side, there has been considerable debate about how to optimise effectiveness and efficiency. I shall say something shortly about the Commission's "Roadmap to an Integrated Internal Control Framework", but let me first consider OLAF's work in response to the points that have been made. How good a job does it do? Is it effective in the fight against fraud? Does it have the right management and organisation to make a difference?

That latter question was considered by the ECA in its special report on OLAF. Its main conclusion, with which we agree, is that it is not appropriate to change the status of OLAF, which currently operates as a service within the Commission. It has a hybrid structure and its director has operational independence so far as investigations are concerned, but it supports the Commission in other duties such as policy development.

From time to time, there have been calls for OLAF to become totally independent of the Commission, but the ECA believes that OLAF's hybrid structure has not adversely affected the independence of its investigative function, and indeed brings with it some advantages. For example, it shares the Commission's power to carry out on-the-spot checks in member states under existing sectoral legislation. The ECA considers that OLAF's resources are sufficient and that it has made considerable improvements in its procedures, but of course it is only fair to say—my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, South-West will be interested to hear this—that the report was not without its criticisms. The ECA criticised OLAF's relations with its supervisory committee and its performance in respect of human rights. OLAF acknowledges that its relationship with the committee could be better, and I hope that it will take the opportunity to review that and to make a new start with the new committee that has recently been appointed. OLAF has already addressed the human rights issue through its proposed amendments to its governing regulation.

Last year, we considered the complementary evaluation report, which showed that OLAF had handled a total of 1,688 cases up to 30 June 2004, in addition to inheriting 1,408 cases from its predecessor, UCLAF. Since 1999, OLAF has reduced the average duration of an investigation from 29 months to 22 months, and the total financial impact of cases closed by OLAF was around €4 billion. The supplementary activity report—produced to cover the six months from July to December 2004, because OLAF intends in future to report on a calendar year basis—updates and expands those performance figures. OLAF has handled a further 720 cases, and the total financial impact of cases that it has closed now stands at €5.8 billion. A total of €198 million was recovered from 2002 to 2004. So the figures are improving and show that the fight against fraud is beginning to succeed.

What will happen next with OLAF? We expect a revised proposal to amend its governing regulation later this year and we will ensure that that takes account of the ECA's findings. I hope that OLAF will continue to analyse the true extent of fraud, for only when we have a reliable understanding of frequency of occurrence and identification of high-risk areas can we target effective preventive action.

That brings me to the third area that I wanted to cover: the key next steps. The action plan has been established by the Commission and was agreed by Ministers in ECOFIN on 8 November last year. It covers the steps to be taken by the Commission, member states and the ECA. It bears repeating that the management of agriculture spending and structural funds is shared between the member states and the Commission. Those headings account for about 80 per cent. of the total EU budget, which is one reason why the ECA has frequently highlighted problems in its past reports. As we have discussed today, member states have vastly differing systems and organisations for managing these funds, and the Commission is often unable to obtain the degree of assurance that it seeks in order to satisfy the ECA.

In response to calls from the European Council and the European Parliament to take action following the ECA report of 2003, the Commission issued a "Roadmap to an Integrated Internal Control Framework"—a snappy title if ever there was one—in June last year. That road map provided a real opportunity to deliver results—to deliver more concrete trust and visible belief in EU financial management and control systems. During its presidency, the UK was very willing to play an active role in taking that forward. The road map was proposed by the ECA itself and in its view, the answer to the problems that it uncovers every year is a system with a number of characteristics. Controls should be applied to a common standard in an open and transparent way, so that the results can be relied on by all parts of the system.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): I thank my hon. Friend for giving way, and I apologise for not having been present for his opening remarks. I very much welcome the proposed action plan, but does he agree that the arrival of President Barroso and the new Commission has been of great benefit to the EU's transparency and accountability? Also important is the fact that benchmarks will be in place to make sure that all the points agreed on will be reviewed regularly. That will ensure that the transparent arrangements that are so necessary in the EU are in place.

Mr. Davidson: Give him a job.

Mr. Lewis: First, may I express my gratitude to my hon. Friend for attending this debate? My other hon. Friends have a slightly different perspective on the matter, although I have enjoyed their contributions. I agree with my hon. Friend, but the cultural change in the new Commission will be judged by actions, not words. We are discussing one very tangible area where the Commission can demonstrate that it is serious about reform that is directly related to its own credibility and relationship with EU taxpayers. As long as the qualification of accounts continues, it will continue to erode and damage perceptions about the EU. As we know, some of those perceptions are unfair and misleading, but significant progress in this area will improve the EU's credibility and reputation.

Keith Vaz: Will my hon. Friend give way again on that point?

Mr. Lewis: I shall give way once more, and then move on.

Keith Vaz: I am most grateful for my hon. Friend's generosity. Does he agree that the impetus for the reform agenda comes from the UK, and stems from the letter that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister signed with Gerhard Schröder in February 2002? That letter dealt with all the aspects of financial management, accountability and transparency. The reform agenda is Britain's agenda, and we should pursue it as much as we can.

Mr. Davidson: Who was the Minister for Europe then?

Mr. Lewis: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz). We have led the argument for reform in all sorts of EU policy areas, including the Lisbon agenda covering productivity, competitiveness, our response to the challenges of globalisation and the EU's relationship with the US. We have been a constructive player at the heart of the EU, and we have begun to move the EU in the direction that we think that it should take to meet the challenges that we all face at the beginning of the 21st century. Other matters on which the UK has taken a lead include international security and terrorism. The UK is seen as a credible player that wants to make Europe work, and not as a nation that constantly wants to debate whether we should be in Europe at all. Our approach has gained us significantly more influence and a greater capacity to achieve change than was the case before 1997, when Britain had no credibility in the EU.

I shall move on, as I do not want to provoke any more interventions. The other criterion laid down for the road map was that the basis of the internal control system should be a chain of control procedures, with each level having specific defined objectives that take into account the work of others. The ECA also believed that the cost of these controls should be in proportion to the overall benefits that they bring.

In the road map, the Commission undertook to make a gap assessment, based on comparing its current control systems with the system proposed by the ECA, but it also proposed a way of gaining the assurance from member states that they currently lack. Building on the ECA's integrated internal control framework, the Commission suggested that each member state should produce an annual declaration of assurance in respect of its systems for managing Community funds and how they had performed—in much the same way that Government Departments in this country produce an annual statement on internal control, signed by the relevant accounting officer. The European Parliament wanted those member state declarations to be signed by the Finance Ministers, in order to demonstrate accountability and responsibility.

Although I have no difficulty with demonstrating accountability and responsibility, there are legal and organisational problems with the European Parliament's idea. Moreover, the ECA did not say that national declarations were the answer. Without such an indication from the Court, there was little or no chance that member states would be persuaded.

What was important was our joint ability to reach a practical and unanimous consensus. For the UK presidency, it was vital that the road map should provide an acceptable path for all member states, in the full spirit of co-operative action. ECOFIN on 8 November agreed conclusions that committed both the Commission and member states to take action to improve financial management and the level of assurance that we can give the ECA on the management of the Community budget.

Those actions included an assessment by the Commission of the present controls at sector and regional level, and the value of existing statements and declarations. That will force improvement and allow a realistic evaluation of how the information currently provided can be made more effective and useful. They also included an examination and report by the ECA on how the integrated internal control framework would affect its audit approach, taking account of current international auditing standards. That will help to drive further the changes that the Court has already introduced into its methodology. It will also bring it closer into line with the methods used by the United Kingdom's National Audit Offices, similar bodies in other member stated and the private sector. Another action will be a professional assessment of the level of risks that can be tolerated for different kinds of transactions. At present the ECA applies a blanket 2 per cent. materiality rate for all policy areas, without taking account of complexities. The Commission intends to launch an inter-institutional process this month.

With those conclusions, the Council has taken action to help to address the criticisms of EU financial management made by the Court of Auditors. Under the UK Presidency, we have tackled this issue for the first time at Council level, and have agreed actions that will commit member states and the Commission to co-operate in playing an effective role in the shared management of the Community budget. The Commission has now produced its action plan to implement the ECOFIN conclusions, and we intend to monitor progress closely.

The Commission has made it a strategic objective to strive for a positive DAS by 2009, but that will not be achieved without the co-operation of member states. The Government will play an active role in strengthening that co-operation.

I am well aware that the European Scrutiny Committee is somewhat sceptical of what it considers to be the Government's optimism with regard to the potential for improvement in financial management and control of the EU budget. I am also aware that people feel that they have been told that improvements are on the way for a long time. What has changed is that we now have a transparent process and action plan that will lead to the tangible changes, supported by evidence, that those of us who continue to believe in the European Union want to see.

This issue is at the heart of the credibility and integrity of the European Union. It is about the relationship between the EU and the taxpayers of Europe. I believe that the UK has played an honourable part in recent times, especially during our presidency, in saying that the issue is exceptionally important. The Commission now has a very different culture and I am optimistic that the 2009 objective can be achieved. However, it will not be achieved if we look to the Commission alone to solve all the problems, because it will also require each member state to take full responsibility for improving their own systems in relation to the expenditure.

This process has been an interesting exercise in comparing the respective positions of the parties on the European Union. This is an important issue, and it is good that for the first time in several years we are having this debate on the Floor of the House.

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): It is a pleasure to be called to speak on behalf of the Opposition in this debate, which encompasses several European institutions, their related spending programmes, and the process by which those are examined by the European Court of Auditors. I am pleased to debate these issues with the Economic Secretary, who was temporarily under the weather after Christmas. I am genuinely pleased to see him back in his place on the Treasury Bench this evening, in his usual humorous good form. He will recall that he and I have debated these topics on several occasions in recent months, including in European Standing Committee A on 1 November, when we focused on the Government's then draft proposals for the EU budget and combating fraud, and subsequently in a Statutory Instruments Committee on 14 December when we looked in some detail at the UK's economic performance relative to our European neighbours in the aftermath of the pre-Budget report. I give the Minister notice that a few questions remain outstanding from those sessions, which fortunately also touch on our business this evening. I hope that he can provide me with answers this evening, as he was not always able to do so then.

We are here partly at the behest of the European Scrutiny Committee, which recommended this topic for debate on the Floor of the House—and quite rightly, too. The package that the Committee provided us with includes some 30 documents, which we have collectively before us tonight—all 1,158 pages of them—for which we must thank the Committee profusely. Those papers centre on the European Court of Auditors' scrutiny of the EU budget process and include its detailed annual report on the implementation of the EU budget for 2004, to which the Economic Secretary has referred on several occasions as a result.

The issue of fraud and the reliability of the EU's accounts, which lies at the centre of the debate, has continued to rear its head repeatedly ever since the entire Santer Commission resigned over EU fraud in 1999. We were subsequently told that a reform process would be put in place under Commissioner Neil—now Lord—Kinnock and that those issues would be seriously addressed at last and put to rest once and for all. However, despite that so-called reform programme, the European Court of Auditors has refused to sign off the EU's accounts for 11 years running, because of continuing irregularities. That process was well summarised by the European Scrutiny Committee in its 19th report of the 2005–06 Session, which appears at page 1,089 of our bundle tonight and states:

"For eleven years, the European Court of Auditors has been unable to give a positive statement of assurance (frequently referred to as a DAS, from the French declaration d'assurance) on the Community Budget. The present arrangements for financial control and audit of Community spending are not working."

Mr. Redwood: Did my hon. Friend notice that when the Economic Secretary remarked on how things could be improved, he gave us verbiage and very vague bureaucratic processes? Does my hon. Friend agree that if we really want to clean up an organisation, from the top, we must say that people who preside over fraud or commit fraud are fired and action is taken against them and that the people who spot it—whistleblowers—are rewarded and promoted? Until we get to that point, are we not going to face this situation year after year, because those at the top of the Commission and the other European organisations do not send a clear message that fraud is the most important thing to root out?

Mr. Francois: As usual, my right hon. Friend makes a powerful point. Part of the situation that we are in now follows on from the fact that an entire Commission resigned on the issue of fraud some seven years ago, and the House, the British people and others across the EU were assured that such issues would be tackled head on as a result of that failure. We are now seven years on from then, and the Economic Secretary attempts to argue that, at last, such things are being taken seriously and that the problems will be laid to rest in about three years. I want to test some of the arguments that he put to the House this evening and press him specifically on some of the details of the road map and how it is supposed to work in principle and how it is likely to work in practice.

The road map is now used by the Government, the Council and the Commission as their answer to the challenge of how the problem will be dealt with. It is designed to facilitate the European Court of Auditors being able to sign off the accounts satisfactorily in the not-too-distant future, and I shall come to the timing shortly. In our debate Upstairs on 1 November, the Economic Secretary laid out the concept of the road map, which was initiated by the European Council and then taken up by the Commission as a result. He explained that the Government has sought to press that initiative as part of their presidency of the EU in the second half of last year. I want to press him tonight on how he sees that operating in detail and on what the European Scrutiny Committee in its 15th report of the 2005–06 Session—at page 12 of our bundle tonight—described as his

"rather upbeat assessment of the situation."

Let us get on to the detail. Will the Economic Secretary give us further information on the timings by which he envisages the process working? Given the history of all this, it seems clear that the problem will hardly be put right overnight. Can he provide some realistic idea of the year in which he expects the objective to be ultimately achieved and the accounts satisfactorily signed off, given that the EU firmly committed itself seven years ago to eradicating the problem? The Minister mentioned 2009, but will he be clear on whether the Government's stated position is that the accounts should be 100 per cent. signed off in 2009, or do they hope that the percentage signed off will be higher, if not necessarily 100 per cent.? Getting to 100 per cent. only three years from now seems ambitious, so will he be crystal clear about whether he expects to achieve 100 per cent. DAS by 2009?

Mr. Davidson: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the Minister should tell us what will happen if, whatever the target is, it is not met? We have had protestations of good intentions from the European Commission for a long time about the accounts, but nothing has happened and nothing has been done. Does he also agree that it is essential that the Minister tells us what will happen if the 2009 date is not met? May I also suggest that the Minister sticks with his adage, "Do less, better"? That way, if the target was not met by 2009, the budget would be cut, and that would concentrate minds.

Mr. Francois: I thank the hon. Gentleman for an important point, and indeed a point so powerful that it has provoked the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz) to leave the Chamber. I would welcome a clear answer to his question when the Minister replies. In sum, do the Government expect 100 per cent. DAS by 2009, and what will happen if they do not get that?

The Minister's explanatory memorandum, which is reproduced by the Scrutiny Committee at page 11 of our bundle, reports progress in the following terms:

"the financial management of around 35 per cent of the total 2004 budget is now assured by the ECA, as opposed to only 6 per cent of the budget (just administration) of the 2003 budget. This is a dramatic improvement, for which the Commission and the Member States should take credit."

[Mr. Francois]

I accept that in purely numerical terms 35 per cent. is better than just 6 per cent., but is the Minister saying he is happy with a situation in which some two thirds of the EU's accounts are not satisfactorily signed off?

Mr. Ivan Lewis: No.

Mr. Francois: Are not Ministers being complacent in seeming so willingly to crow about only one third of the accounts being cleared, as if that were some wonderful achievement?

Mr. Lewis: No.

Mr. Francois: The Minister says no from his sedentary position. We shall see what he says when he winds up, but when he opened the debate he made a lot of the fact that the figure has reached 35 per cent. If he undergoes a Damascene conversion in the space of two hours, I will welcome it.

On a technical point, we acknowledge the introduction of activity-based budgeting into the budget process, which appears to be helpful as it makes it easier to identify spending by subject headings and by specific line items within them. That makes the whole process clearer and is therefore to be welcomed. May I press the Minister, however, on progress towards full accruals-based accounting, which I understand, from page 6 of the bundle and from his remarks, was due to be introduced in the financial year 2005? That should, in theory, improve the quality of the audit process, but there are several references in the bundle to the fact that it has not yet been brought fully into operation. I know the point is technical, but it is important, and I wonder whether the Minister can update us on progress on the introduction of accruals-based accounting. If nothing else, can he tell us how it has fared so far in financial year 2005?

At page 9 of our bundle, the European Scrutiny Committee states, on the basis of the chapter of the ECA's report that focuses on financial instruments and banking activities:

"the Commission does not have a complete overview of the existing assets held by financial institutions on its behalf and such an overview would ensure that the assets are subject to regular and adequate monitoring."

That is an extraordinary statement. Will the Minister say what initiatives are contained within the much-vaunted road map to ensure that that difficulty is put right, so that the Commission will, in future, have a more accurate picture of what it actually has in the bank? As a British taxpayer, that question does not seem unreasonable and perhaps the Minister will help to answer it.

The Minister said that the European anti-fraud office, which is popularly known as OLAF, is helping to win the battle against fraud in the EU. Last month, however, Accountancy Age revealed that fraudsters have sent out fake letters from OLAF to innocent victims in an organised scam. Those letters accused the victims of making irregular bank transfers and thus violating money laundering regulations, and they demanded a payment to make amends for the alleged transgression. That is hardly OLAF's fault, but it does not inspire confidence in the system when the name of the anti-fraud office of the EU is used to try and defraud people. Will the Minister tell the House what specific action has been taken to combat that fraud? By way of comparison, has there ever been a similar scam in the United Kingdom by fraudsters purporting to represent the National Audit Office? Hon. Members would like to know whether anyone has had the temerity to try that in the UK, because a bunch of fraudsters have had the temerity to try it on within the EU in the name of the EU's anti-fraud office.

I want to pick up the Minister on an outstanding matter from our exchange in Committee on 14 December, when we touched on the UK's budget performance against the so-called Maastricht criteria. In particular, we discussed the recommended ratio of debt to GDP, which the Maastricht treaty states should not exceed 60 per cent.—I have the Hansard here, if the Minister's memory has failed him. I asked the Minister what the UK ratio would be if the Government's considerable off-balance-sheet liabilities were included in the calculation. He said that he did not possess that detailed information and that he would write to me, which was fair enough, but it is March and I am still waiting for an answer. Having given the Minister almost three months' notice of my inquiry, will he tell us tonight the ratio of debt to GDP including off-balance-sheet liabilities? [Interruption.] The Minister has quipped from a sedentary position that he should resign, but the matter is not that serious.

Mr. Lewis: How does the hon. Gentleman know? He has not seen the reply.

Mr. Francois: If I were able to see the reply, I could make a fair judgment on the Minister's political future.

In an earlier intervention, I deliberately asked the Minister whether he agrees with the principle that there should be as much transparency as possible from Her Majesty's Treasury with particular regard to our financial relationships with the EU. He favours transparency and wants to give us the information, so will he seek inspiration quickly and let hon. Members know the ratio of debt to GDP including off-balance-sheet liabilities? In the circumstances, the only answer that I will not allow him is that he will write to me.

Mr. Cash: I do not know whether my hon. Friend was in the House at the time, but does he recall that some of us voted against the Maastricht treaty 47 times? We thought that the sort of problems that he has identified with the Maastricht criteria would lead to a position in which the Government simply could not answer such questions. The off-balance-sheet problems, which he has rightly identified, merge into the privatisation arrangements, which Government Back Benchers strongly resent. That is indicative of the unworkable nature of the Maastricht criteria, which is having a dramatic impact on our domestic agenda, including health, education and a range of other matters. That is why the Maastricht criteria have not been seen in the Red Book since the present Chancellor dared to include them for the first and last time.

Mr. Francois: My hon. Friend is well aware that I was not in the House when those lively debates were under way, although I assure him that I followed them from a distance. He has raised an important point, and I recall that off-balance-sheet debt was raised in this context at the time.

Mr. Lewis rose—

Mr. Francois: I see that the Minister is bursting to intervene. I am bursting to give way to him.

Mr. Lewis: Will the hon. Gentleman pass on to the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) our thanks for the fact that Labour is starting its third term in office?

Mr. Francois: If the Minister wants thanks from anyone, I shall thank him when he provides an answer to the question that I asked him three months ago.

David Taylor: I should tell the hon. Gentleman that when he chases his fox to ground he will—sadly, from his point of view—find that it has died. I, too, have examined the private finance initiative and the ability it provides to keep items off the Government balance sheet, but even if those items were all included the Government, because of the stewardship of the next Prime Minister, would still be within the targets that were set. None the less, I agree with the hon. Gentleman about the dubious nature of some of the off-balance-sheet accounting in which most Governments are involved, so I hope that he will join my all-party group—which will have written to him recently—and promote financial transparency.

Mr. Francois: I thank the hon. Gentleman and look forward to receiving his letter—which is one more than I have received from the Minister. It is an interesting situation when the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) has to come to the Government's rescue. That does not happen very often and I hope that the Government Whip on duty has taken full note.

The best answer that I can give to the hon. Gentleman is that we are seriously concerned about the extent of the Government's off-balance-sheet liabilities. We would like to have their version of the answer to my question so that we can debate the matter. That is information that the House would genuinely like to have at its disposal.

The need to achieve reform of the EU budget is brought into even more stark relief by the Government's sell-out in respect of our contribution to it, in particular their capitulation on the British rebate. Perhaps the Minister can explain to the House tonight how on earth it makes any sense to give away £7 billion of UK taxpayers' money via the reduction in the rebate to an institution that cannot even produce a set of accounts to the satisfaction of its own auditors. The Government would be understandably reluctant to continue to pay rate support grant, or its modern equivalent under formula spending share, to any local authority in this country that had only one third of its accounts cleared as satisfactory by the district auditor, so why give away so much more of our taxpayers' money to the EU?

We would be especially pleased to hear a Treasury Minister's view on that subject, because it is an open secret that the Prime Minister did not even bother to consult the Chancellor during the final hours of the negotiations. Even though the Chancellor now says that he supports the policy, "Project Gordon" clearly took the day off.

Will the Minister confirm first, that the £7 billion in question was not included in the estimates prepared for the pre-Budget report of 5 December last year, and secondly, that it will now be included in the figures to be presented to the House of Commons and the British taxpayer in the forthcoming Budget on 22 March? It would be helpful to have that confirmation tonight.

Tonight, we are discussing the way in which the EU can reform itself and put its own financial house in order. Put simply, if the EU cannot fight fraud effectively and produce a worthy and reliable set of accounts that the European Court of Auditors can legitimately sign off, all its other attempts to win back public confidence are likely to come to naught.

Mr. Drew: We hear about the wonderful inquiries that OLAF has conducted and money may well have been reclaimed, but does the hon. Gentleman know what reprimands, sanctions or withdrawal of future funds the EU has imposed when it has been able to prove that fraud has occurred? Does he know of any examples?

Mr. Francois: I have given one example of an attempt to perpetrate a fraud—one that, ironically, used the name of OLAF itself. However, history shows first, that the EU institutions have been bad at pinpointing fraud, especially in agriculture and structural funds; and secondly, that even when they have succeeded in pinpointing fraud, they have been poor at recovering money on behalf of the European taxpayer. The hon. Gentleman touches on two weaknesses in the system and has allowed me two bites of the cherry, for which I am grateful.

The Government have backed a road map for making progress on the issue but, as events in the middle east have starkly reminded us, it is one thing to lay out a road map and quite another to see it through to fruition. Our position on the road map being able to achieve meaningful financial reform of the EU is that that may be worthy in principle, but we will believe it when we see it.

Finally, whatever the Minister says this evening, I am sorry to report to the House that the British people have recently been defrauded of some £7 billion of their own money, although not, in fairness, by some distant European Union institution, but by a Prime Minister desperate for a legacy—even one with massive price tag attached.

6.10 pm

Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): I am pleased to have a chance to speak in this debate. This is the ninth consecutive year in which I have made a speech on this subject and I find it astonishing that, for 11 consecutive years, the accounts of the European Commission have not been signed off. If that happened in Britain and the Chancellor and the Government performed as badly as that, they would be in serious trouble by now. Rather than having OLAF, perhaps we should give the National Audit Office and the Public Accounts Committee the responsibility of looking at European accounts. As we are a net contributor, we might save some of our money if we did that. However, that is just an aside.

European Standing Committee B, of which I was member for eight years—I spoke on these matters many times—has considered the issues in detail. I have not managed to read all the papers, but I have scanned them. One has only to open them at any page and look at a table and the facts start to shout out. For example, on page 121 there is a table entitled

"Suckler cow premium: percentage of claims inspected with errors".

Sadly, the UK has quite a high percentage of claims inspected with errors—nearly 20 per cent.—and although most of the cases are not serious, some are.

A pie chart on page 932 deals with certain investigations. It shows that two thirds relate to corruption, a quarter to embezzlement and only a tiny fraction—about 6 or 7 per cent.—to sloppiness, mistakes and inefficiency. We are talking about deliberate mischief, not things that happen because people are not doing their jobs properly. People are deliberately defrauding the European Union budget by one means or another, which is a serious matter.

The problem is inherent in the European Union in that people are spending other people's money and it is always easier to spend someone else's money than one's own. If one is accountable to one's family for the money that one spends, one will be much more careful. If one is accountable to the House of Commons, one will be much more careful. If one is accountable to an electorate who have a direct concern and interest in how their money is being spent, one will much more careful. The problem with the European Union budget is that it is remote and complex and there are myriad people who benefit from it in far-flung corners of the European Union. It would be difficult even for a very efficient organisation such as the National Audit Office to deal with a vast amount of money that is spread so widely.

We have to consider the whole concept of the European Union budget. That is why I have said on many occasions, and say again today, that we should seek the abolition of the common agricultural policy, because that is where the principal problems lie. If agriculture policy was simply repatriated, each member state could decide its own level of subsidy for its own unique agriculture systems. Every country has a different pattern of agriculture. I do not think that there are any Welsh Members in the Chamber, but I have mentioned several times that we might choose to preserve the way of life of Welsh hill farmers. That is fine. It would not cost very much and it might be a good thing to do. [Interruption.] We do have a Welsh Member present, but I do not know whether my hon. Friend the Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mark Tami) has any Welsh hill farmers in his constituency—possibly not. Nevertheless, there are sectors of agriculture that have to be subsidised. That is appropriate, but other agricultural sectors do not fall into that category. I understand that the vast proportion of CAP funds go to agribusiness sugar producers, to the disadvantage of poorer producers in other parts of the world such as the Caribbean, Africa and elsewhere. I would like us to buy more sugar from those producers and spend less on agribusiness sugar production in Britain and the rest of the EU.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): The hon. Gentleman speaks with a great deal of expertise on this subject. Does he agree that the sugar regime is important to many farmers in East Anglia? Britain is about 60 per cent. self-sufficient while France is about 180 per cent. self-sufficient. The low countries and Germany are all more than 100 per cent. self-sufficient. In the case of the UK, the hon. Gentleman's suggestion means that applying our own rules would be much more sensible.

Kelvin Hopkins: The hon. Gentleman has made a helpful intervention. In the previous debate on this subject it was suggested that we might produce sugar as a biofuel, which would be a much more environmentally friendly form of fuel production, producing alcohol for fuel. That is one possibility. Whatever the arrangements, we could choose nationally how we subsidised our agriculture. I am sure that we could do that while taking account of all the needs of the rural population, including farmers, as appropriate. I am sure that we would do a much better job of it than the CAP and the EU. Indeed, every country would do better.

We should have a proper and thorough study of the precise fiscal distributional effects of abolishing the CAP. What would happen to France? I have made a rough calculation that shows that abolition would not make that much difference. There might be a small cost equivalent to less then 1 per cent. of GDP if France were to subsidise its farmers directly rather than through the CAP. Indeed, the CAP is so inefficient and so corrupt that France might do a better job of it directly rather than through the CAP. Getting rid of the CAP would solve many of the problems.

Mr. Drew: I concur with my hon. Friend's view on the CAP. Does he agree that one of the problems with the recent budget was the many warm words that were spoken about moving towards rural development in place of targeted support based on production? When push came to shove, all the countries involved fell down on the obligation towards rural development and, again, sucked money back into direct support. That might have happened because of the French, but the British also fell into line. Surely that is shocking.

Kelvin Hopkins: My hon. Friend speaks with great expertise on agricultural matters, and I am pleased to receive his assistance. We should consider rural policies in terms of agricultural subsidies. Perhaps we should regenerate some of our livestock farming, which is so healthy for the countryside, and also good for wildlife and for the environment. That could be done if we had a national agricultural policy rather than having a system that is based on the CAP and the EU.

So often, those who take a critical view of these matters are said to be anti-European. I feel that I am strongly pro-European in the best sense. I was born in Europe, I speak a European language, I love European culture and I love European people. I happen not to believe that the construct that is called the European Union is a good idea as it stands. I believe that it should be substantially reformed. It is the EU construct that is wrong, not Europe. Europe is a wonderful place.

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that those of us who are critical of the EU construct can call ourselves genuine internationalists? We believe that it is immoral that so many billions should be sucked into subsidising agribusiness when much smaller sums could be provided to help and support agriculture in the third world.

Kelvin Hopkins: My hon. Friend is right. On the point of internationalism, those of us who take a critical view of the EU and the CAP have strong international links with other social democratic and socialist parties on the continent. We have regular meetings with the members of those parties. We try to put forward more progressive social democratic approaches to dealing with European policies.

Angus Robertson: While not agreeing with everything that the hon. Gentleman said, I concur with his internationalist agenda. Is he aware that the unreformed European Union, as it currently stands, is putting some countries off joining? I advise him to read the current edition of The Economist, which outlines the difficulties the Icelandic Government have with possible membership because of the disastrous common fisheries policy. Should that not also be reformed, otherwise the financial problems will continue?

Kelvin Hopkins: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his intervention. I agree about the commons fisheries policy. The European Union would be much more attractive to existing members, as well as to potential new members, if it worked better and was seen to be more just, fair and effective. I can think of a number of ways in which it should be reformed. However, I wish to stick to the topic of the budget and how the money is spent.

The other matter about which I am concerned, as is the Department for International Development, is the aid budget. That budget is spent ineffectively, is subject to some corruption and goes to the wrong places. It has been heavily criticised by DFID Ministers, both privately and publicly. I have suggested two possibilities for that budget. The first is that it should be repatriated and member states should be required to contribute a proportion of their GDP to aid. Perhaps the proportion might be higher for the richest nations. There should be a formulaic approach to aid so that we make sure we pay enough, but it should be distributed through national Governments or national Governments in collaboration.

The second suggestion involves DFID, because it is recognised as doing a good job with aid and as not being corrupt. I have not supported some of its policies regarding privatisation, but it is highly regarded. I have the greatest regard for our present Secretary of State for International Development, whom I have heard speak on many occasions, who does an extremely good job. If the aid budget for the European Union were handed over to Britain to manage on a franchise basis, I am sure that we would do a much better job than the European Union and that the aid would go to the right places. Some of the problems with that budget relate to the fact that national interests dictate that some aid goes to slightly richer countries around the rim of the Mediterranean rather than to sub-Saharan Africa where the need is greatest. We have to repatriate the aid budget or introduce fundamental reforms, perhaps even hand it over to DFID to manage. With our present Secretary of State, we would do a good job.

Other aspects of the European Union budget will cause problems. It irritates me when I walk through my town centre and see a large notice, with a big, blue flag with yellow stars on it, saying that the town is to be modernised with money from the European Union. We are massive net contributors to that budget. It is our money, not the European Union's money, that is paying for the modernisation, but the EU gives the impression that it is a benign Father Christmas delivering money to Britain, when actually we are Father Christmas giving money to the European Union. I am not suggesting that we should not give fairly to the budget. Indeed, I have suggested on many occasions that if we had a budget in which contributions and receipts were exactly proportional to living standards in member states, so that richest give most and the poorest receive most, that could be seen to be fair. One could just look at a sliding scale and see a graph of how it worked. Everybody would say that that system was fine and they would sign up to it. But the current budget does not work like that; the CAP distorts it and makes it look unfair.

Mr. Cash: The hon. Gentleman refers to structural funds and suggests that we should give as much as we reasonably can and be fair in giving money to other countries. Does not that belie the fundamental point that structural funds are at the heart of regionalisation, which has a severely adverse impact on the United Kingdom—on hospitals, ambulance services, the police, fire authorities and so on? The whole process is disintegrating under the guise of the creation of a more centralised system, which is of course what the EU really is.

Kelvin Hopkins: I was about to say that national Governments should distribute funding according to their needs; they should make the judgment about which of their regions needs money. Indeed, the Chancellor has suggested that as and when our regional fund benefits disappear, as poorer member states join, extra funds will be substituted by the Treasury, which is right. However, we in the House are the best judges of which regions need more or less money. We should make those decisions and the situation is the same for other countries. Distribution should be proportionate to relative GDP per head in member states and they should make their own decisions.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman's point about regionalisation. I am seriously concerned that building up the regions is an attempt to play down the Governments of member nation states. I cannot accept that. Member state Governments are the political entities in which the majority of people believe. I do not suggest that nation states should be nationalistic, but national Governments should have the final responsibility for the welfare of their citizens. The central Governments of member states should have that democratic role, which should not be undermined by the EU building up the regions and playing down member state Governments. That would be a great mistake.

We have an ongoing problem with the European Union. We are tinkering at the edges of the corruption and incompetence with which the budget is managed, and fundamental change will be necessary if we are to overcome the problems. We have to deal with the fundamental problem that people and institutions in the member states—farmers and so on—are spending other people's money and that that is somehow all right. It has even been suggested that the glue holding the EU together is the fact that money is sloshing about and everybody gets a bit of the action. That is not the way to approach democratic politics. We should know what we are spending our money on and vote to spend it as appropriate, collectively in democratic member states and, where necessary, at minimal level, through the EU.

As the Government have said many times, the EU should be an association of independent, democratic member states working together for their mutual benefit, where appropriate. It should not be the beginnings of a European superstate, which many of us would reject.

Susan Kramer (Richmond Park) (LD): I apologise for not being in the Chamber at the start of the debate. I did not for a moment believe that merchant shipping would not take up the full time allocated—it was unexpectedly treated with brevity.

I shall set out our position and suggest some directions that we should like reform to take. Whether the issue is fraud, error or irregularity, Liberal Democrats take it extremely seriously. It is completely unacceptable that, for the 11th successive year, the ECA cannot sign off the EU's accounts with a positive statement of assurance.

I am conscious, however, that we need to be careful about throwing stones—as other Members have remarked. As the House knows, the EU presents its accounts for audit in a global fashion, whereas in the UK we present them Department by Department. As others have pointed out, the National Audit Office has qualified the accounts of the Department for Work and Pensions on more than one occasion, so if there was a global set of UK accounts, they would all be qualified. The uncertainty and mistrust that flow from unsatisfactory sets of accounts undermine the whole purpose and image of the EU, so we want to tackle the problem as aggressively as possible.

May I propose three ways in which we could tackle the issue? First, as the House is well aware, 80 per cent. of the EU budget or approximately €65 billion is spent by the nation states. Policy is set at EU level, but the responsibility for spending and payment, primarily of the common agricultural policy subsidies and the structural funds, is delegated to national level. The European Parliament, in its discharge report on the last annual budget, called for national Finance Ministers to sign off a national statement of assurance for each member country, with the goal of making sure that each member state takes full and proper responsibility for spending and payments inside its national boundaries. Ministers rejected that at the last European Council—they are not anxious to be accountable to the European Parliament. At a minimum, however, a key national body, whether the NAO in this country or an equivalent body in other countries, ought to take on that responsibility, as we need a detailed audit trail from the bottom to the top. It could be constructed as a pyramid, with each audit built on a sound audit at the level below. We could then begin to force each nation to face up to its responsibilities as a member of the EU.

Once national statements are made, as my hon. Friend the Member for Solihull (Lorely Burt) suggested, we can begin to consider the issue of penalties. It is not acceptable for people to recognise that information is not properly controlled or monitored year after year and that there is a potential for error or fraud but to fail to take reasonable action. The total elimination of payments may not be required but a penalty could be imposed. As the EU grows and more countries join as a result of accession, there is a danger that those countries will not put in place the proper auditing structures, controls and monitoring. By starting on the wrong foot, we will compound the problem and the issue will escape us in its complexity.

Secondly, the Commission's internal system of controls is a concern. We cannot place the whole problem on the shoulders of the nation states. It is unacceptable that parliamentary recommendations have not been followed, as they require key members of the Commission to sign off essential reports such as the annual activity reports and declarations on which the synthesis report is based. Whether it is a director general, the secretary general or the internal auditor who is accountable, there must be a structure so that the Commission takes internal responsibility far more aggressively and positively for the accounts that it presents.

Thirdly, we have often talked about tolerance of the risk of error. The NAO has a tolerance rate of about 1 per cent., as it accepts that there is a point at which chasing error is far more costly than the error itself. There is therefore an acceptable benchmark, but as discussions proceed in the EU it is critical that the error tolerance rate should be very low. It could be 1 per cent., as it is in the NAO. We must treat the EU as a sophisticated, developed organisation and, if we are to have confidence in it, we should not apply the standards that we would attach to overseas aid to developing countries.

Finally, when the EU talks to the developing world and tells the United Nations that it must be careful about the way in which it offers aid to new and emerging economies it should make certain that it is purer than Caesar's wife. We take a proactive stand over and over again, telling developing countries that they must clean up their auditing act, but for us to do so from a position where we can be criticised strikes me as unacceptable.

I speak as a pro-European. There is nothing less acceptable to a pro-European than to sit by and look at an unreformed EU that permits a relatively low standard of auditing to continue year after year. For the credibility of the European Union, which I consider to be an important part of our future, we must pursue the kind of reforms suggested in the road map, and we probably have to go beyond that.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I shall keep my remarks brief. The debate is time-limited and most of the points have been covered in interventions and in the wonderful speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Kelvin Hopkins)—the annual event. We always look forward to it. We know that the content will be riveting and the meaning profound. I entirely sign up to what he says, especially about the CAP.

I know that we have all been assiduous and read every last dot and comma of the light reading that comes with the debate. As the hon. Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois) said, one needs to approach these matters with some degree of scepticism. The Minister was positively Panglossian in his assessment. It is not an easy line to defend on behalf of the Government, because all is not right in the court of Brussels. I make no apologies for being sceptical. I wish to see a better European organisation, whether that is the EU or a subsequent body.

The strength of the EU is that it is drawing in more and more countries. To be fair to those new entrants, they are faced with an enormous dilemma. Having spoken to representatives of those countries, I know that they are levered into a position in which they would not want to be. The Maastricht constriction immediately does enormous damage to those economies. Even though they may grow in the short run because of the benefits of the single European market, they subsequently have to make compromises, in the form of changes to their agricultural system and in response to the manufacturing pressures brought to bear on them, which often entail massive redundancies.

These circumstances are directly relevant to the financial structure. The Maastricht criteria are far too restrictive and far too likely to lead to structural problems of the worst kind. Some of us would go much further, but I hope we will recognise that we owe a duty to the EU to make sure that its auditing and financial control are hundreds of per cent. better than they have been so far. They have been lamentable, resulting in the divorce between the peoples and the governance of the EU, reflected more recently in the divorce between national Governments and their electorates. That is why we will never revisit the European constitution because, if anything, the votes would be even more overwhelmingly against. That is why we could not hold a vote in the UK. The Government could not be seen to hold a vote that they knew they were bound to lose.

Kelvin Hopkins: I draw my hon. Friend's attention to developments in the past week or two in France, where Monsieur de Villepin has strongly supported the idea of the French retaining national champions and not allowing takeovers by other European nations. Does that not suggest a degree of concern that the nation state is being submerged in a superstate and that some member states are having second thoughts about retaining their own democratic and economic institutions?

Mr. Drew: I need say no more than that I entirely agree with my hon. Friend.

I should like to do some textual analysis. It is always welcome that those who can do so try to synthesise the various documents. We try to read them, but they are long on words and short on meaning. I welcome the recently revealed National Audit Office document on the financial management of the European Union. With the best will in the world, it is hardly a glowing endorsement of the EU. It says of the Court of Auditors:

> "The Court did not give a positive opinion on the legality and regularity of the transactions for the following expenditure headings: the Common Agricultural Policy", which is 40 per cent.-plus of the budget, "Structural Measures"—how much more of the budget does that include?—

> "internal policies; external actions; and pre-accession aid."

What is left? That is our own NAO putting the boot in, not terribly subtly, but necessarily overtly. That is the sensible way in which it has to deal with these matters, and I commend it for doing so.

This is not just down to the EU itself but down to the way in which it works with its member states. However, it is of course the EU's responsibility to deal with these problems. I had a go at OLAF in an intervention on my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary. As he said, OLAF is in its infancy. My hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor), who is no longer in his place, reminded me that OLAF was set up in 1999. I know that it is easy to criticise Governments for failing to deliver and for always coming up with good intentions but being unable to follow them up with the detailed plans that we would want. However, we are now seven years into the operation of OLAF. It may have a long way to go, but if it has not got very far in seven years, I hate to think how long it will take before it really cracks the whip and begins to bear down on the corruption and anti-fraud measures that it needs to bring in.

Mr. Cash: The hon. Gentleman rightly referred to the rather blunt criticisms of the Public Accounts Committee and the National Audit Office in respect of the Court of Auditors as part of the chain. Criticisms of OLAF include the point that

> "There is no independent control of the legality of investigative actions."

It cannot get much worse than that.

Mr. Drew: I tried to get hon. Members to give examples of where OLAF and other EU apparatus have really been able to get hold of those who have defrauded the EU and take their money away. All that happens, at best, is a slight tap on the wrist. That is not good. It goes back to the point about new entrants, who have to live with this legacy. They have to come in and say that they are going to behave themselves when they have nothing to go by as a yardstick. That is not acceptable. Unless we put our house in order, the new entrants, including the Romanians, the Bulgarians, the Croatians and perhaps the Turks in due course, will have nothing to live up to but plenty to live down to.

The danger is that we will simply let the matter slip through for one more year. The general public heavily criticise us for not examining what happens in the EU carefully—it is a criticism that they always advance. They say that we are not doing our job properly. I have every sympathy with our hon. Friends who serve on the European Scrutiny Committee, who do wonderful work. However, we never do it on the Floor of the House because it appears to be too complicated, we have too little time and we are told that we will not understand the issues. The work is therefore all dumped upstairs.

[Mr. Drew]

Every year, we tip the hat and say, "What can we do about it?" It is the same as allowing an alcoholic another drink. We always say, "It's going to be different. It'll be sorted out tomorrow. It'll definitely be sorted out for the next accession states", but it never is. Hon. Members should take account of that and do much more.

Angus Robertson: Why does the hon. Gentleman think that only 14 or 15 hon. Members perceive the issue to be important enough to turn up to listen to the debate?

Mr. Drew: I agree—it is a tragedy that so few hon. Members are present. If one gives people a doorstep to scrutinise, some think that that is not what they were elected to Parliament to do. That is part of the problem. However, that is why they should be here. I appreciate that we have much else to do and that many other debates and important meetings are going on, but there is nothing more important than our relationship with the EU, which is fundamentally flawed and on which our views are divorced from those of the electorate.

Mr. Davidson: Few hon. Members attend such debates because we hold the same debate year after year about the iniquities, dishonesty, fraud and waste of the EU. We all agree that something needs to be done but nothing is. It is therefore difficult to get people to attend yet another debate on exactly the same subject.

Mr. Drew: Perhaps some of us should be more willing to scrutinise and to draw a line in the sand. We are all pushed to acquiesce in the unacceptable position. Some Labour Back Benchers have not been positive about what is going on. Perhaps if other quarters listened to them—the official Opposition may be rethinking their policy but at least they have been critical of the EU's auditing and financial control—we could all learn a lesson. It is up to us as parliamentarians to do something about it. I shall leave the matter now but some of us will make our reservations felt.

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher and Walton) (Con): I came to the debate with a light heart and a racing pulse. The excitement was undimmed by the 1,000 pages that were handed to me and I am immensely impressed with our current Front-Bench spokesman, my hon. Friend the Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois), who had clearly read every page. That shows Opposition at the cutting edge.

The genuine reason for my excitement was that I knew that my good and hon. Friend the Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) would seek to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker. We are the Mars and Venus of Conservative European policy and I therefore believed that it was incumbent on me to make a contribution.

The EU clearly has considerable problems. The hon. Member for Luton, North (Kelvin Hopkins) referred to several. There is anxiety about protectionism and anti-globalisation reaction, which is unsustainable but nevertheless an attempt by various Governments to curry favour with their electorate rather than explain the realities of life. The interesting irony is that we have not given sufficient powers to the Commission and the European Court of Justice to intervene in such matters. It will be interesting to see whether the Commission will take on the French Prime Minister and the French President over the way in which they have attempted to merge the Compagnie de Suez and Gaz de France in an almost transparent attempt to block an Italian takeover. That is not the subject of this debate, but it is actually quite material.

Those of us who believe that it is in Britain's national interest to continue to be an active member of the European Union despite its imperfections must also accept that those imperfections need to be taken on and challenged. It is therefore perfectly right that the European Scrutiny Committee and others should deliberate on the concerns about the budget.

I would like the Commission to be more powerful—and more open—but that power can be properly exercised only if there is public confidence in the Commission and its procedures. In the case of the budget, we have seen serious errors, year in, year out, and serious matters of concern for the Court of Auditors. That institution was set up by the last Conservative Government, precisely because we were concerned about the lack of transparency in budgetary procedures. More recently the organisation known as OLAF was set up. Those organisations have begun to take on some of the problems, but they have not made sufficient progress. The fact that about a third of the budget has now been approved represents gratifying progress, but it is clearly not sufficient.

I call to the attention of the House the remarks of my European parliamentary colleague, Richard Ashworth, who has said:

"The Commission has belatedly begun to put in place measures that should tighten budgetary control and enhance transparency. It is important that those measures succeed".

I entirely agree with him. He is the Conservative budget spokesman in the European Parliament, an institution that is growing in stature, although it is sometimes dismissed as unimportant. This is not a zero sum game: the European Parliament has a valuable role to play in areas with which this House does not deal. I am delighted that our Conservative colleagues there are playing an active role in the European Parliament in conjunction with our good allies in the European People's party.

Mr. Cash: On my hon. Friend's point about Venus and Mars, may I point out that I would rather adopt the position of Mars than of Venus in this context? Does he acknowledge that our colleague, Richard Ashworth MEP, also said:

"Trust in the integrity of the accounting systems of public bodies is an essential cornerstone of democracy. It is not, therefore, acceptable that the Court of Auditors continue to fail to give a clean bill of health for the EU accounts and the public perception that the EU authorities have an ongoing reluctance to address this problem seriously undermines the credibility of the whole of the EU."

I am not criticising my hon. Friend for leaving that bit out, but I thought that I should mention it.

Mr. Taylor: I am delighted that we Conservatives are always united on these matters. I agree that the failure of the scrutiny and approval of the budget undermines the status and authority of the Commission. I would like to see that status and authority enhanced, alongside the pre-eminent body in the European Union, the Council of Ministers, of which I was a member several times during my ministerial career—

Mr. Cash: What about the Court of Justice?

Mr. Taylor: My hon. Friend asks me that question from a sedentary position. Perhaps he is getting tired of standing up to make his interventions. The Court of Justice provides an important way of enforcing the measures that are agreed to by the Ministers in Council. Indeed, a previous speaker referred to the importance of the Commission taking note, but, in many cases, it is the Ministers who give the Commission instructions to take note. An example is ECOFIN—of which our Chancellor is a member—which is very much involved in attempting to ensure that there is reform and improvement in the institutions of the European Union. The point that I am making is that those of us who believe that it is in Britain's national interest to be in the European Union also believe that the European Union should be reformed and that it should make every effort to overcome the inadequacies that exist, most notably in regard to the issue that we are discussing this evening.

Of course we must have a sense of context. It has always been said that the number of people employed by the European Union institutions is roughly equivalent to the number employed by the county of Staffordshire. I have long since forgotten how many people are employed by the country of Staffordshire, but we should appreciate that we are talking about a comparatively small number of people. That does not exonerate them from a failure to have their accounts properly audited and approved, but it puts the position in context. Sometimes the House, along with some of the British media, greatly exaggerate the apparent problems in the European Union.

Mr. Davidson: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the parallel he drew with Staffordshire is deliberately misleading and one of the myths that the European Union has long peddled? Many of Staffordshire's employees deliver services directly to the public, unlike members of the European Commission. A much more appropriate parallel could be drawn with a military general staff, who send out orders that will control thousands, if not millions, of people. That is a significant comparison, rather than a false comparison with an organisation that actually does some good.

Mr. Taylor: The hon. Gentleman clearly has a deep admiration for the people who work for the county of Staffordshire. I cannot even begin to understand how he knows about them, but the comparison is valid. The question of how good the workers are is separate.

While we are making comparisons, let me make another. The total EU budget was less than the budget for the Department of Health in 2004–05, at £71.5 billion. I am not saying that the Department of Health spends its budget better than the European Union but merely making a comparison of size. That does not reduce the importance of the accusation levelled against European Union institutions that fail to secure auditing of their accounts. I am talking about the context, which is sometimes blown out of proportion. The House rarely engages in three-hour debates—even debates attended by the number of people who are present this evening—on the way in which the Department of Health spends its budget, or on the fact that, as I mentioned earlier in an intervention, the budget of the Department for Work and Pensions has been unapproved by the National Audit Office on more than one occasion. I am trying to establish the context rather than evaluating the effectiveness.

It is important that a House of Lords Committee is to scrutinise the documents, and we shall pay close attention to its findings. I understand that it will consider a number of questions. For instance, what are the fundamental problems that have led to the accounts not being given a positive statement of assurance for the past 11 years? I am sure that the hearings on that question will be very interesting. Are the suggestions for improving management of the budget appropriate, will those improvements lead to a positive statement of assurance by the end of the tenure of the Barroso Commission, and can lessons be learned from accounting procedures in other countries? I look forward to all those deliberations, but the last point is particularly important.

It is in no way an exoneration of the Commission, in terms of its responsibility, to say that although national Governments contribute to the totality of the budget, 85 per cent. of the funds are then administered by member states. It is extremely important for member states to take responsibility for the proper administration of those funds. As they are predominantly funds to deal with agricultural problems, and structural funds, it is frustrating for the Commission that it gets all the flak while national Governments get very little.

It was suggested earlier that an independent investigation, the equivalent of a National Audit Office investigation, should be carried out to assess the performance of the Government of each member state. That is a good suggestion. The fact that it might amount to a supranational intervention does not deter me, although it might pose problems for some Members who have spoken today. However, it is very important that national Governments face up to their responsibilities, because in a sense, when they act on them badly they set a bad example not just to the Commission but to the new member countries. If Poland, which is a very considerable country itself, sees other countries not observing the rules, it might be tempted to go astray. So we must all set an example that will set the tone for how the budget and the Commission develop.

Whether we can improve matters by activity based budgeting or by accruals is a complex and difficult question, but the Government need to put much more pressure on the Commission than they have done to date. They have been in power since 1997, so discussing what we did before then is irrelevant. Those of us who believe that the European Union brings benefits to this country are profoundly concerned that those benefits are being distorted by public criticism—it is justified—of the management of moneys transferred to Brussels. That is diminishing the value of programmes such as aid, when in fact, in many countries, the aid budget, which is administered by the EU, is valued and highly regarded.

As one of those Opposition Members who has consistently believed that membership of the European Union is in Britain's national interest, I urge the Minister to reinvigorate his efforts to ensure that this matter is dealt with by the Barroso Commission. Barroso himself I find an impressive figure. He has had big issues to deal with. He is a former Prime Minister of a good ally of ours within the EU, and a very sharp and intelligent man. But he clearly needs help not just from other commissioners, but from the member states themselves, if this problem is to be brought under control.

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, South-West) (Lab/Co-op): I begin by paying tribute to the Minister's generosity in giving way so often during his opening remarks. It is worth my saying openly that we all welcome the opportunity that that provided to have a dialogue with him, and that many of his colleagues would do well to take lessons from him in that regard. He spoke for some time, and I must say in all honesty that he was not always wrong. I strongly agree with a number of points that he made, particularly his call for the European Union to do less and to do it better.

I want to return to a point that I made during an intervention about the road map. We have been promised for some time that the EU will behave better at some future point, but it never actually happens. We are now being promised that by the end of 2009—the end of the Barroso Commission—such problems will be resolved, but it is not clear what will happen if they are not. I am not aware of what the British Government believe should happen in those circumstances. I very much suspect that whoever the next Commissioner is—be it Peter Mandelson or someone else—we will simply carry on, saying, "We will try to resolve the situation by the end of this presidency." My worry is that this is a process without end, and it is for exactly that reason—because we see so little progress—that so few Members bother to attend these debates.

What tangible gains were made during the British presidency in terms of introducing a greater degree of financial probity? What did Britain achieve in that area that we can look back on with pride, saying, "That resolved some issues and resulted in a considerable improvement"? I am not aware of the British presidency's having resulted in many real achievements, although I entirely accept that the Government's heart was in the right place and that they made the right noises, said the right things and tried to move in the right direction. However, the achievements that they have to show for it are somewhat limited. It would also be helpful if the Minister were to clarify the steps being taken in conjunction with Austria and Finland to ensure that any minor gains achieved are being carried forward, so that demonstrable progress can be made.

The Public Accounts Committee regularly produces reports on EU financial management. One significant element of the most recent report was the attempt to simplify the rules governing the EU and all its operations. The complexity of the present regulations exacerbates the problems encountered in their operation. It has increased administrative difficulties and the opportunities for fraud, and it is not entirely clear that Britain has achieved as much in that regard as it might have wanted.

The Minister did not mention the question of the culture within which the EU operates, which I see as one of the main problems that we face. Britain is not perfect in that regard, but at least our attitude to waste, fraud, corruption and mismanagement is different. For instance, the National Audit Office and the PAC supervise the accounts, and we also pursue value-for-money studies and try to root out mis-spending or wasteful spending.

However, that approach is not replicated in the rest of the EU, and in an intervention on the Minister I asked about the fact that the European Court of Auditors did not produce value-for-money studies. It is notable that all the emphasis in the EU is on making sure that the money is not being stolen, rather than on making sure that it is being spent effectively.

I hope that the Government are willing to pursue such matters more vigorously in future. The "do less, better" approach is the one that we should adopt, but it is hard to believe that the Court of Auditors is doing so sufficiently vigorously. For example, on page 234 of the papers issued to hon. Members for this debate it is stated that the Court of Auditors budget remained at €84 million in 2003–04. It seemed to me that there was an opportunity in that period to "spend to save"—that is, to spend additional money in the Court of Auditors to make sure that money was spent more effectively elsewhere. In contrast, in the same period the budget for the European Parliament rose by 18 per cent., from €986 million to €1,166.

How can we take seriously the suggestion that the European Parliament is determined to curb wasteful expenditure when its own spending has risen by 18 per cent., and when MEPs maintain the farce of commuting every month between Strasbourg and Brussels? How can the British public believe that the EU is seriously interested in safeguarding taxpayer's money, when no one in this country supports such wastefulness—apart from the Liberal Democrats, of course. [Interruption.] I note that that remark has been met with universal acclamation, and no denial even from the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Susan Kramer), the only Liberal present.

Will we be given an opportunity to vote against this motion? It states only that the House "takes note" of these documents, but it seems a terrible waste of time to do the same thing year after year. It would be worth while for some hon. Members to vote against the motion, just to demonstrate that we are unhappy with the process. Presumably, the time will come when Parliament has an opportunity to vote against the EU budget and its extravagances, although I see that that possibility is well along the way to being rejected by the European Parliament. It has been reported that members of the Budgets Committee unanimously adopted a draft resolution yesterday that if talks on the next financial perspective fail.

After agreement has been reached between national Governments, the European Parliament has decided that the amount of money being spent is insufficient. Again, the only support for that in this country will come from the Liberal Democrats. We will have to proceed with a budget that already contains substantial amounts of pork, overspending and waste, and the European Parliament and the Liberal Democrats want to spend even more. Can my hon. Friend the Minister tell us when we will have the opportunity to vote against that?

7.10 pm

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): Important as this debate is, it also demonstrates the cultural inadequacy of the way in which the European Union conducts itself. On the issue of how taxpayers' money is spent, we can look back with some pride on the fact that the Public Accounts Committee was set up under Gladstone. Nor does anyone have any serious doubt that the National Audit Office and the Public Accounts Committee do a thorough job in identifying inadequacies and, where necessary, maladministration or fraud in the UK.

However, the report by the Court of Auditors on OLAF makes the following comments:

"The Office's investigations policy is still uncertain ... With regard to preliminary work ... analyses are still rudimentary ... Supervision of investigations by the Office's management has generally proved inadequate ... The duration of investigations has not been brought under control ... There is no system in place to measure investigators' actual workload or the time they spend on investigations ... The obligation to report investigations that are more than nine months old to the Supervisory Committee has had no notable effect ... It is still difficult to determine the actual results of investigations. In the area of internal investigations, little progress has been achieved since 1988 with regard to sanctions imposed."

As I mentioned in an earlier intervention, the report also stated:

"There is no independent control of the legality of investigative actions."

That is an average catalogue of condemnation of the so-called efficiency of a body that was, as the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) said, set up some seven years ago. That is what the Court of Auditors is still saying about it.

The importance of that criticism is that OLAF is at the hard end of the so-called investigations of malfeasance in respect of taxpayers' money. We have heard reference before to the question of irregularities, and I gave some figures earlier, which I shall briefly rehearse again. In 2004, for the European Agricultural Guidance and Guarantee Fund there were irregularities of €82,064,000. On the structural measures, irregularities for that year totalled €531,744,438. The sum to be recovered was €357 million. The amount declared irrecoverable, pending a formal decision, was €15 million. Those are facts, and I take them from the official documents.

Mr. Ian Taylor rose—

Mr. Cash: I shall certainly give way to my hon. Friend, whether he comes from Venus, Jupiter or Uranus.

Mr. Taylor: Will my hon. Friend also note, however, that the president of the Court of Auditors said that the court concluded that the 2004 consolidated statement faithfully reflected revenue and expenditure for the year and the financial situation of the Communities at the year end, save in respect of sundry debtors? The court went on to say that it had inadequate confidence in the way that member states were administering the budget for the common agricultural policy and structural funds. One needs to put in context what is causing the problem and what is not.

Mr. Cash: I hear what my hon. Friend says, but I must mention again what I have said on a number of occasions. Indeed, I made a specific point in respect of the European Communities (Finance) Act 1995, when six of my colleagues lost the Whip, not over Maastricht but over European finance. I tabled an amendment to deal with the relationship between member states and the EU's financial management. In summary, I worked things out, spoke to the Comptroller and Auditor General and came to the conclusion that it was possible for the Public Accounts Committee and the National Audit Office to have much more direct control of the money administered in the United Kingdom as a member state.

Mr. Siôn Simon (Birmingham, Erdington) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Cash: I will not give way for the moment, if the hon. Gentleman does not mind.

In other words, the accountancy principles applied in the UK by the PAC and NAO would then have been applied to EU finances in the member states. That seemed to me a rather good idea. I will not go into all the detail, but I had 45 Members, or thereabouts, ready to vote with me on that question, and it can be fairly said that I was given assurances that those matters would be fully considered. However, to this day, some 10 years and more later, I am still waiting to hear either from the Government or from Conservative Front Benchers that we will adopt those principles to get proper control over the money that is spent in member states.

The Economic Secretary rightly said that such questions went to the heart of the EU's problems. My hon. Friend the Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois) rightly said that the whole question also related directly to the rebate, because the rebate is connected to financial management, and with the manner in which such operations are conducted. Furthermore—to refer to other contributions—it relates to the European aid budget for Africa, in which I have an interest, as the chairman of the all-party Uganda group and the vice-chairman of the all-party Kenya and Tanzania groups. I am deeply worried about corruption in Africa and the relationship between that and the manner in which the EU is failing to provide the kind of effective control and delivery in relation to financial management and the budget that we ought to expect.

[Mr. Cash]

Such things are not simply technical questions, and this large stepping stone of papers that I have in my hands—I can assure hon. Members that it is pretty heavy—contains an enormous problem that goes to the heart of the way in which the EU operates. It does not work. It is ineffective. It is not operating even according to the terms that the Court of Auditors, or, indeed, the Government, present to us.

The Minister referred to the question of nation states, and said that some rogue states might in future fail to carry themselves properly on these important questions. We already have the example of the stability and growth pact, whose rules it is perfectly obvious that people did not comply with. My hon. Friend the Member for Esher and Walton (Mr. Taylor) rightly pointed out that it is essential in matters of this kind that the rule of law be complied with. It is equally clear that there is no intention to do that, and several hon. Members have made the point that we have every reason to doubt whether there is any real desire or intent to carry through on compliance with the rules of the European Union.

That calls into question the whole fabric, the whole system, the whole framework of the current European Union, which has led me to believe that the best way to act would be to have a form of associate status. I do not need to enlarge on that, having spoken about it on a number of occasions. At least, however, it would get us away from what I regard as a largely fraudulent approach to the European Union, which is to say that we want things to improve, while seeing almost no serious change taking place in spite of the fact that reforms are proposed in documents such as those before us that clearly have not been carried through. There are also the reforms of the Lisbon agenda, which again have been proposed but not carried through.

We need to be quite transparent and decisive. We need to be honest with the British people about the deficiencies in the way in which the system functions. We must not roll out yet another fudge, year after year after year. We must tackle the problem. I challenge the Government—and, indeed, my own Front Bench—to be less reticent in their arguments. I do not mean this to refer for one moment to my hon. Friend the Member for Rayleigh, but there is a tendency for an eerie silence to descend on the European issue.

Mr. Drew: Is not the problem the way in which we debate these issues in the House? It is not acceptable that these documents are merely to be noted.

Mr. Cash: I agree—on which note, I shall sit down.

Angus Robertson (Moray) (SNP): While I speak on behalf of the Scottish National party and Plaid Cymru, I want to make a number of points not yet raised from the perspective of the European Scrutiny Committee, on which I sit. Notwithstanding the sensible point made by the Minister about much of the problem that we have discussed being the fault of the member states, and notwithstanding the excellent point made by the hon. Member for Esher and Walton (Mr. Taylor) about the scale of fraud being less than that of benefit fraud in the United Kingdom, we agree across the House that some serious issues need to be dealt with when we consider the situation, warts and all.

The context of the fraud should not be overlooked. A series of senior officials involved in audit and financial management have suffered personally—a point I made to the Minister earlier in an intervention. Those are people who brought maladministration and financial mismanagement to light, and they cannot all be publicity seeking cranks. There are serious questions about the governance of OLAF, which was, as hon. Members will recall, instrumental in bringing about the arrest and detention of one Mr. Hans-Martin Tillack, a Stern journalist who had published articles critical of financial management in the Commission. According to evidence given to our sister Committee in the Lords in 2004 by the chairman of the OLAF supervisory committee, that raid was triggered by hearsay evidence from one informant in the public relations office of the Commission, and a witness thought that any normal person would have to say that OLAF was "probably trying to get back at this man".

That is not an isolated case, because similar events have occurred in a series of cases. The fraud issue is serious and improvements need to be made.

The financial changes outlined by the Minister are supposed to be integral to the Commission's reform programme. That matter was discussed in the European Scrutiny Committee only last week, when the Government's reaction was described as "supine and unquestioning", which is a serious comment. The hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz) has said that he is content with the standard of benchmarking, but the Committee does not think that the Commission's benchmarking proposals on the reform programme are adequate. In particular, the Committee has noted

"the almost complete absence of any quantification of the results said to have been achieved, and even of any kind of external independent evaluation."

The Government need to raise that serious shortcoming in the Council of Ministers.

On the budget being qualified for 11 consecutive years, it is ludicrous that the Commission aspires to becoming "a leader" in the field of public sector financial management, because it has a long way to go. The situation is unacceptable and it must be addressed.

In the previous Parliament, the European Scrutiny Committee pointed out the weaknesses in protection in the revised EC staff regulations for officials bringing maladministration and wrongdoing to the attention of EU institutions and the public. The Minister would be right to say that the situation in the EU institutions compares unfavourably with the rule in the civil service in the UK, where a protected disclosure could be made by any Minister of the Crown. The UK Government can and should do something in the Council of Ministers, and they should not respond to such documents in a way that Committee members from both sides of the political divide have described as "supine and unquestioning".

I am not Eurosceptic—I believe passionately in the European Union, I am in favour of the reform of the European Union and my position on the common fisheries policy is well known in this House. However, unless we examine the challenges, describe them for what they are and do something about them, we will have the same debate for another 11 years, in which case trust in the EU institutions, which are worthy, will continue to plummet.

Mr. Robert Goodwill (Scarborough and Whitby) (Con): I was fascinated to hear the Economic Secretary say that he believes in the EU. I know that it is in vogue to take direction from an overarching authority, but the EU is something in which I believe, in so far as it exists, but I do not believe that it has a coherent system of financial accountability.

I must declare an interest—as someone who farms modestly in Yorkshire, I am eligible for my share of the €43 billion out of a total of €100 billion. Little has been paid incorrectly to farmers this year, because little has been paid at all. The Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs system is so complex that it rules out the possibility of fraud, but DEFRA has so many officials that it probably wastes an equivalent sum on administration—there are now more DEFRA officials than there are dairy farmers in England.

Until 2004, I was a Member of the European Parliament, where, as a member of the Environment Committee, I was budget rapporteur between 2002 and 2004. A particular bugbear of that Committee was the way in which the LIFE—the financial instrument for the environment—third countries programme is administered. The programme is for environmental projects outside the EU and the Committee was especially concerned about financial probity in relation to money deployed in the west bank and Gaza strip. I did not look to see whether it was referred to in the documents because I know that the Commission had difficulty finding an inspector who was prepared to go and look at those projects, but it is a concern.

Last November, once again the European Parliament enacted what has become an annual ritual by refusing to sign off the EU's accounts for the 11th year running. It is almost as predictable as the arrival of Alsatian asparagus or Beaujolais nouveau that the European Court of Auditors will deliver a "negative statement of assurance"—a phrase reminiscent of "deferred success". We have been deferring success in this area for 11 years.

As the Minister rightly said, 80 per cent. of the budget is deployed by member state Governments, and the blame for many of the more blatant frauds—for example, those involving olive trees in Italy or flax in Spain—should be laid fairly and squarely at the door of the Governments involved, but not all of the money unaccounted for has been misappropriated. Attention was drawn to the UK's sheep annual premium scheme, for example. There was no suggestion that farmers misappropriated every single penny in the scheme, but the system in place before sheep were individually tagged meant that sheep could be counted twice by inspectors on different days. Such infringements were few and far between, but the system was not sufficiently robust to rule out the possibility of fraud. My hon. Friend the Member for Esher and Walton (Mr. Taylor) drew a parallel with the housing benefit system in the UK, but I do not think that the comparison is fair. We are talking about money given to 25 member states and a small number of NGOs, which is not the same as distributing large sums among large numbers of individuals.

Some EU funds are spent in a way that I believe is diametrically opposed to the wishes of the British people—for example, we spend €1 billion a year on subsidising the growing of tobacco, much of which is low quality and has to be sold on to third-world markets—and some of the money is wasted. Hon. Members who have perused the documents will have found on page 245 a reference to the Committee of the Regions. It is noted that the Committee has not been able to fill the auditor's post on a permanent basis. There is a story behind that. The Committee has 317 members from across Europe, each of whom costs £147,000—that figure does not include salaries. I discovered that fact by accident. When I was discussing another report in the European Parliament, it emerged that the Committee of the Regions also discussed reports, but no one listened to what it said. Is that Committee good value for money? Do right hon. and hon. Members receive feedback from their Committee of the Regions representatives? Do they even know who their representatives are?

When the financial auditor of the Committee of the Regions drew the Court of Auditors' attention to problems associated with members' travelling expenses during a meeting of CoCoBu—the Committee on Budgetary Control—the matter was played down by the auditors. Not until Members of the European Parliament—in particular Michiel van Hulten, a Socialist MEP from the Netherlands, and Chris Heaton-Harris, a Conservative—drew attention to it did those events emerge.

Mr. Francois: May I take this opportunity to place on the record the fact that Chris Heaton-Harris has been absolutely tireless in pursuing fraud and waste in the EU on behalf of the British taxpayer? I have worked closely with him and I commend the work that he has done on behalf of the people of this country.

Mr. Goodwill: I endorse my hon. Friend's comments.

Whistleblowers have a sad record in the EU. Paul Van Buitenen, who exposed the fraud that brought down the Santer Commission, was sacked by Commissioner Kinnock, now the noble Lord Kinnock. Incidentally, Mrs. Cresson, who was criticised for giving money to her dentist and whose pension was suspended, is now on half-pension, we are told.

Marta Andreasen, the first qualified accountant to be employed as chief accountant by the Commission, refused to sign off the accounts for the previous year when she was appointed. She was suspended by Commissioner Kinnock. In fact, I think it is scandalous that a Labour commissioner sent officials scurrying around Brussels in taxis issuing suspension notices to their employees—shades of Militant, dare I suggest. Marta Andreasen said that there were no systems in place to make sure that money was spent properly and that a double accounting system should have been in place.

I am proud that Paul Van Buitenen went to Edward McMillan-Scott, a British Conservative MEP, and that Marta Andreasen went to Chris Heaton-Harris, another

[Mr. Goodwill]

Conservative MEP. It is Conservative Members of the European Parliament who have been taking the lead in the fight against fraud. I am sure that when we form our new group with allies from eastern European countries, we will be even more effective in taking that forward.

Most recently, Dorte Schmidt-Brown raised concerns about EUROSTAT, the EU statistical service. It systematically siphoned off £3 million and kept two sets of books at its headquarters in Luxembourg, but no one was fired. All the staff concerned were redeployed and are now either still employed or drawing their pensions. As the new chief accountant of the European Commission, Brian Gray, has said, one can change the system, but it has proved impossible to change the culture. There is an environment of complicity. Why rock the boat when every whistleblower is suspended? If people keep quiet, they will keep their jobs.

I have a practical suggestion for the Minister about benchmarking—a term that I do not really like. It would be very useful when monitoring what is going on with the finances of the EU if each directorate-general of the Commission were individually to measure progress. The present system of issuing a positive or negative statement is too broad a brush. We would get much more value from more detailed information from the directorates-general.

Mr. Ivan Lewis: With the leave of the House, I shall respond to the debate.

Elements of the debate have been good—I wish I could say that the whole debate had been good. [Interruption.] I will not name the elements that have been good and the ones that have been not so good, but I am looking carefully at the Opposition Benches. The debate is important and it is probably good that it has taken place on the Floor of the House rather than in Committee, which has not happened for a considerable time. It is important that the issues are aired transparently.

I will try to respond directly to the different issues and questions that were raised by hon. Members. The hon. Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois) basically claimed, as he did before we concluded the negotiations, that the deal that the British presidency secured on the financial perspective was in some ways bad. That is complete nonsense. For the first time, the United Kingdom is paying roughly the same as France and Italy. The budget is generally on a downward trend. The abatement will be worth more in the next period than in this and a process now exists to lead to the necessary reform of the common agricultural policy. We would settle for all those elements as a fair and reasonable agreement on the financial perspective. Many people believed that the British presidency would not be able to secure a deal on the financial perspective and the Conservative party was desperately disappointed when we achieved that.

Mr. Francois: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Lewis: No, I will not.

The hon. Gentleman also asked me about the Government's opinion on when the accounts will be 100 per cent. cleared. It is the Commission's stated objective that the qualified assessment will be removed by 2009. We think that it is good that the Barroso Commission has set itself that target and we welcome that, but we cannot be sure that all the necessary measures will be in place to achieve it. There is still a lot of work to be done before we can be sure that it will be achieved.

The hon. Gentleman asked for an update on the progress of accruals accounting. I have become an expert on accruals accounting in recent times and there is good news. The Commission successfully met the deadline to implement the new system in January 2005. The transition to the new system was successful and there is an ongoing process to develop that system. The European Court of Auditors queried whether the production of the 2005 opening balance would be ready in time. The Commission assures us that it is on track.

The hon. Gentleman asked also what would happen to the debt-for-GDP ratio if off-balance-sheet figures are taken into account. I think that he was expecting me to write back on the matter. I apologise for the letter not having arrived. The Office for National Statistics classified public debt based on agreed national accounting rules, SA95. It is nonsensical to add contingent liabilities to GDP calculations as they do not apply to other member states. There is no figure with which the UK could make a comparison, nor is there any implication in relation to stability and growth. The issue is not relevant.

The hon. Gentleman asked whether the abatement concession was included in figures for the United Kingdom's contributions that were published in the pre-Budget report and whether it would be included in the figures for the Budget. As far as we are concerned, the PBR was in line with the code for fiscal stability, which as always contained cautious assumptions, a point which I made to the hon. Gentleman at the time. From memory, the negotiations at that time were ongoing. Therefore, any assumption would be an assumption. We were cautious. The figures will be updated now in the usual way at the time of the Budget.

The hon. Gentleman asked also for some examples of how the road map objectives would be achieved. The major actions that will improve assurance are improving internal controls in the Commission and in member states to the standards that are proposed by the European Court of Auditors, promoting further simplification of complex legislation—the ECA says that this will lead to improvements—reaching a political agreement with the European Parliament on the level of risk that is tolerable, and introducing greater involvement of national audit offices. As many Members have suggested, our NAO is very willing to help in that regard.

I have tried to address all the specific issues raised by the hon. Gentleman. My hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Kelvin Hopkins) spoke for the 11th successive year on these issues. He made an informed and intelligent contribution, but I cannot say that I agreed with everything that he said. That may come as a surprise to right hon. and hon. Members. However, my hon. Friend tried to make a constructive contribution.

I hope that the career of the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Susan Kramer) will not suffer as a result of her enthusiastic support for the recent unsuccessful leadership bid of the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Chris Huhne). The hon. Lady asked about some important points, including the Commission having an appropriate system of accountability. The directors-general of the Commission already sign declarations of assurance. From now on the Commission's chief accountant will sign off the accounts. That is a further strengthening.

The hon. Lady asked also about the National Audit Office and what the United Kingdom might do. We were the first member state to provide a response to the annual report of the ECA. That is a process and obligation that is now in the EU's financial regulation. We have already cleared the way to support the idea of management level declarations. We were fully prepared to support this at Council. We are certainly interested in making better use of the NAO to audit our management of EU funds.

We did not make the level of progress that we would have liked on that because many member states did not feel able to support that approach. That is because they have highly federal or regional structures. The UK has a pretty impressive record in recent times in trying to drive the agenda forward during our presidency and also in making contributions in Council whenever possible.

The contribution of my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) was thoughtful and constructive. He is frank about his scepticism. Most of the time it is a balanced scepticism. I think that he conceded that there has been some progress in recent times although he feels that there has been nowhere near enough progress. That is a reasonable point to make.

Mr. Drew: Given the words in the Order Paper, on which we may either be voting or not this evening, what progress will the Government make through the Economic Secretary to ensure that the criticism that has been voiced on both sides of the Chamber is taken seriously and that the fraud issues to which he has referred have been taken up?

Mr. Lewis: When I realised that one of my responsibilities during the past few months was linked to the EU budget for 2006 and the question of audit, I made it clear that we would be proactive in regarding this issue as a priority during our presidency, which we tried to make it. Commissioner Kallas felt that the UK presidency was crucial in making the road map proposal work. Beyond the UK presidency, we now have to take a lead role in maintaining the pressure on these issues if we are not to come back here year after year and hear the same old story. I will give my hon. Friend a commitment that, in my role, I will continue to take this issue seriously. I know that the Chancellor, in his contribution in ECOFIN meetings, as he always has been in this country, is constantly concerned about making sure that financial probity is central.

I come to the contribution by the hon. Member for Esher and Walton (Mr. Taylor). He always makes well-informed, measured, sensible contributions on this and many other issues. I am sorry to damage his career even more than it has been damaged in recent years by the honourable positions that he has taken on these issues. They have been honourable because anybody in the Conservative party who has taken a balanced view on Europe has seen his career suffer as a consequence of those judgments. All too often, it has been easy to pander to a gallery—the Eurosceptic gallery—and give a false, out-of-context impression of the European Union. The hon. Gentleman has always resisted doing that in the same way as the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) has, which is one of the reasons why he never became Leader of the Conservative party and why it chose such excellent leaders during the past few years as alternatives.

As for the Mars and Venus analogy, I shall leave it to Members to decide who is in which category. Perhaps they can discuss that later. I assure the hon. Member for Esher and Walton that the Government will continue to exert pressure on these issues, because anybody who believes in the vision and concept of the European Union knows that it is essential that we make progress on this in terms of the credibility and integrity of the EU and the relationship it has with its taxpayers. If we do not make progress on this, it will be a stick for sceptics to beat the European Union with year after year. They will deliberately present this out of context.

My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, South-West (Mr. Davidson), who was very well informed on these issues, said that I had spoken at length and was not "all wrong". I am not sure whether that will do me much good, but I regard it as a major compliment from my hon. Friend. I have already explained what I believe the achievements of our presidency were on these issues. I do not think the road map would have been taken forward if we had not prioritised it in our presidency. However, it is the beginning of a process; the delivery of it will make all the difference. My hon. Friend also expressed concern about the culture of the European Union. We have to find it encouraging that there are signs within the new Commission of a different culture that takes these issues seriously and understands the great challenges that lie ahead, whether they are globalisation or the gap that has grown in recent times in the relationship between the European Union and the citizens of Europe. I believe that there is some encouragement in the attitude of the new Commission in understanding that there has to be cultural change.

My hon. Friend also asked when the UK Parliament will have an opportunity to vote "against the EU budget". I shall turn that into "on the UK budget", which is a more objective view. In accordance with our procedures, a European Community finance Bill will be an opportunity to vote on these issues.

The hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) made a contribution that reinforced his prejudices. He has always been honest about these issues. He wants the United Kingdom to adopt a form of associated status in the European Union. Long may he continue to speak loudly and clearly on these issues at every opportunity, and long may he be an example of how any appearance that the Conservative party is moving to the centre of politics, whether in this country or internationally, is mere pretence. They are as right-wing and ideological as ever—the hon. Member for Stone is proudly nodding his head—which I am sure will become clear in the months and years ahead.

[Mr. Lewis]

The hon. Member for Moray (Angus Robertson) talked of the importance of exposing fraud while not targeting whistleblowers who give information. As I said, I cannot comment on individual cases or circumstances, which would be entirely inappropriate, but the first thing that anyone in an organisation should do is to report any suggestion of fraud or maladministration to management. If they do not take the information seriously or try to cover it up, there is legitimacy in the person feeling obliged to make it public knowledge, in many cases. Whistleblowers have played an honourable role in bringing to the public's attention all sorts of maladministration and fraud.

The hon. Member for Scarborough and Whitby (Mr. Goodwill) intervened to ask me why farmers had not been paid any money recently, but did not tell me that he was a farmer. My response might have been very different had I known that self-interest was to the fore.

The debate has been useful. It has shed light on issues that we do not often discuss in Parliament. The matter is at the heart of the relationship between the European Union—

It being three hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question, pursuant to Order [6 March].

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House takes note of European Union Documents No. OJ C 301, the European Court of Auditors 2004 Annual Report; No. 11216/05, European Court of Auditors Special Report No. 1/2005 concerning the management of the European Anti-Fraud Office; No. 11452/05 and Addenda 1 and 2, Protection of the financial interests of the Communities: fight against fraud, Commission's annual report 2004; No. 12493/05 and Addendum 1, Commission Report: follow-up to 2003 Discharge Decisions–Council recommendations; No. 12494/05 and Addendum 1, Commission Report: follow-up to 2003 Discharge Decisions–European Parliament Resolutions; No. 12712/05, Commission Staff Working Document: follow-up to the 2003 European Court of Auditors Annual Report; and No. 13532/05, Member States' replies to the Court of Auditors 2003 Annual Report; and supports the Government's promotion of measures to improve the level of assurance given on the Community budget.

EUROPEAN UNION DOCUMENT

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 119(9) (European Standing Committees),

STRATEGY FOR THE PROTECTION AND CONSERVATION OF THE MARINE ENVIRONMENT

That this House takes note of European Union Documents No. 13759/05, and Addendum 1, Draft Council Directive establishing a Framework for Community Action in the field of Marine Environmental Policy (Marine Strategy Directive), and No. 13700/05 and Addendum 1, Commission Communication: Thematic strategy on the protection and conservation of the marine environment; and agrees with the Government's view that there is considerable uncertainty over the benefits, costs and effectiveness of the proposed Directive.—[Mr. Watts.]

Question agreed to.

Children with Asperger's Syndrome (Warrington)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Watts]

7.51 pm

Helen Jones (Warrington, North) (Lab): Last autumn, I visited a group in my constituency called WASPS. It was one of the most enlightening and humbling visits I have ever made. WASPS stands for the Warrington Asperger's syndrome parents support group and when I listened to what those parents told me I was sometimes close to tears. I hasten to add that that was not because they were moaning about their lot, or complaining about the hand that life had dealt them; they were simply telling me about the day to day realities of living with a child with Asperger's syndrome and about their struggle to access even the most basic services.

Those parents cope every day with things that would bring most of us to our knees. They deal with stresses and strains that those of us fortunate enough to have healthy children who do not have major problems can hardly imagine, yet in my area they receive little support. I think that is because much of what they do is hidden, and helping them and their children does not seem high on anyone's list of priorities. I hope that this debate will at least help to give the problem higher priority.

Asperger's syndrome is a complex condition and I admit that since last autumn I have been on a steep learning curve. It has many traits in common with autism, including difficulties in communicating and in dealing with social relationships and sometimes a lack of imagination, although Asperger's syndrome children often do not experience the same difficulties in communication as many children suffering from autism—for example, they may speak fluently although they can often sound stilted or formal. Nor do children with Asperger's syndrome necessarily have the learning difficulties experienced by children with autism; in fact, they are often of average or even above-average intelligence. One of the ladies in the group told me that her son had recently gone to university. There is vast potential in such children, which can be brought out if they have the right support, especially at an early age.

Unfortunately, however, because Asperger's syndrome covers a wide spectrum and the disability may not be as obvious as autism, it is often a long time before the condition is recognised and diagnosed. I am told that parents often feel a sense of relief when they finally receive a diagnosis, because at least they know what the problem is. Unfortunately, however, they have to do a great deal to learn to cope with their child's complex needs and access services, often with very little support. I was astonished to find, for instance, that in my constituency parents are often given a diagnosis, then simply told to go away and read a book or join a support group. They are not told which services could help them or how they could obtain them. That is appalling, especially as those families are under a great deal of strain.

My local group carried out a survey of its members, and it found that 73 per cent. of parents had suffered depression since the birth of their child. More than 90 per cent. thought that they needed counselling or psychological support at some stage, but very few of them received it. Only 50 per cent. obtained any support at all, often in the form of a one-off intervention or for a very short time. The survey revealed that 65 per cent. of parents suffer regular sleep deprivation. We know what we are like after missing a night's sleep, so we can only imagine what it is like to endure that week after week. That, however, is the reality for many of those parents. A total of 85 per cent. thought that their career choice or their ability to work had been restricted because of their child's needs.

There is a strain on relationships, and siblings in the family can be affected. The Under-Secretary of State for Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint) takes a great interest in these matters, and I am sure that she would find the comments of parents in that group as distressing as I do. One mother, for instance, said:

"My daughter has started to copy behavioural tantrums and arguing because that is what she sees."

That mother has not been offered any counselling. Another mother talked about the relationship between her son and her other children:

"They are upset by what he does, he hits them quite badly at time; their behaviour is a lot worse when he is being difficult."

There is very little help available for those families but, in my experience, they are exactly the sort of people whom the Government say they want to support. We say that we want to support hard-working families, and I can think of few families who work as hard or who are as deserving of support. We would not dream of telling someone with a physical problem to go away and read a book or join a support group. We would not leave them in that position, and it is not acceptable for those children either. That is not what the Government intended when they drew up "Every Child Matters" and the national service framework for children. In those initiatives we talked about integrated children's services and clear care pathways for children, but they do not exist for those children in my constituency. Their parents have lobbied patiently and with commendable courtesy to try to improve things.

Liz Blackman (Erewash) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Helen Jones: My hon. Friend has great expertise in these matters, so I am happy to give way.

Liz Blackman: It is no coincidence that Asperger's syndrome and high-functioning autism are labelled hidden disabilities. There is good practice, but it is patchy. The Government face an enormous challenge in making sure that the culture of every organisation that could make a contribution to support both families and children develops and changes so that those organisations become far more effective and responsive to all families who face that particular disability.

Helen Jones: My hon. Friend is right. It is sad that good practice is not spread as widely as it should be. Before Christmas, I held a meeting with parents' representatives and representatives of the primary care trust and of the local council to discuss the problems. It emerged from that meeting that educational practice is different in different schools. It is often a question of training, yet the local authority representative pointed out that while she could offer training courses, it was for head teachers to decide whether their special educational needs co-ordinators should attend them.

In its current inquiry into special needs, the Select Committee has found that a great deal more training is required, both in initial teacher training and in continuous professional development. I hope my hon. Friend the Minister will take that message back to the Department for Education and Skills.

Although some parents were full of praise for the help that they had received from their child's school, others had had to struggle to get every bit of support that was given. Again, that raises questions not only about the monstrous waste of potential that is occurring, but about the implementation of Government policy on the ground. When we dealt with admissions in the report, I remember the Select Committee stating that fairness in public policy ought to be not a matter of luck, but a matter of course. The same applies to special needs.

Parents also highlighted the problems they have in accessing the health service. I know that the Government have done a great deal to try and improve services for children suffering from autistic spectrum disorders, but what they wish to achieve is not always carried out in practice. Even when parents in my constituency can get assessments for their children, they often have to wait up to 12 months for some intervention, such as speech and language therapy or occupational therapy. It is even more difficult for them to access the child and adolescent mental health services. In my area those are provided by the Five Boroughs Partnership NHS Trust, but the PCT is commissioning only the tier 3 services, partly for historical reasons, at 25 per cent. of what is recommended in the national service framework. That means that CAMHS tend to intervene only when a child reaches crisis point—for example, when the child is self-harming. If we had earlier intervention and proper care pathways, it is my firm belief that not as many children would reach that crisis, and the strain on families would be much reduced.

What the parents are seeking, and I agree with them, is to ensure that when a child is diagnosed with Asperger's syndrome, they are allocated a key worker or a lead nurse who can help the family access the services that they need, whether in health or in education. We should ensure as well that when that diagnosis takes place, there is a proper assessment of the child's needs and what therapies they will require. Each child is different and requires different interventions. That may be speech and language therapy or occupational therapy. They may need some input from CAMHS, not because the child is suffering a mental illness, but because they need cognitive behavioural therapy, for example, or some other psychological support.

That support needs to be sustained over time. Short-term interventions are often of very little help to children with Asperger's syndrome. They need sustained intervention, yet not only can people in my area find it difficult to access the higher level of services, but it is difficult for them to get even tier 2 services. The primary care trust tells me that there is a multi-agency group looking at services for children with personal, emotional and behavioural problems. We have a lot of groups looking into things, but what we do not have is a service. Part of the reason is that the PCT does not treat the matter seriously enough.

I referred earlier to the meeting that I held. At that time the chief executive of the PCT was unable to attend because she was ill, but getting somebody else there was like drawing teeth. Although I wrote to the PCT following that meeting and it told me what it is doing with tier 2 services, nearly three months later the PCT still has not answered my question about key workers. It still has not answered the question about linking up our education and health services more closely. If we could get such services in place, we would make it much easier for children to achieve, we would reduce the stress on their family and siblings, and in the end we might even save money. We could do it in education as well.

Why is it often the case that when a child is given a diagnosis their parents still have to go through the whole statementing process to get them the support that they need in school? They do not want to do that. They have had a diagnosis, and that should trigger the educational interventions automatically. We are wasting money on the vast bureaucracy of statementing that should be spent on assisting these children.

Mrs. Betty Williams (Conwy) (Lab): I apologise for not forewarning my hon. Friend that I hoped to intervene and thank her for allowing me to do so. She says that services are patchy across the country. Does she agree that the key to any success that will help parents and their children is to have joint partnerships between education, social services and health? Has she met parents who have been called into a case conference to discuss the future of their child or, in some cases, children? They find that a very traumatic experience; I speak as someone who has been in that position. Somebody somewhere needs to take that on board.

Does my hon. Friend agree that local education authorities sometimes deliberately hold back on statementing a child because they know full well that once that happens the parents are able to demand the proper services for them?

Helen Jones: I agree that we need much more co-ordination of services. The real problem for parents is that they are having to deal with so many different people. That is why a key worker and a proper care pathway are crucial in getting the services that children need.

I know that my hon. Friend the Minister is sympathetic to what I am saying and takes these issues seriously because she has had to deal with them in her own constituency. I believe that there is a real need to support these families and to ensure that their children get what for our children is a basic entitlement—the right to develop their full potential. We should ask ourselves, "Would this service be good enough for my son or daughter." I have to say that in my area, it is not. I hope that my hon. Friend will at least be able to signal that we will soon see some improvement and these children will get what others regard as a basic right.

8.7 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Caroline Flint): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, North (Helen Jones) on securing this Adjournment debate on services for children with Asperger's syndrome in Warrington. I welcome the contributions made by my hon. Friends the Members for Erewash (Liz Blackman) and for Conwy (Mrs. Williams). I also welcome the work of the all-party group on autism.

It is important that, when the Government are developing policies that encourage good practice we hear about what happens on the ground. Part of our job is to identify good practice and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Erewash says, to find a way to share it to ensure that families who are coping with the special needs of their children can be supported.

Families are at the heart of all aspects of that support. Parents are incredibly important in terms of whether the policies that we provide on health or education, in local government or national Government, will work. The partnership between agencies and parents, with children involved too, can make or break a particular service. As we all want to ensure that resources are used well, it is worthwhile looking at how that partnership can secure good value for money. I acknowledge the contribution made by parents, as an unpaid resource, to supporting children with a whole range of special needs. My hon. Friend poignantly identified some of the problems faced by parents of children with Asperger's syndrome.

I am also aware that my hon. Friend is a member of the Select Committee on Education and Skills, which is conducting an inquiry into special educational needs, and that she is one of more than 300 Members of Parliament who have signed the manifesto of the all-party group on autism.

In the past decade, we have all experienced a change in how we think about the delivery of services. Indeed, children and young people with autistic spectrum disorders—ASD—including Asperger's syndrome, provide a test case for whether services are working together. Clearly, my hon. Friend feels that they are not working as well as they could in her part of the country. Those children's difficulties require input from health, social services and the education service. As my hon. Friend the Member for Conwy said, it is important that the different organisations work together. We are encouraging that discussion across Government, but, as hon. Members have asked, what are the practical results of those discussions?

The large increase in the number of children identified with ASD, including Asperger's syndrome, presents considerable challenges for local providers. For many generations, the difficulties and problems that those children and their families face were not even acknowledged. We recognise the challenge and, in 2002, the Department and the Department for Education and Skills published good practice guidance on ASD.

For such specialist provision, the ASD good practice guidance recommends a regional approach. The north-west special educational needs regional partnership, which includes Warrington, is one of the England-wide partnerships that have focused on provision for children with ASD. A partnership is helpful in such circumstances because it means that one can not only examine the cash and specialist resources and ascertain what one can deliver, but discuss and share good practice. The latter is one of the main aims of such partnerships. I welcome that.

A key to good provision, which the guidance highlighted, is co-operative working between services. We have shown how that can happen through the autism exemplar, which we published in the national service framework for children, young people and maternity services. It sets national outcome standards for health and social services and, importantly, their links to education. The exemplar shows the pathway for one young boy, starting at the age of three, as he moves through to post-16 provision. It begins with initial concern and identification through multi-agency assessment and diagnosis and moves to the various forms of support, whether social services support or specialist education provision.

All local services should aim for such provision for children with ASD. I shall ensure that all comments about education are passed on to the appropriate Minister in the Department for Education and Skills. The exemplar focuses on a child with autism, but children and young people with ASD, including Asperger's, should benefit from the improvements that the Government are bringing about through their general policies for children and young people.

Through the "Every Child Matters" change programme, we are bringing together education and social services locally under one director of children's services. Again, I stress that such joined-up thinking can occur and I hope that, when we provide training and support for special educational needs co-ordinators, head teachers understand that that can help their school's management, their relationships with parents and the children's achievement, which, as my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, North said, can reach university level. If families feel that the children are getting a chance to fulfil their potential, that brings hope.

"Every Child Matters" promotes common commissioning and funding through children's trust arrangements and integrates services for children and families in children's centres and full-service extended schools. In our White Paper, "Our health, our care, our say: a new direction for community services", we set out that, for disabled children, children with complex health needs and those in need of palliative care, we want primary care trusts to ensure that the right models of service are developed by undertaking a review of their capacity and the delivery of integrated care pathways to meet the children's national service framework standards.

Primary care trusts must also agree service models, funding and commissioning arrangements with their strategic health authorities. Of course, the needs of every different child with Asperger's syndrome may be different. However, I take on board my hon. Friend's point about examples of where the position has reached crisis point. That prompts the question of whether better understanding of the child's needs and an appropriate care pathway would have been not only more effective but, in the long run, more cost effective for the support for that child and his or her family.

We intend to follow this matter up in the autumn, in the refreshment of the NHS priorities and planning guide, which sets out the "must do" requirements for inclusion in local delivery plans. The Under-Secretary of State for Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Byrne) is meeting PCTs, health service providers and national bodies on 15 March to look at how we can ensure that the complex pathway of care for disabled children and those with complex health needs is translated into the reality of purchasing better services. I can assure my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, North that I shall ensure that my colleague has full sight of the report of this debate.

Mrs. Betty Williams: Does my hon. Friend acknowledge that the important step that a child takes when leaving school and going into further education, or wherever the path might lead, is crucial? At the moment, that is where the weakness is. Education, social services and prospective employers do not seem to be working together for the benefit of those children and young people.

Caroline Flint: There has long been a problem for children with special needs, in relation to their transition from children's services to adult services and the adult world. We are attempting to improve that position, certainly in mental health services, and considerable work has also been done in social services. I agree with my hon. Friend, however, that more needs to be done. Young people with degrees will be valuable members of whichever work force they enter, and it is important to ensure that people, whatever their disabilities, can have a crack at having as independent and fulfilling a life as possible. I shall pass on the point that my hon. Friend has raised about the transition from childhood to adulthood. We identified earlier the support that we wanted to give to children and young people. We do not want to see all that investment lost if, in adulthood, they are unable to use that support to good effect as they grow older.

I am aware that Cheshire and Merseyside strategic health authority has proposed the retention of a single PCT for Warrington. I am advised by the SHA that the PCT has well-established joint working with Warrington council through the health and well-being partnership. I understand that Warrington council sees provision for children with ASD, including those with Asperger's syndrome, as an area of development. It recognises that this is an area that has more potential in regard to delivery.

I know that the local authority is also exploring developing its specialist provision in its schools for those with ASD. The development of a range of educational provision for children with ASD is encouraged by the ASD good practice guidance. However, the PCT recognises the need to work more closely with Warrington council, and it intends to strengthen joint commissioning for mental health, learning disabilities, children, older people and child and adolescent mental health services, with a view to improving them.

[Caroline Flint]

I am aware that my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, North has been raising concerns locally about the provision of services to children with Asperger's syndrome, and that she has met representatives of the Warrington Asperger's support group, and of Warrington PCT. I understand that, following that meeting, the PCT wrote to her about the development of a new tier 2 service, which will provide a service for children and young people whose symptoms and/or behaviours are indicative of an emotional or behavioural problem. That would include children with Asperger's syndrome. The service will be delivered in line with standard 7 of the children's national service framework and "Every Child Matters" by a multidisciplinary team. I am further advised that Warrington PCT has prepared a local delivery plan bid for a key worker role to support young people with a suspected diagnosis of autism, including Asperger's syndrome.

Helen Jones: I am pleased to hear what my hon. Friend is saying, but will she ensure that the PCT, in doing these things, communicates with the parents of children with Asperger's syndrome? As she has rightly said, they play a key role in developing these services, but so far as I am aware, the PCT has not even let them know that it is putting in a bid for a key worker.

Caroline Flint: I am sorry to hear that, as I have obviously been authorised to announce that in this public forum. I hope that there will be a constructive relationship between the PCT and the parents of children with Asperger's syndrome. This is part of recognising the partnership that I mentioned earlier.

There will always be more to be done. The whole range of autism presents a number of complex issues, but some are not beyond resolution: as was pointed out by my hon. Friend the Member for Erewash, there are some excellent examples of very good work.

I urge my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, North to continue to involve local stakeholders in discussion on the best way of helping services locally. I hope to see not just enthusiasm, but recognition that talking about the issues, listening to accounts of the problems and finding practical solutions is all that families really want.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

The Deputy Prime Minister was asked—

Council Tax

1. Mr. David Evennett (Bexleyheath and Crayford) (Con): What the average band D council tax was in London boroughs in (a) 1997–98 and (b) 2005–06. [56642]

The Minister for Local Government (Mr. Phil Woolas): The average band D two-adult council tax bill in London boroughs was £651 in 1997–98 and £1,162 in 2005–06.

Mr. Evennett: I am grateful to the Minister for his reply. Is he aware that there is great anger in my borough of Bexley at the increases over the past eight years, with another one to come in April? Families and pensioners have been hit hard by those increases, and in addition there is the very unpopular Olympic levy. How does he justify those rises?

Mr. Woolas: I advise the House that in the same period, the central Government grant to local authorities increased by some 78.5 per cent. in cash terms, representing more than 38 per cent. in real terms. Indeed, the figures for the hon. Gentleman's own local authority for the coming two years show grant increases, including in the dedicated schools budget, of 5.6 and 4.9 per cent.—generous figures, I believe.

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op): Is not the real problem that the unified business rate has been held to the rate of inflation over the past eight or nine years? Does the Minister agree that the business community needs to make a greater contribution to the provision of local services, and that it is time that it did so?

Mr. Woolas: I remind the House that the Valuation Office Agency undertook a very successful revaluation of businesses that resulted in a revenue-neutral increase in income from non-domestic business rates. This issue is of course being considered by the Lyons review of local authority funding, and we look forward to Sir Michael's recommendations.

Sarah Teather (Brent, East) (LD): Since he took up office, the Deputy Prime Minister has earned five times as much as the average Londoner, but his council tax bill—when he eventually paid it—was less than half their average bill. Does the Minister think that fair?

Mr. Woolas: Given the improvement in London's public services, including in the hon. Lady's own borough, and the extra investment that this Government have been able to make, including in her own borough, all as a result of the successful economic policies pursued by this Government, she should be congratulating the Deputy Prime Minister and not seeking to score points.

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Beckenham) (Con): The London Mayor's levy on council tax payers has more than doubled since he was first elected. According to the Government, he and the Greater London authority were meant to cost Londoners thruppence a week. Who is to blame—the Labour Government or the Labour Mayor?

Mr. Woolas: The hon. Lady seems to have forgotten that it was the people of London who voted to establish the GLA, after the previous Conservative Government had abolished the Greater London council without so much as a by your leave. Subsequently, the Mayor of London has been re-elected. So her argument is not with me but with the people of Greater London.

Social Housing

2. John Robertson (Glasgow, North-West) (Lab): What assessment his Department has made of the impact of right to buy on the provision of social housing by local authorities. [56643]

The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. John Prescott): We have taken action through the Housing Act 2004 to reduce the abuse of right to buy, and we have cut the discounts for 41 housing-pressured areas. As a result, total sales have fallen, but we remain committed to helping people into home ownership. New opportunities are being offered through our homebuy schemes, and the provision of social rented housing is increasing. This will be a priority in the current spending review.

John Robertson: I thank my right hon. Friend for his answer. While I accept that the right to buy has been very important to a lot of people—not least to some in my constituency—does he agree that local authorities need to provide social housing as well as making houses available through the right to buy? Is it not time that we looked at the rules governing social housing and helped those councils that want to supply good housing for people who cannot afford to buy?

The Deputy Prime Minister: As I said, the action that we took in dealing with abuse of the right to buy led eventually to a reduction in the number of people buying through that process, particularly in the London area. Through homebuy schemes, we are offering other opportunities to 300,000 more tenants, but we are constantly reviewing the situation. My hon. Friend must recognise that our decent homes programme has benefited more than 1 million people. Many people in his constituency will have benefited from that programme, as well as from the provision of housing in the public and private sectors.

Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): I hope that the Deputy Prime Minister is in favour of encouraging a property-owning democracy. If so, does he agree with me that housing association tenants have been badly discriminated against and should be given the right to buy their homes?

The Deputy Prime Minister: I think that tenants of housing associations already have the right to buy, but to extend that to the right to acquire would cost around £1 billion more. We must make a judgment about the best use of public money. Tenants have the right to buy, but to extend that to the right to acquire would be expensive and also create financial problems for housing associations, as the previous Tory Administration noted, which was why they failed to implement that change.

Christine Russell (City of Chester) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will know from his local links that the social housing stock of the city of Chester was decimated by the right to buy. As a result the average house price in Chester is now £180,000, which is 10 times the salary of a newly qualified nurse or teacher. Can he give me an assurance that in the next round of the comprehensive spending review his Department will recognise the housing needs of people on relatively low wages who live in housing hot spots in the north? We have problems in the north—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. The Deputy Prime Minister probably has the gist of that question.

The Deputy Prime Minister: I can reassure my hon. Friend on that point. She will know from the Chancellor's pre-Budget report that he said that greater priority would be given to social housing, and we await the Budget.

Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con): The Deputy Prime Minister is right to recognise the failure to deliver new social housing under his Government, as the number of completions in 2004–05 was barely 56 per cent. of the completions 10 years ago under the Conservative Government. If the failure to provide social housing is of such concern, why have he and his Department stood back and done nothing to address the allegations that registered social landlords in Liverpool have, over several years, been voiding and tinning up good quality homes, contributing to the dereliction of areas and encouraging the demolition, not refurbishment of properties, which is at the heart of the growing resentment in Liverpool at the progress of the pathfinder programme? Why has he done nothing to address that failure by social landlords?

The Deputy Prime Minister: It is interesting to note that the Conservatives have discovered Liverpool again, perhaps to try to obtain some electoral representation in the area—because they have none at present. Let us be clear about the position. We made a judgment in 1997 that we should put more resources into improving 2 million homes that had been left in less than decent conditions by the previous Administration, who—six years before—had halved the amount of money invested in housing. We have improved more than 1 million houses. They may not be new houses, but people who live in them appreciate the new kitchens, bathrooms and central heating, which make a difference to their quality of life. The right-to-buy programme was at the expense of millions of tenants who saw the standard of their houses falling. We have been correcting that.

Affordable Housing (Birmingham)

3. Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the availability of affordable housing in Birmingham. [56644]

The Minister for Housing and Planning (Yvette Cooper): The Housing Corporation has provided some £80 million for new social housing over this two-year period, which is a substantial increase for Birmingham compared with previous years and, in addition, a growing proportion of new affordable homes has come from section 106 agreements. We will announce the next allocations from the Housing Corporation shortly.

Lynne Jones: My hon. Friend will be aware that three quarters of council lettings are to homeless people, compared with a third in 1997. Likewise, housing association tenancies are overwhelmed by homeless and clearance cases, leaving little availability for others in housing distress on waiting lists. However, thousands more homes are due to be demolished because of a lack of money to bring them up to a decent standard. The Government made £650 million available for stock transfer—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I encourage the hon. Lady to formulate a question out of all this?

Lynne Jones: What does my hon. Friend say to those tenants who ask why that money cannot be made available to invest in council housing and building new homes?

Yvette Cooper: My hon. Friend is right to say that we have made money available for Birmingham. We have increased the resources available directly to Birmingham and we have also made options available for it to increase its housing to the decent homes standard. I know that the recent independent report by Anne Power on the approach taken by Birmingham city council was critical, and I am also concerned that the council's approach to pushing up the cost of land for housing associations also raises questions about the ability to deliver new social housing. We are investigating that.

John Hemming (Birmingham, Yardley) (LD): Does the Minister not agree that, if the council were allowed to spend more than 25 per cent. of the right-to-buy proceeds on building new affordable properties, that could have a serious effect on reducing homelessness?

Yvette Cooper: As I have said, we have doubled the resources going into new social housing since 1997, and we are increasing new social house building by 50 per cent. over the next few years. We are raising additional resources from a range of different routes to invest in social housing, but the hon. Gentleman should raise with Birmingham city council the need for it to work with housing associations to increase support for new social housing, because we will only get the additional social housing that we need if the council works with housing associations, rather than working against them.

Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield) (Lab): My hon. Friend mentioned the independent commission of inquiry into council housing in Birmingham, chaired by Professor Anne Power. Is she aware of the commission's latest report, which emphasises not only that, if Birmingham is to tackle its housing agenda, it needs to develop a much more vibrant, community-based housing approach, but that, crucially, since the Liberal Democrats and Conservatives took over the council, the neighbourhood agenda is now slipping

"a long way down the Council's list of priorities and there are many unresolved funding and staffing problems over devolution, regeneration, neighbourhood renewal, neighbourhood wardens and other local initiatives"?

Does she agree that if Birmingham is to tackle its housing agenda, the council must learn to let go?

Yvette Cooper: My hon. Friend is right. In fact, there should be strong support for community-led programmes to devolve much of the decision making to local neighbourhoods, as he and the Anne Power report have advocated, and Opposition Members should ask some questions of Birmingham city council.

Mrs. Caroline Spelman (Meriden) (Con): Great cities, such as Birmingham, have a regenerated heart—the magnificent Bullring, with its café culture and its luxury apartments—but, sadly, most first-time buyers simply cannot afford to live there. In the face of the decline in the number of first-time buyers in this country—from 500,000 in 1997, down to 320,000 last year—the Government are proposing to help just 100,000 of them with shared equity in the lifetime of this Parliament. Why such poverty of ambition?

Yvette Cooper: I find the hon. Lady's question astonishing. We are proposing very strong and ambitious programmes to build more houses, which this country needs. In fact, 190,000 new households are being created each year, and we are building only about 160,000 new homes. We need to build more new homes, including in the west midlands, but she is opposing new development in her constituency and arguing that it should not take place there but elsewhere. If Opposition Members keep opposing new homes in their constituencies, we will never get the new homes that first-time buyers and the next generation need. That is the challenge to improving affordability.

Contingency Planning

4. Patrick Mercer (Newark) (Con): What discussions he has had with the Home Office on improvements and alterations to resilience structures following Exercise Osiris 2 in September 2003. [56645]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Jim Fitzpatrick): Exercise Osiris 2 allowed London's emergency and health services to practise their response to a chemical attack on the tube. Home Office and other Ministers were closely involved in the subsequent analysis of lessons, which were incorporated into our emergency planning programme and contributed significantly, with other action and exercises, to building the quality of preparedness that we saw demonstrated in London on 7 July last year.

Patrick Mercer: May I thank the Minister and the Deputy Prime Minister for making briefings available to me? During Exercise Osiris, it was made clear that there would be further exercises, involving not just the emergency services, but the public. Since then, the tube has been attacked successfully, there has been a failed attack on the tube and I believe that there has been at least one foiled attack on the tube, yet there have been no further exercises on that scale, involving the public. Why?

Jim Fitzpatrick: I assure the hon. Gentleman that in the first instance lessons from Osiris 2 have been learned on procuring new equipment, amending procedures and introducing new techniques. A number of major exercises have taken place subsequently, not just in London, but in Newcastle and Birmingham, and we had Operation Atlantic Blue in conjunction with the US and Canada in January this year. Three major counter-terrorism exercises are held in the UK every year, as well as smaller regional exercises and table-top exercises. There is an ongoing examination of our contingency planning and preparedness. Indeed, the hon. Gentleman received a briefing earlier this week. We will be happy to give him more in the future to ensure that he is kept up to speed.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): One of the best groups at extracting people from underground is the Mines Rescue Service, based in the Rhondda, yet it was not involved in discussions about Osiris, and nor were its services requested following 7 July. May I urge my hon. Friend to consider how the Mines Rescue Service could be used in such events?

Jim Fitzpatrick: I hear exactly what my hon. Friend says and his suggestion, which will be taken on board by officials in the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister. The experience and expertise of the Mines Rescue Service staff can be put to good use. We have already amended our techniques on rescuing people from deep areas and, as a result, the 7/7 exercise was a success. I am sure that we will be in touch with the Mines Rescue Service in due course.

Regional Government

5. Philip Davies (Shipley) (Con): What powers and responsibilities the Government have transferred to regional assemblies since 2004. [56646]

The Minister of Communities and Local Government (Mr. David Miliband): The eight regional assemblies outside London were each formally designated as the regional planning body in their region under the provisions of the Planning and Compulsory Purchase Act 2004. We have accepted the recommendation of the Barker review on housing supply that regional housing boards be merged with them.

Philip Davies: I thank the Minister for that reply. Clearly, the Government have learned nothing from the referendum in the north-east on regional assemblies. The Yorkshire and Humber assembly has decided that Bradford district needs 30,000 houses built over the next 10 to 15 years. Why should an unelected, unaccountable and unwanted body make such a decision for our area? Should not it be left to the local council to decide such things?

Mr. Miliband: What I should do is commend to the hon. Gentleman the words of the Conservative leader of the East of England regional assembly who says that regional assemblies are essential for "effective regional planning", the provision of a democratic mandate in the regions and "effective scrutiny of other bodies".

Some 187 Conservative councillors are on those regional assemblies. The hon. Gentleman should be saying that they are doing a good job.

Disabled Facilities Grant

6. Paul Rowen (Rochdale) (LD): When he plans to introduce the recommendations of the recent review of the disabled facilities grant. [56647]

The Minister for Housing and Planning (Yvette Cooper): We published the report on the disabled facilities grant programme in October 2005. We have implemented one of the central recommendations already and are considering the other recommendations at the moment.

Paul Rowen: Does the Minister accept that the failure to increase the grant from the current level of £25,000 to the £50,000 recommended in the report is causing real hardship and means that many people who need disabled facilities cannot access them?

Yvette Cooper: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that we increased funding for the disabled facilities grant from £57 million in 1997 to £121 million for next year. That includes a 16 per cent. increase for Rochdale for next year. We are increasing the resources available for the disabled facilities grant. We have in particular exempted disabled children from the means test. That is the right priority: to recognise the particular needs of families with disabled children. We are considering the further recommendations.

Derek Wyatt (Sittingbourne and Sheppey) (Lab): Swale borough council's grant for disabled facilities is spent on 6 April. If there is an emergency in the next financial year, we have no money to give to disabled people. Is there a way in which my hon. Friend can call in Swale borough council to ask how it spends the money and spreads it out?

Yvette Cooper: I am happy to look into the spending by Swale borough council as I do not know the details. However, as I said, we have increased the resources available for local councils because it is important to support disabled families, which can face great difficulties with making major adaptations to their homes.

First-time Buyers

7. Mr. Robert Flello (Stoke-on-Trent, South) (Lab): What steps are being taken to help first-time buyers in Stoke-on-Trent; and if he will make a statement. [56648]

The Minister of Communities and Local Government (Mr. David Miliband): We have made available over £5 billion of funding for investment to support key housing priorities, including support for low-cost home ownership. The new open market homebuy scheme will enable an additional 20,000 households nationally into home ownership by 2010. In my hon. Friend's constituency, Mercian housing association is the homebuy zone agent.

Mr. Flello: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend. Will he look carefully with his colleagues in the Department at the further help that can be given to housing in Stoke-on-Trent and north Staffordshire through the RENEW north Staffordshire programme? I hope that up to £70 million will come into north Staffordshire, and I urge my hon. Friends to make sure that we receive the full amount, as anything less will harm the peripheral estates. I would be delighted to show my right hon. Friend around those estates so that he can see their needs.

Mr. Miliband: My hon. Friend is comprehensive as well as energetic in his pursuit of this case. He has already had meetings with my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Joan Walley) and myself, and I understand that the papers on the decision are heading towards the desk of my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning. In due course, that decision will be made.

Homelessness

8. Justine Greening (Putney) (Con): If he will make a statement on the extent of homelessness among ex-servicemen. [56649]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Jim Fitzpatrick): The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister works closely with the Ministry of Defence to prevent homelessness and to support related projects involving ex-services groups.

Evidence suggests that the number and proportion of people sleeping rough who have served in the armed forces is reducing. The ex-services action group on homelessness has commissioned further research and interim findings will be available in the summer.

Justine Greening: I thank the Minister for his response, but does he agree that in light of the number of armed service personnel serving in Iraq this is a growing problem, despite the evidence that it may be reducing? The Government must pay close attention to any studies that are undertaken to make sure that servicemen suffering from mental health problems in particular receive the support that they deserve when they come home.

Jim Fitzpatrick: Under homelessness legislation, since July 2002, applicants seeking help from a housing authority who are unintentionally homeless and vulnerable as a result of serving in Her Majesty's forces are in a priority needs category, and are owed a main homelessness duty. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and the Ministry of Defence have commissioned research from King's College, London on the extent, causes, impact and costs of rough sleeping and homelessness among ex-service personnel, as well as on ways in which that can be prevented. Interim reports are due later this month and in October, and we will look in particular at the issue of mental health.

Council Tax

10. Mr. Rob Wilson (Reading, East) (Con): What representations on council tax he has received from pensioner groups in the last 12 months. [56651]

The Minister for Local Government (Mr. Phil Woolas) rose—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May we have less noise? These questions are every bit as important as any other questions.

Mr. Woolas: The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has identified eight written representations from groups exclusively representing pensioners on council tax in the past 12 months. Issues raised include the effect of council tax bills on pensioners; council tax benefit; and the reform of the local government finance system. I met the National Pensioners Convention on 6 December 2005.

Mr. Wilson: I thank the Minister for his answer. Why was a £200 discount essential for pensioners last year, but completely unnecessary this year? Was it because last year was a general election year?

Mr. Woolas: The hon. Gentleman will recall that the £200 announcement was made in last year's Budget. The Opposition opposed many other measures that were put in place for pensioners and the low paid. I remind the House, through you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that nearly 20 per cent. of council tax is paid through the council tax benefit system.

Infrastructure Funding (Milton Keynes)

11. Dr. Phyllis Starkey (Milton Keynes, South-West) (Lab): What funding his Department has made available for infrastructure in the Milton Keynes growth area over the last three years; and if he will make a statement. [56652]

The Minister for Housing and Planning (Yvette Cooper): The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is making available over £73 million additional infrastructure funding, including funding improvements to the hospital, railway station and motorway junction. We are also supporting Milton Keynes' proposals to develop a tariff further to support new infrastructure in the area.

Dr. Starkey: I thank the Minister on behalf of my constituents and all the residents of Milton Keynes for that statement. Will she comment on the fact that some people in the area, including the Opposition, are happy to accept the infrastructure but continue to oppose the proposed housing?

Yvette Cooper: My hon. Friend is right. We need good infrastructure to support new homes, but we must also recognise that we have to deliver the new homes that the next generation needs; otherwise, problems with overcrowding and homelessness will grow, and there will be huge and unfair pressures on first-time buyers. That is why we support new homes and infrastructure development, in Milton Keynes and across the country.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Engagements

Q1. [56627] Tim Farron (Westmorland and Lonsdale) (LD): If he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 8 March.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): This morning, I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I will have further such meetings later today.

Tim Farron: Homelessness in south Lakeland rose by 85 per cent. last year, and average local house prices are 15 times as high as average local incomes. Will the Prime Minister act swiftly to prevent the compulsory right to buy of shared ownership schemes, to ensure that more affordable homes can be built, and that they remain affordable?

The Prime Minister: That is precisely why we want to encourage more house building in areas where there is pressure on housing, especially for young couples trying to own their first home, and why we want to encourage shared equity schemes. As my right hon. Friends the Deputy Prime Minister and the Chancellor have said in recent weeks, it is therefore important that we continue with the programme, which means we invest in housing and increase its availability. However, we also need more imaginative ways to ensure that people, and especially young people, are able to own a home for the first time.

Mr. Tom Harris (Glasgow, South) (Lab): May I inform the Prime Minister that if he wants to get in touch with me for any reason over the next few weeks, I shall be on paid paternity leave for two weeks from around the beginning of June? [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] If he tries to phone me at home and I am not in, I shall probably be at the bank, cashing in a baby bond. What plans do the Government have to support new parents further, and does my right hon. Friend expect cross-party support for such measures this time?

The Prime Minister: I extend my warmest congratulations to my hon. Friend. The measures that we took in respect of paternity leave go alongside our massive extensions to maternity pay and maternity leave, and baby bonds. Like the children's tax credit, they are all examples of this Government's commitment to families and to balancing work and family life. I am only sorry that those measures were opposed in their entirety by the Opposition.

Mr. David Cameron (Witney) (Con): The outgoing chief executive of the NHS said last night that the service was going through a "bad patch". Does the Prime Minister agree?

The Prime Minister: It is very important that we get hospitals with financial deficits back into surplus. However, we must be clear about this matter, and a review of the past few years shows the difference that investment and reform have made. Under this Government, waiting lists have fallen by something like 400,000. Whereas almost 300,000 people used to wait 15 months for their operations in 1997, no one now waits more than six months.

Mr. Cameron: The fact is that the deficit has trebled, wards are being closed and, in my constituency, mental health consultants are being sacked. If everything is going so well, why did the Prime Minister have to sack the NHS chief executive?

The Prime Minister: Nigel Crisp gave his reasons for standing down in his statement yesterday, but let me say that he was a superb public servant who, in the past few years, has overseen a transformation of the health service. Moreover, we should get the question of deficits in context. The total deficit is less than 1 per cent. of the NHS annual bill, but the most important fact is that 50 per cent. of that deficit is in 6 per cent. of trusts. It is true that there is a substantial financial deficit in the right hon. Gentleman's area—[Interruption.] Yes, but there have also been massive real-terms increases in the amount of money going in—money that he voted against. That is why we have to have proper systems of financial transparency. We are putting in a huge investment, but it is for local hospital organisations to make sure that they balance the books. In fact, the majority of them are doing just that.

Mr. Cameron: The Prime Minister tries to fudge the issue of whether Sir Nigel was sacked, but last night Sir Nigel said that he had wanted to stay for at least another year, and that he wanted to leave when things were "on the up"—something with which I am sure that the Prime Minister feels some sympathy. He also said that the NHS's structural problems were getting worse, that managers were under less pressure to get the finances right, and that financial problems were now being revealed. What responsibility do Ministers take for such matters?

The Prime Minister: Ministers are responsible, but both Sir Nigel and Ministers can be extremely proud of the following achievements in the national health service—[Interruption.] I know that Opposition Members do not want to hear the fact that there are 80,000 more nurses in the national health service and 30,000 more doctors; that waiting for cataract operations is down from two years to three months; that now no one waits for heart operations for more than three months; that cancer deaths are down by 14 per cent., saving 43,000 lives; and that deaths from heart disease are down 30 per cent., saving 83,000 lives. Yes, of course there are problems in our national health service, like any health care system in the world, but if we compare today and the levels of not just funding but achievement with 1997, the issue for the national health service today, in part thanks to what Sir Nigel has done, is how we improve it, not what it used to be in 1997, which was whether we could save it.

Mr. Cameron: In public, the Prime Minister gives us these lists of success; in private, he knows that things are going wrong and is he sacking the chief executive. Is this not just the latest example of mismanagement in the NHS? The Government set up primary care trusts; now they are scrapping half of them. They introduced strategic health authorities; now most of them are going. They have poured money into the NHS, but there is an £800 million deficit and the outgoing chief executive said that things are getting worse, not better. When will Ministers take responsibility for their failures, instead of seeking to blame others?

The Prime Minister: Sir Nigel certainly did not say that the national health service is getting worse not better. The national health service, on any basis, as every independent report has shown, is indeed getting better. The reason why I read out the achievements of the past few years is because it used to be the case that literally hundreds of thousands of people waited more than a year on in-patient waiting lists; no one does today. It used to be the case that waiting lists went up every single year; they have fallen by almost 500,000 in the past five or six years. Just today, we are announcing at Barts the largest scheme that is going to mean fantastic opportunities for patients and clinicians throughout that part of London. Every penny piece was opposed by the right hon. Gentleman and the Conservative party. So, when he says that the national health service has challenges and issues, of course it does, but no one believes that the national health service is not better today than it was eight or nine years ago, and that is the result of not just investment and reform, but the fact that when he was still advocating the patient's passport to take money out of the NHS, this party stood by the NHS, stood by its values, stood by its principles and will make it better still.

Gordon Banks (Ochil and South Perthshire) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that Monday's report by the Sustainable Development Commission highlights clearly that the way forward for the UK's energy demands is through an even greater expansion of renewables and not through a new range of nuclear generation facilities, in relation to which the Commission highlighted that there are waste, cost, security and inflexibility questions still to be answered?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend in part. The part that I agree with is that we certainly do need to make sure that renewable energy forms a larger part of our energy mix and that is what we are committed to. Over the past few years, we have seen an extension in the amount of renewable energy. We have very stringent targets for the expansion of renewable energy in the next few years. But I have to say to him that I still think that there is a major challenge—this is what the energy review will answer in the next few months—as to whether we can really make sure that we meet both our energy needs and our environmental targets without nuclear power in the mix. That is something that we will obviously have to consider over the next few months, but let me just make one thing clear: the Sustainable Development Commission asks whether nuclear power is the answer, but no one has ever said that it is the whole answer. The question is whether it is part of the answer, as part of a sensible and balanced energy mix.

Sir Menzies Campbell (North-East Fife) (LD): Following that answer, can the Prime Minister tell us why the Government have yet to implement many of the low carbon solutions suggested in the energy White Paper of 2003?

The Prime Minister: First, I should say congratulations to the right hon. and learned Gentleman.

We actually are doing many of those things that are low carbon solutions. For example, due to buil. ng regulations, even though there is now a debate about whether we should go further, energy efficiency has improved by something like 40 per cent. for new buildings. There is the renewable energy that I was just talking about a moment or two ago. There are all the issues to do with energy efficiency, where again the Government are investing a large sum of money. Our Government are investing about £600 million this year in various forms of clean technology. Of course there are tremendous challenges as our economy grows, but as the right hon. and learned Gentleman knows, we will be one of the very few countries in the world to meet their Kyoto targets.

Sir Menzies Campbell: I thank the Prime Minister for his congratulations. He will know that there are increasing doubts about the Government's ability to meet the target of a 20 per cent. reduction in carbon dioxide emissions by 2010. The Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs says we must do so; the Department of Trade and Industry says we cannot. Who is right, and who is going to win?

The Prime Minister: In the next few months we will publish our proposals to make sure that we can attain that 20 per cent. target. However, the right hon. and learned Gentleman is right to say that it is incredibly challenging. Even though the economy has been growing far faster than the level of emissions, it will be highly challenging to meet that target. That should not diminish our pride as a country in having met our Kyoto targets, which were substantial, and in the leadership role that this country is playing round the world in tackling climate change. As he knows, in the end the single biggest thing that we can do, apart from giving leadership in the UK, is to make sure in international terms that America, China and India in particular are all working together.

Miners' Compensation

Q2. [56628] John Mann (Bassetlaw) (Lab): On how many occasions solicitors' costs have been partially refused due to breach of regulation 4 of the conditional fee regulations for miners' hearing loss claims to Government.

The Prime Minister: I cannot tell my hon. Friend on exactly how many occasions solicitors' costs have been partially refused due to breach of regulation 4, but we have been able to save substantial sums of money by making sure the regulation is implemented.

John Mann: There is a feeding frenzy over miners' and textile workers' deafness claims, which is even worse than the previous double charging scandal—in this case, with up to six unnecessary deductions by solicitors and the Union of Democratic Mineworkers. As Capita tells me that the Government have rightly refused to pay solicitors' costs in over 1,000 of these cases, will the Prime Minister ask the Lord Chancellor to sort out with the Law Society and with Cabinet colleagues how best to claw back costs in every one of those cases, and how to ensure that money wrongly deducted is returned to miners and textile workers?

The Prime Minister: In respect of the particular point that my hon. Friend makes, I understand that the issue is being considered by the courts in an appeal due to be heard on 19 June. The general point that my hon. Friend makes is right. That is why my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy has worked with the Law Society to see that solicitors who have unfairly taken a proportion of miners' compensation repay the money. Many have returned payments and the Law Society has again recently urged those who have not to do so. I know, however, that my hon. Friend would agree that over the past few years, the amount of money that we have managed to pay out to former miners has been enormous—about £3 billion, and it is one way that the Labour Government have been able to repay the debt of gratitude to those people who have worked in such difficult and dangerous conditions for so long in order to supply the country's energy needs.

Engagements

Q3. [56629] Mr. David Evennett (Bexleyheath and Crayford) (Con): Will the Prime Minister empathise and sympathise with my constituents, who are constantly battling against applications to site mobile phone masts in their streets, outside their houses and outside schools?

If he is sympathetic, why did his Government kill the Bill on Friday last, which would have helped to deal with the matter?

The Prime Minister: There must be a balance between people's objectives and making sure that we get the facilities that we need. We constantly keep under review the issue as to whether those are safe or not. As far as I am aware, the evidence points clearly and surely to the fact that they are.

Iraq

Q4. [56630] Harry Cohen (Leyton and Wanstead) (Lab): What action is being taken by UK forces in Iraq to end the activities of death squads associated with the Ministry of the Interior or others in authority; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: We are working with the Iraqi Government at the highest level to investigate all allegations and bring to justice any individuals involved in human rights abuses.

Harry Cohen: There were another 18 grisly murders on a minibus this morning. Has the Prime Minister taken into account the comments of John Pace, until recently the UN's head of human rights for Iraq, that most of the killings in Baghdad are carried out by agents of the Ministry of the Interior, and that that Ministry is a rogue element in the Government? General Casey, who is effectively running Iraq, says complacently and perhaps deliberately that this is just a long-term problem. Surely British troops were not sent to fight and die for such death squads' perversion of democracy.

The Prime Minister: No, they certainly were not, but I have to say to my hon. Friend that the very reason why these issues are being investigated is our insistence that they should be investigated—a very different situation from that which obtained under Saddam Hussein, when there was no investigation and it was indeed the policy of the Government to kill, abuse and torture people. My hon. Friend asks why our troops are there; they are there for a very simple reason. They are there under a UN mandate with the consent of the first ever democratically elected Iraqi Government, and they are there to allow the wishes and will of 11 million Iraqis who have voted in an election for the first time to have the democracy that they want. That is why they are there.

Engagements

Q5. [56631] James Brokenshire (Hornchurch) (Con): Rainham in my constituency has been identified as a site to sift, screen and process rubble and other debris in the event of a serious terrorist attack in the capital. While I accept the essential need to have such plans in place, does the Prime Minister recognise that it will not assist the redevelopment and regeneration of this part of the Thames Gateway if this use is retained and that a review is needed?

The Prime Minister: I hope that the hon. Gentleman understands that, for obvious reasons, I do not know about the particular application in his area. I am happy to look into it and I shall correspond with him about it.

Barbara Follett (Stevenage) (Lab): With the United Kingdom currently 51st on the women's representation league table, does my right hon. Friend agree that more needs to be done to get more women into this House, and particularly Labour women? Will he do all that he can to facilitate that?

The Prime Minister: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. I think that we can be proud of what has been achieved since 1997, particularly on the Labour Benches, with the additional representation of women, but we recognise, as I hope all parties do, that we need to do much more.

Mr. David Cameron (Witney) (Con): The drought in east Africa threatens millions of people with famine and starvation. We welcome the Government's rapid response and the announcement of the extra money that the Minister concerned has made. What does the Prime Minister think are the practical obstacles now standing in the way of getting food and water to those in need?

The Prime Minister: First, it is correct that the UK, I think after the US, is the second largest donor. It is sometimes worth pointing out the contribution that both we and our main ally make to overseas aid. The main obstacles are obviously the difficulties of infrastructure and transport. That is why we are working very hard on making sure that the money that we give is properly used and ordered not just to buy what is necessary, but to facilitate its transport.

Mr. Cameron: The Prime Minister will agree that in Africa, all too often, drought leads to starvation because of the absence of development and the presence of corruption. We must help developing countries to trade their way out of poverty. With that in mind, will it be possible to use the G6 talks this weekend to ensure that trade talks go forward with the needs of Africa at their forefront?

The Prime Minister: They certainly should do. The G6 talks are happening, but we are also honoured and delighted to have in this country for a state visit President Lula of Brazil. Brazil obviously occupies a very important position in the world trade talks, as part of the G20 group of nations. The main area of discussion that I will have with President Lula tomorrow will be whether it is possible to put together a far more ambitious plan for the trade talks. That should obviously include, as it is supposed to be a development round, a specific package for Africa and the very poorest countries, but it would be far easier if that package were located in a general ambitious trade round that took down trade barriers right around the world. That would obviously be of advantage to the poorest African countries, but in addition, it would be of advantage to countries such as Brazil and Britain.

Ms Dawn Butler (Brent, South) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is important that, as today is international women's day, it is firmly marked on the calendar, and that we should ensure that young people are taught about the day, when we should have a celebration? Although more people on the Labour Benches will be part of that celebration, as we have more women in Parliament, should we not also look forward to the Opposition making sure that there is further gender equality in the House?

The Prime Minister: I am not generally in favour of greater numbers of Conservative MPs, but certainly a greater balance between men and women would be a good idea.

Q6. [56632] Mr. Geoffrey Cox (Torridge and West Devon) (Con): Does the Prime Minister still believe, as he told west country farming communities in the midst of the foot and mouth crisis, that supermarkets have those communities in an arm lock? If he still believes that, does he support yesterday's call by the Federation of Small Businesses for an investigation into the practices of supermarkets by the Competition Commission?

The Prime Minister: I have not had an opportunity to study that recommendation, but I sympathise with the position in which farmers find themselves, which is why we established the code of practice, particularly when they are trying to restructure their own businesses. In meetings in the past few months, we have looked carefully at how we can respond to that concern in a way that is consistent with the interests of consumers, too. The code of practice should be adhered to, and I know that many parts of the farming community believe that it has been broken. We will carefully examine the matter, and if necessary, we will take further action.

Mrs. Madeleine Moon (Bridgend) (Lab): Women in my constituency face regular violence from partners who abuse them, and they are often forced into refuges. The Bridgend refuge is in financial crisis, and it needs additional funding to find homes for women and to give women the opportunity to find stability for themselves and their families. Will the Prime Minister look at finding ways to support women who experience violence, so that they are not faced with homelessness or living with fear at home?

The Prime Minister: I cannot comment on the funding of the particular service in my hon. Friend's area, but her general point is absolutely right. We are putting a great deal of money into supporting work on domestic violence, and we have established domestic violence courts. Women are more willing and able to come forward and report domestic violence, and the police and the courts treat such matters much more seriously. As we roll out domestic violence courts across the country, I hope that those benefits will become more widely spread.

Q7. [56633] Sir Peter Tapsell (Louth and Horncastle) (Con): Now that the Prime Minister has used up all mortal excuses for his folly in invading Iraq and is relying on divine guidance, a factor which was oddly omitted from the dodgy dossier, will he tell us which archangel is now beckoning him towards southern Afghanistan?

The Prime Minister: So what is the answer? [Laughter.] I will tell the hon. Gentleman what makes me committed to British troops in Afghanistan. On 11 September, there was the worst terrorist act that the world has ever seen in which 3,000 people died. That terrorist act was done out of Afghanistan, and it was run by al-Qaeda, which was based in Afghanistan and supported by the Taliban. [Interruption.] I am proud of the part that we played in removing the Taliban, and I am proud of the fact that 6 million Afghans got the chance to vote. [Interruption.] Yes; and 12 million Iraqis got that chance, too. I would have thought that everyone, whatever their belief or faith, would stand up for democracy against terrorism.

John Robertson (Glasgow, North-West) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend as concerned as me about unbalanced reports that misrepresent the energy debate? Does he agree that we need a balanced debate about a balanced energy policy?

The Prime Minister: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. Although, as he rightly implies, voices have been raised strongly against nuclear power in recent days, many people, including, for example, the Energy Research Centre, believe that it is important that nuclear power is part of the energy mix. We need a clear-sighted debate on the energy security needs of our country in a world in which security of energy supply is becoming increasingly difficult. We also need to take a hard-headed look at not only what we want to happen on greenhouse gas emissions, but what can practically be done in order to reduce them, and we should take the necessary decisions on that basis. As my hon. Friend has said, it is important to recognise that many sensible people who have looked at the issue over a significant period of time believe that nuclear power should be part of the mix.

Q8. [56634] Martin Horwood (Cheltenham) (LD): Given the Government's new-found interest in localism and the fact that children's hospital services in Cheltenham are becoming less local, our ambulance trust less local, our police force less local, our primary care trust less local, our fire control centre less local, our planning powers less local, and even our local authority less local, do the Government have plans to make anything at all in my constituency more local, or are they merely saying one thing and doing the precise opposite?

The Prime Minister: I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman that the police, for example, necessarily become less local if the restructuring of forces is combined with a greater emphasis on community policing. Most people do not regard the police in their area as part of an overall police authority—they look at the local service. Likewise with schools, hospitals or health care services, people look at their local ward and community beyond the structures that politicians often talk about, which often do not mean a great deal to people.

Q9. [56635] Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware that in Sunderland we have an excellent system of tertiary education which has been painstakingly built up over the past 20 years or so, and that there is a fear that foundation schools will demand their own sixth forms, thereby undermining what has been achieved? What can he say to reassure City of Sunderland college and others that that will not happen?

The Prime Minister: As I know that my hon. Friend would accept, the provision of education in Sunderland has benefited enormously from what the Government have done over the past few years. The sixth-form college has been a success, too. I very much hope that the proposals in the schools White Paper and the Education and Inspections Bill, far from undermining that success, will assist that process. After all, we have made great progress in our schools in the past eight or nine years. It is important that we build on that, and that is the purpose of the Bill.

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): Does the Prime Minister accept that the picture of the health service that he painted does not apply in my constituency? In the first place, there has been the extraordinary elevation of Sir Nigel Crisp to a peerage for what appears to have been a pretty appalling record. This afternoon, I am seeing all the primary care trust chairmen from Staffordshire. There is uproar about hygiene and cleanliness at Staffordshire general hospital, an £18 million deficit in North Staffordshire, and a deeply unpopular ambulance service merger.

The Prime Minister: What I would say to the hon. Gentleman is that we must have a sense of balance about the picture in the national health service today. Of course there are major challenges—MRSA is one, and the continuing financial deficits another. I think that if he were to talk to the people in the national health service in his area, he would find that they accept that there has none the less been immense progress over the past few years. Many people in his constituency—hundreds of them—used to wait months and months for operations; now, they have maximum waiting times far below anything that we inherited in 1997. There have been huge real-terms increases in funding. In the end, whatever amount of money we put into the national health service there has to be proper financial transparency. The new system that is being introduced is exposing the financial deficits and creating financial transparencies in the health service. It has to be dealt with, but it is being dealt with in the context of a national health service that is improving year by year.

Q10. [56636] Steve McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green) (Lab): May I give a general welcome to the proposals to improve youth services? When talking to constituents, I have been struck by how many people favour the idea of some kind of national youth volunteer service. When will that be up and running, and how do I get Hall Green youngsters involved?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is right. As a result of the work of the Russell commission, the charity set up to implement its recommendations will be launched in early May, with the first round of volunteering opportunities becoming available in the summer. We have allocated approximately £100 million for that. It will allow literally thousands of young people to take part in youth volunteering and I believe that that is a good thing. It is not possible to go back to the old days of national service, but it is possible to provide young people with the opportunity to put something back into the community and gain greater experience of different walks and sides of life. The programme will be exciting and I am sure that people in my hon. Friend's constituency and others will take advantage of it.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): Has the Prime Minister seen the front-page story in The Scotsman today? It carries the allegation that the reason for allowing cover-up and criminality in the presentation of fingerprint evidence in Scotland was to protect the forensic evidence used to secure the Lockerbie conviction. Given that the McKie case has already resulted in a wrongful conviction for murder, nine years of personal anguish for the police officer whose fingerprints were wrongly identified and a cloud of suspicion over the Scottish Criminal Record Office, will the Prime Minister join former Solicitor-Generals, Lord Advocates and every Opposition party in Scotland in calling for an independent judicial inquiry so that justice can be seen to be done?

The Prime Minister: Before I respond to that, I should look carefully at the story on the front page of The Scotsman. I have not seen it.

Points of Order

12.30 pm

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I believe that the Prime Minister inadvertently misled the House a few moments ago when he stated that nobody waited more than six months for an operation. The NHS website today shows that scores of patients are waiting more than six months for an operation. Will you advise me about how the matter might be clarified?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): That is not a point of order for the Chair. The best advice that I can give the hon. Gentleman is to pursue the matter through applying for an Adjournment debate.

Mrs. Caroline Spelman (Meriden) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Exactly one month ago, at Deputy Prime Minister's questions, I had to chase the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister for an answer for the people who suffered when a tornado struck Birmingham. They are still waiting for that answer. The city council leader and I wrote immediately to the Minister for Local Government, yet we have still not received a reply. What other measures can we take, through the means at our disposal, to prevent questions from being ignored at the Dispatch Box?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Again, that is not a matter on which the Chair can adjudicate. However, the hon. Lady has had an opportunity, in effect, to put the matter directly to the Deputy Prime Minister. I hope that, between them, the matter can be sorted out satisfactorily as soon as possible.

Attendance Allowance and Disability Living Allowance (Information)

12.32 pm

Anne Main (St. Albans) (Con): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to require any medical practitioner who diagnoses a terminal illness in a patient to inform the Secretary of State; to require the Secretary of State to give the patient information about his entitlement to, and a claim form for, attendance allowance and disability living allowance; and for connected purposes.

I should like to outline my personal experience, which has urged me to try to introduce the Bill. My husband Steve died of cancer 14 years ago. At the time we were a family with three small children and, having had nothing to do with the benefits system, I was unaware that there were benefits to which we were entitled, which would have helped us at a difficult time.

Anyone who has been through the earth-shattering diagnosis of terminal illness will say that money is the last thing on their mind. However, it helps enormously with all the bills that accrue when nursing somebody who is terminally ill. Many people choose to die at home. It is an enormous help to know that some support is available with, for example, cleaning, personal care and extra food that is especially palatable for someone who feels ill.

Over the years I have met many people who, like me, were unaware of the benefits to which they were entitled. There does not appear to be one particular person or delivery system to take responsibility for ensuring that patients and their families know that there are benefits that they are entitled to claim speedily. Consequently, I tabled an amendment to the Health Bill, which we considered recently, and I am promoting the Bill that we are considering now.

Coincidentally, days after I had done that, the Public Accounts Committee report entitled "Tackling Cancer: Improving the patient journey" was published, and I shall give the House a brief summary of its findings.

The report found that terminally ill cancer patients were often not made aware of the non-means-tested disability benefits that they could have claimed to alleviate financial hardship. That was estimated by Macmillan Cancer Relief to involve more than £100 million over a six-month period. The report also highlighted the fact that three quarters of patients were given no information on financial benefits by the NHS or anyone else. However, research published in the report showed that nearly half those people would have welcomed such advice.

Research carried out by Macmillan Cancer Relief in 2004 estimated that in 2001, terminally ill patients with six months or less to live failed to claim benefits worth £106 million over a six-month period. A cynic might ask whether the Government do not want people to claim those benefits, but I do not believe that that is the case, because they have put in place measures to ensure speedy delivery, which is welcome. What we do not have in place, however, is a system for the delivery of information. Hon. Members across the House are worried that no one has been given responsibility for this, either now or historically. The problem has existed for a long time.

[Anne Main]

The figures show that many people are missing out, yet the benefits are easy to claim if people know that they are there. We have a speedy delivery system in place. I met the Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, the hon. Member for Stirling (Mrs. McGuire), this week to discuss the matter, and I am grateful to her for giving me her time. Everyone says that we should be able to achieve this; it is just a question of knowing how to.

Unfortunately, the report shows that in the 14 years since my husband died, nothing much has changed to ensure that information is given quickly and sensitively to patients. A tripartite group, comprising representatives of the Department for Work and Pensions, Macmillan Cancer Relief and the Department of Health, is looking at the issue. This is a sensitive topic involving health and benefits, and I want a firm assurance that the information will at least be given to patients, whether they choose to use it or not. At present, many people are denied that choice through ignorance. We must not allow our sensitivity to such issues to result in people not dying well. A compassionate society would make this a burning priority.

The hon. Member for Tamworth (Mr. Jenkins), who served on the Committee, observed that he believed the Department for Work and Pensions should be leading on this matter. The hon. Gentleman also made the very point that I am making today when he said that "there should in effect be a package for the patient and boxes which should be ticked to show that they have now received the benefits advice".

Sir Nigel Crisp, who until yesterday was the chief executive at the Department of Health, accepted in his evidence that the system was "not good enough". That is something of an understatement, given that year after year, people are dying in reduced circumstances, when that need not happen. Sir Nigel also acknowledged that "not enough people who were entitled to benefit actually knew about it or were helped to find it. We do not have strong enough systems in place to do it."

The national cancer director, Professor Mike Richards of St. Thomas' hospital, also gave evidence to the Public Accounts Committee, and he agreed that this was a big problem. So we all agree that the problem exists; it has been firmly identified. Professor Richards said in his evidence that he expected the paperwork to be rolled out by November 2005, and that the tripartite group would have agreed a way forward by the end of 2005. However, that has not happened. That date has come and gone, and no system is in place. We have had more talk, more water has passed under the bridge, and more people have died.

I spoke with the Minister earlier this week, and I really welcomed our conversation. I was given assurances that she shared my desire to ensure that patients and their families were informed of the available benefits. Unfortunately, however, while discussions are ongoing with the tripartite group, the Government do not appear to be in a position to say that a clear line of responsibility for ensuring delivery of information has been established. I keep being giving plenty of reasons why things cannot be done, but on behalf of terminally ill patients, I am now demanding that someone starts to give us some solutions.

Talk will not pay the bills. Talk will not pay for food that people find palatable while undergoing chemotherapy. Talk will not pay for someone to sit with a patient while his wife goes to collect their young family from school. My Bill proposes that a GP or other medical practitioner should ensure that the system is at least triggered. After all, those are the health professionals most closely connected with the patient and their family. They are the professionals needed to sign the DS1500 form that will trigger the speedy delivery of the benefit. Doctors are paid by the DWP for each form filled in, but the patient or their representative has to require the doctor to issue and fill in the form. How can they do that if they are unaware of the benefit? This is a miserable and frustrating cycle of ignorance and deprivation.

I propose that the GP or other medical practitioner, after fully discussing the patient's illness with them or their representative, should be obliged to trigger a request for an information pack to be sent to the patient or their representative. The forms should be simple and sensitively worded so that the patient or their representative can decide whether to choose to use the system instead of languishing in ignorance. Let us not allow our sensitivity to a patient's plight to give us an excuse for inaction.

New GP contracts were introduced in April 2004. That might have been an ideal time to have considered this additional small responsibility. After all, GPs are paid to sign the forms, and this is just an extension of the same service. We can trigger the delivery of a TV licence form to people's homes, so it should not be beyond the wit of man to trigger the delivery of a pack of information on benefits to those who are terminally ill. As it is often the GP or medical practitioner who is most closely involved, this is a simple and obvious solution.

I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Anne Main, Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown, Jim Dobbin, Mr. Frank Field, Mike Penning, Andrew Selous and Grant Shapps.

Attendance Allowance and Disability Living Allowance (Information)

Anne Main accordingly presented a Bill to require any medical practitioner who diagnoses a terminal illness in a patient to inform the Secretary of State; to require the Secretary of State to give the patient information about his entitlement to, and a claim form for, attendance allowance and disability living allowance; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 16 June, and to be printed [Bill 142].

Orders of the Day

Road Safety Bill [Lords]

Order for Second Reading read.

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Alistair Darling): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The House, or at least some Members of it, will no doubt recall that a Road Safety Bill was last presented to the House in November 2004, but unfortunately it fell before the general election. Although this Bill essentially brings back the same measures, it has been improved in two significant ways. First, there are new offences of causing death by careless or inconsiderate driving and of causing death by driving while unlicensed, disqualified or uninsured. On Second Reading of the previous Bill, there was a lot of debate on those matters. Secondly, the Bill contains a new offence of keeping an uninsured vehicle and a power to immobilise vehicles that do not meet insurance requirements. The power will be used to stop the owners of cars and lorries driving them when it is clear that they are not properly insured. I shall return to those measures later.

I should also point out that two measures in the previous Bill have now been enacted elsewhere. First, drink drive information may now be taken at the roadside, which avoids the need for the police to go back to the police station when they stop someone, and secondly, in order to bear down further on uninsured drivers, the police have been given new powers to use automatic number plate recognition cameras linked to the databases of insurance companies to spot uninsured vehicles. Across the country, police forces are now using ANPR cameras to stop cars, and they can tell whether they are licensed and insured. In the autumn I saw that being done in Birmingham, and it is highly effective. It was surprising how many people were caught in the hour or so that I saw the system being used. It is an important way of tackling uninsured drivers and will increase the likelihood of people who are driving on the road without being properly insured being caught.

Graham Stringer (Manchester, Blackley) (Lab): From my reading of the Bill, it seems to have been improved since the House last discussed it, but one area that is not covered is the nuisance of unregistered mini motor cycles. In Committee or on Report, will my right hon. Friend consider bringing the regulation and registration of mini motor cycles into the Bill?

Mr. Darling: I am aware of that problem, which was raised with me on a recent visit to Nuneaton; it is a problem in Greater Manchester, too. I have looked into it and, as ever with such things, the situation is complex, although more can be done to deal with it. Because mini motor cycles do not comply with construction and use regulations, they cannot be registered as road vehicles such as motor bikes, and thus are not allowed on the roads. As a result, the police have power under existing law to deal with anyone who drives a moto on the road or pavement, or in a public place. Motos are supposed to be used only on private land with the owner's permission. However, I am aware that police forces in different parts of the country take different views of what they can or cannot do, in terms of warnings and so on. We need to look into the matter.

There is no doubt that those machines, some of which can go at 30 or 40 mph if not more, ridden by people who should not be driving anything on the road, let alone a moto, have the potential to cause immense damage, if not death. It is important that we are absolutely clear about the law. As I understand it, the law says that those vehicles are not allowed on the highway, which includes the pavements, so if a police officer finds someone driving one there, they have the power both to arrest the individual and to remove the machine. If the law lacks clarity or if there is any impediment, we should look into that before something serious happens. My hon. Friend has my assurance that we will look into the problem. It may be possible to do something during the passage of the Bill, but this may simply be a matter of making it clear to the police that there are already powers and that they should use them. If that is not the case, I should like to know what the problem is. There is no doubt that those machines are a source of irritation, and anyone buying one and putting a child on it is grossly irresponsible.

I want to put the Bill into context before I come to particular proposals. Some people will say that we can do more, which is undoubtedly true, but it is worth bearing it in mind that despite everything that we have done, today—as every day—nearly nine people in this country will be killed on our roads. None the less, along with the Netherlands and Sweden, we have one of the best safety records in the world.

Nearly six years ago, in March 2000, we set out plans to reduce deaths and serious injuries on the roads by 40 per cent. by 2010, and by 50 per cent. among children. The latest figures, for 2004, showed that the number of people killed or seriously injured had fallen by 28 per cent.—about 13,000 fewer casualties each year than in the mid-1990s, which is significant and more than halfway towards our target.

The number of children killed or seriously injured has been cut by 43 per cent., which is three quarters of the way towards our target of a 50 per cent. reduction, but as the House is aware, too many children are being killed. Furthermore, there are large regional variations, which are of special concern.

Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle) (Lab): I realise that later this year the Government will introduce new laws on booster seats in the back of motor vehicles, but why are there no proposals to make it compulsory for children to wear helmets when cycling? Why does the Department for Transport always turn its face against that sensible proposal?

Mr. Darling: My hon. Friend's first point is quite right. We are introducing new rules so that children under six have to travel in car booster seats and children between six and 11—up to the age of 12—have to be on a booster cushion. That is important.

As for cycle helmets, my hon. Friend knows from the last time he introduced a private Member's Bill that there are strongly held views on both sides of the argument. I accept that, although my preference is that people should wear helmets; the more we do to protect people against injury, the better. However, there is no provision in the Bill because there is by no means unanimity about what we ought to do. I have not the slightest doubt that my hon. Friend, and others, will return to the matter, and it is of course open to him to raise it in the various proceedings of the House.

Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): I agree with the measures that my right hon. Friend has described, but may I raise the wider issue of child fatalities? As my right hon. Friend will know, for the first time since records began, Edinburgh has been fortunate enough to experience no child fatalities for three years running. Does he agree that one reason for that has been the 20 mph limit? Will the Bill implement 20 mph zones throughout the country where that is feasible, so that the record that we have been fortunate enough to achieve in Edinburgh can be replicated in local authority areas with a less good record?

Mr. Darling: I agree with my hon. Friend that we have been very fortunate in Edinburgh. There have been no child fatalities over the past few years, and long may that continue. The 20 mph speed limits outside primary schools have no doubt been a factor in that—Edinburgh has implemented quite a few over the past year or so—but it is also due to better road design and a general awareness on the part of drivers that they must drive very carefully when there are children around.

As my hon. Friend knows, local authorities have power to impose 20 mph speed limits where that is appropriate. I do not think that they should be mandatory, because road conditions near schools and hospitals are different in each town and city. That is why discretion should lie with local authorities. Nevertheless, we must do all we can to prevent child fatalities. There are wide variations in different parts of the country, and local authorities owe it to children to think carefully about what measures they can take. Those may well include 20 mph speed limits.

Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside) (Lab/Co-op): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Darling: I will, but then I must make some progress. Although this is a six-hour debate we are taking up a large chunk of it, and I have not yet begun to deal directly with the Bill.

Mrs. Ellman: In the context of child casualties, and indeed other casualties, will my right hon. Friend think again about one of the variable penalty proposals, which will reduce the number of penalty points for breaking the 30 mph speed limit? The Department's own publicity depicts a child saying:

"Hit at 40 mph: There is an 80 per cent. chance I'll die. Hit at 30 mph: There is an 80 per cent. chance I'll live".

Mr. Darling: If my hon. Friend will allow me, I will deal with that point at the stage when I planned to deal with it. I would be the last to claim that my speech has a shape to it, but such shape as there is will probably disappear if I deal with points in a different order.

The Bill has four key themes. The first is the need to deal with bad or irresponsible driving, whether it consists of speeding, drink-driving or carelessness. The second is the need to deal with motorists who break the law by driving without insurance, or using vehicles that are not roadworthy. Thirdly, we want to make it more difficult for foreign drivers to escape penalties for a specific range of driving offences in this country. Fourthly, we have proposed measures to raise standards and improve awareness. Let me say now, for the benefit of Members who may seek to intervene, that I will deal with those themes in that order.

Research shows that all drivers consider themselves to be better than average. I do not know whether that applies to everyone who is present today, but apparently it is the case. Nevertheless, poor driving is a key factor in many accidents. For example, nearly a third of car occupants who die have been involved in single vehicle accidents—accidents involving no other vehicle. Unfortunately, statistics suggest that the number of such accidents is increasing. It therefore seems sensible to bear down on some of the possible causes. One moment of carelessness or lack of attention can lead to serious consequences.

Clauses 20 and 21 introduce new offences of causing death by careless or inconsiderate driving and causing death by driving while unlicensed, disqualified or uninsured.

Much of our Second Reading debate on the earlier Bill, which my hon. Friend missed out on, concerned precisely those issues. Until now, while it was possible to convict someone for causing death by dangerous driving, if the driving was merely careless it was not possible to convict. It is also important for us to be able to deal with drivers who are not insured, have not paid their tax or are disqualified. Until now a high level of proof has been required for conviction, and the clauses will make a substantial difference in that regard.

Kitty Ussher (Burnley) (Lab): I am very heartened by what my right hon. Friend is saying, as will be the family and friends of Levi Bleasdale and all those affected by her tragic death in my constituency. She was three years old when she was killed by a hit-and-run driver last year. I am sure that my right hon. Friend will understand my shock, and that of many of my constituents, at the lack of custodial sentences available for those who kill through careless driving. Does he share my outrage at the Conservatives' attempts to water down our provisions in the other place? Will he commit himself to reintroducing a charge of causing death by careless driving with a maximum sentence of five years, triable in a magistrates court?

Mr. Darling: We will do that. I think it important for magistrates courts to have that disposal. As my hon. Friend is doubtless aware, conviction for causing death by dangerous driving will carry a sentence of up to five years.

It is of course for Parliament to determine the penalties, and the range of penalties, but I do not think that I am the only Member who thinks it important for the courts to regard someone who kills someone else using a car in the same way as someone using any other means of killing people. I suspect that most of us know of cases similar to that raised by my hon. Friend, in which constituents have lost young children, and someone has been convicted but justice is not seen to have been done. It is equally important for drivers to realise that the minute they sit behind a wheel they are driving something with the potential to cause death or serious injury.

There has been a good deal of support in the House for the creation of that new offence. If the measure is passed, it will be on the statute book by the end of the year or the beginning of next year. The courts will have adequate powers; I hope that they will convict if the evidence justifies conviction, and, in particular, that the punishment will fit the crime. Taking a life is taking a life, no matter how it is done.

Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): As my right hon. Friend says, drivers need to be more aware of their own technical ability. Will he congratulate the Institute for Advanced Motorists, which celebrates its 50th anniversary this year? Does he agree that it is not a fuddy-duddy organisation, but an organisation for young and new drivers, and for very good drivers? Only last year, its president, Nigel Mansell—a man of great driving talent—recognised that it was appropriate for him to take the IAM course. His lead should be followed by every Member of Parliament.

Mr. Darling: I have sometimes been tempted to take the course myself but have not got there yet. I agree that the institute is very important, and people should be encouraged to take its courses. I believe that some insurance companies give their clients credit for having taken them. In my experience, pointing to a financial advantage sometimes helps people along the way.

The Bill also seeks to change the law relating to drivers who are not insured. The present law allows illegal drivers to be prosecuted only for disqualified driving, driving without insurance or driving without a licence, unless their driving was at fault, in which case a charge of careless or dangerous driving would be applicable. Under the new proposals, a driver who was on the road illegally—without insurance—would be liable if, but for his presence on the road, an accident and consequent death would not have occurred, even if the standard of his driving was not at fault.

That is a major step forward. It deals with a particular cause of concern throughout the country: people who steal cars, or do not bother to insure their cars. If such people are on the road and a fatal accident occurs, it must be right to enable the courts to act.

Adam Price (Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr) (PC): Taking a life is taking a life, but in this context we are surely talking in some cases about momentary misjudgments when there was no deliberate intent on the part of the individual to take a life. Surely that should be reflected in the Secretary of State's comments.

Mr. Darling: Yes. A substantial body of case law in relation to that and other matters allows the court to hear the evidence and then come to a view as to whether someone is guilty of that offence. Careless and inconsiderate driving is defined in the Bill. The hon. Gentleman is right: before someone can be sentenced, they have to be convicted in law beyond reasonable doubt, so the courts are well used to determining these matters. For example, prosecutors have to decide whether there is sufficient evidence that someone has caused death by dangerous driving or careless driving. The court has to decide whether that is the case, but it would be wrong of us not to give courts the option of being able to convict someone where the evidence points clearly to the fact that their conduct was such that the natural result was someone being killed, even though they perhaps did not intend that.

The hon. Gentleman is right in saying that the new proposal goes further than existing law, but I think that it is fully justified. The courts will, of course, be able to hear the evidence and come to a view. However, as with all these things, if he is making a bid to get on to the Committee that will scrutinise the Bill, he can no doubt explore the issue at greater length there.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): Does the Secretary of State agree that the current situation is that if someone pleads guilty to careless driving, the court is in many cases not even told that someone died?

Mr. Darling: I will need to take some advice on that. The hon. Gentleman may be right but, in my view, when passing sentence, a court needs to be aware of all the circumstances. There is a world of difference between careless driving resulting in knocking over a flower pot and careless driving resulting in someone dying. The offence I have just described relates to someone who should not be on the road—because their car is not insured, for example. The Bill goes a lot further. It would be inconceivable in such cases for the court not to know that there had been a fatality.

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): In many cases, a driver who kills commits a multitude of offences, but the feeling among families of the victims is that not all those offences are totted up. The three new offences that my right hon. Friend referred to a few minutes ago have a maximum penalty of two years' imprisonment. Is it his view that if a driver has committed multiple offences, the court should tot up the sentences?

Mr. Darling: What to charge someone with is a matter entirely for the prosecutors in each case. It is not uncommon, as my hon. Friend knows, for someone to be charged with a number of offences. If they are convicted of all of them, the court has to take that into account. Equally, in some cases, someone is charged with one or two offences, rather than the lot, because that is what the prosecution thinks it can get a conviction on.

I strongly believe that decisions on whether to prosecute and what to charge someone with are matters for the independent prosecution authorities, not for Ministers or Parliament, but it is for Parliament to set the range of offences and decide what is the mischief that we are trying to get at. That is what we are attempting to do.

Mr. Angus MacNeil (Na h-Eileanan an Iar) (SNP): On a point of clarification, if the right hon. Gentleman was driving in Edinburgh, for example, and someone walked in front of him, he hit them, knocked them down and, unfortunately and heaven forfend, killed them, after the Bill had been enacted, what would the difference be in the way he was treated?

Mr. Darling: As I explained earlier, the position would not change as regards someone who was driving along and was insured. The question would be whether they were driving carelessly or dangerously. Under the Bill, if someone were driving carelessly because they were not paying proper attention or doing something that reduced their attention to the road, they could be charged with causing death by careless driving. On the other hand, they could be blameless. If the person driving along was not insured and there was a fatality, then, depending on the circumstances, under the additional measure to which I referred, it might be possible to charge that person with an offence.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman will understand that much depends on the circumstances of each case. We are plugging a gap because, until this Bill, hopefully, becomes law, it is not possible to charge a person with causing death by careless driving. Nor is it possible in every circumstance to get at someone who should not be on the road in the first place and whose car is involved in an accident involving a fatality. All those issues will no doubt be explored further in Committee.

I have mentioned uninsured driving. Continuous registration has helped. The additional powers to which I referred earlier have helped in tracking people down and dealing with them where they have broken the law. Equally, electronic registration in the renewal of tax discs, which we introduced just last year, is helping to catch people who try to skip a month on their insurance, for example. However, the Bill also introduces a new offence of being the keeper of a vehicle, the use of which is not insured. Unless people have registered a statutory declaration and the thing is off the road, there will be an offence of keeping the car where it is not insured.

The Bill increases penalties for careless and inconsiderate driving. The fine doubles to £5,000. As I said, clause 30 defines careless and inconsiderate driving for the first time. There is already a statutory definition of dangerous driving. For using a hand-held mobile phone while driving and for failing to have proper control of a vehicle, a mandatory endorsement is introduced. For repeat offences of using a vehicle in a dangerous condition, there is mandatory disqualification if the offence is repeated within three years. That is a minimum of six months' disqualification.

Excessive speed contributes to just over a third of fatalities—that means about 1,000 deaths every year—as well as being a factor in another 40,000 injuries. Several police forces now offer "low-end speeders" the option of going on speed awareness courses, and that will be in the Bill as a disposal available to the courts. The Association of Chief Police Officers is putting in place a national programme of awareness courses, which, of course, we welcome.

The greatest reduction in such casualties would come from reducing speed across the board, and that is where speed cameras come in. I believe that, on any view one cares to take, speed cameras are saving lives and reducing speed. However, as I said in 2004—my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mrs. Ellman) raised the point—we need to do more to ensure that the punishment fits the crime. A graduated system of penalties from two to six points, rather than the present system, would ensure that a distinction was made between someone who was just over the limit and someone who was driving way over the limit.

I said last time—the Bill provides for this—that the Government would undertake consultation. Under the Bill, we have to consult and people will be able to respond. I think I am right in saying that, in the consultation on the principle of the measure in 2004–05, just over half of respondents said they were in favour of graduated penalties. Obviously, when we consult fully, we will see what people have to say. After that consultation, there will be proposals. A measure will come before the House, and it will be subject to the usual affirmative procedure.

Paul Rowen (Rochdale) (LD) rose—

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con) rose—

Mr. Darling: I will give way in a moment.

There is probably a range of views in the House, but I yield to no one in my belief that speed cameras are playing an essential role. The changes that I announced towards the end of last year will help further, but I think that it is right to introduce a graduated system, using points and the fines that flow from them, to reflect the fact that different speeds are sometimes involved.

Andrew Selous: Does the Secretary of State agree that we should all be equal under the law as far as speed cameras are concerned and that it is therefore not right that people who incorrectly register their vehicle details are able to avoid penalties from speed cameras? I can show the Secretary of State details of one vehicle caught 73 times in my constituency doing speeds of up to 119 miles per hour, but the police are powerless to deal with it. Does he agree that, at the very least, that is a serious issue, which he and his Ministers should look into?

Mr. Darling: I understand that the hon. Gentleman has raised this issue with the Minister of State, who has agreed to meet him to discuss it. If we need to amend the Bill to deal with that problem, we will see what can be done. I am not making any promises, but let us explore the issue because the hon. Gentleman makes a fair point. If people are using a false address or fiddling the system and the police cannot get to them, we need to sort that out, and we will do so.

Paul Rowen: The other place introduced an amendment on the use of income from speed cameras. What does the Secretary of State plan to do about it?

Mr. Darling: We have already dealt with that issue, so the amendment is not necessary. The hon. Gentleman will be aware that when the three-year assessment of speed cameras was published last year, I changed the funding arrangements. Part of the problem is that people have tended over the years to regard speed cameras as a free option because it cost nothing to put them in. I want to ensure that where there is a particular safety problem, local authorities and the police can consider various factors such as changing the road layout or the speed limit, as well as the introduction of speed cameras. The amendment tabled in the other place might have been worthy of consideration had we not decided to change the funding regime, but as we are in the process of changing it—some £110 million will be available to local authorities—the amendment is not appropriate, and we will deal with it when it comes before the Standing Committee.

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): Will the Secretary of State make a comparison between normal speed cameras and the clever electronic advisory signs used in many villages, in order to see which works best at producing slower traffic movements?

Mr. Darling: I am with the hon. Gentleman on this. These signs, which are used more in villages and small towns than in cities, are very effective. They light up to warn drivers that they are going at 35 mph—so I am told. [Interruption.] I have never noticed them myself. To be fair, a policeman drove me through a village outside Edinburgh to show me what happens, and I sat in the passenger seat marvelling at the technology. Such signs are effective, but if we give the money to local authorities and the police, they can decide what measures are best. In some cases, speed cameras are the best solution, and they are effective; but in others, different measures might be more effective.

Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): I agree with, and support very strongly, my right hon. Friend's point of view on speed cameras, but I also agree with what my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mrs. Ellman) said about graduated speeding penalties. Will not such penalties inevitably lead to some people taking chances by driving faster than they otherwise would, thereby leading to an incremental increase in deaths and injuries at the margin? Has my right hon. Friend's Department done any research on what might happen under such a system?

Mr. Darling: It is difficult to research something that has not yet happened. My own belief is that most people start from the point of view that they do not want any points on their licence or to be fined. I am not sure that that many people say, "I don't mind getting two points, but I don't want three." I look at this issue in a slightly different way: we should distinguish between someone who does 36 mph and someone who does 66 mph, and that is why the graduated scheme is better. I recognise that people have strong views on this proposal, and the last time we consulted on it, the division was about 50:50, with slightly more in favour of graduated penalties. If the Bill is passed, the next stage will be to consult on specific proposals, and depending on that consultation, we will put them before both Houses and they will be voted on. We must ensure that people appreciate that keeping their speed low is the important thing, but when someone does break the law, the punishment should fit the crime. Some graduation is necessary, but when we discuss this issue in Committee, Members will doubtless let us know what they think.

Mr. Tom Harris (Glasgow, South) (Lab): In some areas, under the current system, drivers who speed at, for example, between 31 and 40 mph in a 30 mph zone might not be prosecuted unless and until they reach 40 mph. Under a system of variable endorsement levels, might not more such drivers end up being prosecuted because the endorsement level is less? I am not saying that that is necessarily an unwanted consequence, but might it not be one?

Mr. Darling: I am not sure that that will be so, unless the general policy changes on how such cases are pursued. This is a classic case of different views being held in all parts of the House, and I am sure that we will have a decent discussion in Committee. I still tend to the view, which is the Government's, that we should have a graduated response, but I shall be interested to hear what Members have to say. All of us know of people who have been done for going just over the limit, and we must contrast that with someone who drives at 60 mph in a 40 mph zone, which is an extremely serious offence.

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Darling: Yes, but then I must make some progress.

Mr. Carmichael: I am grateful to the Secretary of State for giving way. I am intrigued by his earlier example of somebody driving at 66 mph in a 30 mph zone. Under the current system, surely such a person would be prosecuted through the courts, rather than receiving a fixed penalty from the police. In fact, it is quite possible that they would be prosecuted not just for speeding but for dangerous driving. Will his new measure take people who are guilty of driving at higher speeds out of the court system and away from public scrutiny?

Mr. Darling: No. I think that I gave the example of someone driving at 66 mph in a 40 mph zone, and if I did not, I apologise. As it happens, 66 mph, according to guidelines from the Association of Chief Police Officers, is on the cusp in terms of being sent to court, so such a person might or might not be sent to court. I used that example because the point is that someone who does 66 mph in a 40 mph zone could get the same number of points and the same fine as someone who does 36 mph; I ask the House to reflect on that.

I will of course take further interventions, but I want first to make further progress. As I said earlier, courts will have recourse to retraining courses, and we will raise the penalty for failing to identify a driver to six penalty points. We will also clarify the law on speeding exemptions and the associated training requirements. People who are transporting organs for transplant by car, for example, are sometimes stopped by the police, and the law in that area needs to be clarified.

On any view, there has been a significant drop in the number of deaths and injuries at safety camera sites. Devices that detect or jam such equipment need to be dealt with, and the Bill does that.

[Mr. Darling]

There has been a change in Britain's culture in terms of drink-driving. Generally speaking, the figures have come down since the 1970s, but alcohol is still a factor in about one in seven of all fatal crashes, accounting for some 500 deaths a year. What is worse, 20 per cent. of such offenders are repeat offenders. The statistics also show that younger, predominantly male drivers are more likely to be under the influence of alcohol. So we are giving the courts the power to make repeat drink-driving offenders retake their driving test. That will require secondary legislation, but the principle needs to be dealt with in the Bill. That way, repeat offenders will be kept off the roads until they have completed the necessary medical examination. We will also enable the use of alcohol ignition interlocks, which have been shown to be effective in discouraging reoffending. I hope that all these measures, backed up by others such as advertising, will get across the message that drinking and driving kills.

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend also acknowledge the very real problem of driving under the influence of drugs? What progress is being made in finding an effective way of testing people for drugs?

Mr. Darling: I agree that driving under the influence of anything that impairs judgment—drugs are the obvious example—is just as dangerous as the specific example of alcohol. The difficulty, as I understand it, lies in developing roadside equipment that can detect the presence of drugs; however, people can of course be taken to a police station for a blood test. A number of people are working on this issue because, sadly, as my hon. Friend knows, people driving under the influence of drugs is as much of a problem as people driving under the influence of drink.

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): Has my right hon. Friend been convinced by the evidence that a lower drink-drive limit would save lives and by the argument from the Parliamentary Advisory Council for Transport Safety—I declare an interest as a member—for targeted testing by the police, based on intelligence, instead of random testing?

Mr. Darling: My view is that we need to concentrate on those people who are breaking the law now. As my hon. Friend knows, the lower the level is set, the more difficult it is to justify, because people may have low levels of alcohol in their bodies for all sorts of reasons other than the fact that they have had a drink. The biggest problem we face is from people who are not just over the limit, but way over the limit. That is why the measures in the Bill are important.

I should make it clear that if hon. Members think that we should adopt any other measures, we are willing to listen to any such proposals. However, I am not convinced by the argument advanced by PACTS. Incidentally, the stuff on the front pages of newspapers yesterday about the use of cameras was rubbish, as a simple inquiry could have established.

Kelvin Hopkins: I am still concerned by my right hon. Friend's view that we should not reduce the permitted level of blood alcohol. I understand that the majority of European countries now have lower limits than we do and there must be evidence that death rates have fallen as a result.

Mr. Darling: The problem for much of continental Europe is that they have much higher rates of offending. They have a low limit, but it is not actually enforced. The French Government have a big problem with this issue and have stepped up detection significantly in the past few years. What matters is that people need to know that there is a strong likelihood that they will be caught. We have been working with chief constables, who have to decide where to target their resources. I strongly believe that the police should target drink driving, because it is a problem, not only at Christmas time, but throughout the year.

The second theme is measures to stop people who drive without tax and insurance. Continuous vehicle registration has helped and the House may be interested to know that vehicle licence evasion has fallen by 400,000 since 2002, which means that the revenue lost from evasion has dropped by £60 million in the same time. The Bill allows the regulation of registration plate suppliers to be extended to Scotland and Northern Ireland. It also enables us to share driver and vehicle data with foreign authorities. That is important, because one of the themes that has emerged, especially with more and more foreign vehicles being driven in this country, is the lack of access to information about who owns them. We need to do more to build co-operation across Europe on that issue. I hope that those measures will command support on both sides of the House, although I understand that in certain parts, co-operation with Europe creates some difficulties.

When we first published the Bill, it enabled the Department to require the surrender of paper driving licences, probably some time after 2008, to allow them to be replaced with photocard driving licences. That part of the Bill was removed in the other place. We will reintroduce that important measure, because the police need to be sure that the person they stop at the roadside is producing their own documents. Last year alone, the police brought to the DVLA's attention approximately 1,200 cases in which individuals had set up more than one identity, and some of them had many identities. All of us know that the paper driving licence is reasonably easy to manipulate and therefore misrepresent. We should therefore introduce a photographic licence that has better security and makes such deception much more difficult. I am sorry that the Conservatives in the other place are opposed to that: I hope that the Conservatives here will take a more realistic view. The police and others rely on driving licences and they should be as secure as possible. We do not plan to make the change immediately, but at some point it will be necessary to recall paper licences and replace them with licences that are more robust.

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell) (Con): One of the concerns expressed in the Lords was the potential link between the replacement of paper driving licences and the Government's plans for identity cards. If those two are completely divorced, what he has said makes good sense. If he can give the House a clear undertaking to that effect, we would not have a problem with what he says.

Mr. Darling: That is not a debate that we need to have because I can give the hon. Gentleman that assurance. I refer him to what the Home Secretary said when we last debated identity cards. We are not planning to designate ID cards in that way, and they will be separate. The photographic licence would be a separate requirement for different reasons. At some stage, biometric information will be required and, given that the same information will be required for both passports and driving licences, it makes sense to co-operate on them, but the two documents will be distinct. My concern is to reduce the possibility that someone can use a paper licence to create false identities, with all the problems that that raises. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making that point.

The Bill will also require vehicle mileages to be reported to the DVLA, possibly at the time of the MOT to try to combat clocking.

The third element is our attempt to ensure that foreign drivers who break the laws here do not escape punishment. If a driver cannot or will not pay a fixed penalty, the police will be able to require a deposit. If people fail to pay the deposit or the police believe that they cannot rely on the address and information given, they will be able to immobilise the vehicle to prevent it from leaving the country. On most occasions, the value of the lorry is substantially more than the fine, so I hope that that will be a more effective way to stop people than simply imposing a fine that they then ignore. That measure is a welcome step forward.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): According to the Northamptonshire police, 70 per cent. of the traffic collisions on the M1 through the county are caused by foreign-owned heavy goods vehicles, because they do not have sufficient mirrors on the correct side. When they overtake, they pull out into other traffic. Will the Bill introduce any measures to assist with extra mirror provision on HGVs, so that the number of collisions may be reduced?

Mr. Darling: There are no such measures in the Bill, but we are working with other European Governments to deal with that problem. It is important that drivers of lorries in this country can see what is going on. I am not sure that the Bill is the right way to achieve that and it might be better achieved through Europe-wide legislation, because there might be reciprocal requirements for our lorries abroad. We are aware of the issue and my hon. Friend the Minister of State tells me that we are actively working on it. If the hon. Gentleman wants some further information, I am happy to write to him.

Mr. Greg Knight (East Yorkshire) (Con): Before the Secretary of State commends the Bill to the House and sits down, will he say something about clause 50. Where a motorist deliberately ignores a red flashing light and descending barriers at a railway level crossing, is there not a case for imposing a greater penalty than six points? In view of the likelihood of death or serious injury for many people as a result, is there not a case for a period of mandatory disqualification to be imposed?

Mr. Darling: I am not quite ready to commend the Bill to the House or to sit down: I am coming to the railway provisions and I will deal with that question then.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): To go back to the previous point, it is necessary not only that HGV drivers should be able to see other vehicles, but that other drivers should be able to see HGVs. He will be aware that the other place introduced new clause 16 on the conspicuousness of HGVs. It would be good to have a reassurance from the Government that they intend to leave the clause in the Bill and also that they will add a time scale for its introduction. My right hon. Friend will be aware that there has been a longstanding campaign on that issue, and I hope that it has now been successful.

Mr. Darling: I can perhaps cheer and disappoint my hon. Friend at the same time. We do not think that such legislation is needed, because such things will happen anyway, but when my hon. Friend the Minister of State explains the issue in Committee, he will amplify that and—who knows?—he might even deal with it extensively when he replies to the debate.

Other measures will introduce advanced learning packages and ensure that we improve the standards of tuition and instruction. There are proposals on the registration of instructors and others that will allow the publication of their performance, and other measures that, I hope, will raise people's general education and awareness of good driving on the roads.

I wish to draw the House's attention to the proposal on tiredness, which was contained in the previous Road Safety Bill. We intend to introduce picnic areas—or aires, as they are called in France—where people can stop, so that they need not go to a service station or McDonald's, or anything like that, to sit and relax, and the first one will be on the M5 in Somerset.

Other measures relate to radioactive material, London private hire vehicles and the certification of vehicles.

Mr. John Horam (Orpington) (Con): The Secretary of State mentions private hire vehicles in London. I suppose that he was referring to clause 58, under which the Government seek to extend what we think of as the "Minicab Act" to operators who solely hire vehicles under contract to local authorities—for example, those used to ferry children who have special needs to and from school and other such activities. Clause 58 will bring them into the minicab regulations, and many people think that it is a piece of over-regulation. I hope that he will consider representations on that issue sympathetically.

Mr. Darling: I will certainly look at representations, but we are trying to ensure that anyone who drives people and the quality of the vehicle used meet certain basic standards. If the hon. Gentleman wants to make representations, of course he can, but the objective of the provision is to try to ensure that we can balance individuals' needs with the requirements of the general public, so that they can be satisfied about standards generally.

On the Network Rail point, we will seek to remove the six new clauses introduced in another place, because they would not achieve what their movers wanted them to achieve, but we will introduce an alternative proposal that, I hope, will deal with that problem. The right hon. Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) asked in particular about the penalties for people who ignore the lights and cross the railway. The fine for doing that was increased to £5,000 in another place. A lower fine was proposed originally. I am concerned that there have been several incidents in the past year where people have clearly decided to take a gamble and tried to get through the barriers, thus putting at risk not just their own lives, but those of the people on the oncoming train.

Of course, we will not be able to deal with suicide cases that way—the fine would not make much difference—but I will reflect on such fines, endorsements or disqualifications to determine how we deal with such things. Several incidents in the past year or so, particularly on the east coast line and the lines off it, have caused me concern, and I want to think about how we should deal with them in the light of what has been said in the other place.

Mr. Greg Knight: I am grateful to the Secretary of State for that reply. Will he clarify his new ideas and thoughts on the issue? Does he envisage letting the House know what he is thinking during the passage of the Bill, or at some time in the future?

Mr. Darling: The appropriate time to consider the issue would be during the debates in Committee, which will probably take place in a couple of weeks' time, although I am not sure when we will reach that part of the Bill. Such a time scale would allow a proper debate to take place in Committee, and the House could then deal with the issue on Report if necessary. That is probably the best thing to do.

Just before I sit down, it is worth returning to the overall point. The road safety record in this country is good, but it obviously needs to get better. I am glad that the number of traffic police on the roads has increased in the past couple of years or so. I remind the House that the traffic officers for which the Highways Agency is responsible are now on most parts of the network, and almost 1,000 of them will be fully operational by the summer. They are already proving their worth, by helping to clear up after accidents, removing debris from the roads and attending to people whose vehicles have broken down. That also helps to improve road safety.

I am sure that the Bill contains measures that will make a difference. No doubt, further representations on further necessary measures will be made, and the Government will, of course, listen to them. Anything that we can do to improve road safety and the quality of driving on our roads must be supported, and on that basis I commend the Bill to the House.

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell) (Con): We welcome many aspects of the detail of the Bill. There are many things that divide us in the House, but securing people's safety on and around our roads is not one of them. We will back the Government in giving the Bill a Second Reading this evening—it contains some commendable measures—but we will not be afraid to be critical of its detail in Committee. We do not support some parts of it, we are sceptical about others, and we believe that some require tightening, but that is what debates in Committee are all about.

We hope to have constructive debates in Committee and on Report. We hope that our ideas about how we can improve the Bill will be listened to and that those constructive debates will lead to those proposals that are sensibly being enacted. Notwithstanding our support for much of the detail, the Bill does not do the job that it could do. It is a missed opportunity in many ways. It tends to be a patchwork of measures, rather than a strategy for improvement. The Secretary of State has touched on some of the big challenges, but they should be much more central to the direction of the Bill.

We face some huge challenges on our roads. The Secretary of State is right to suggest that casualty figures in this country are lower than in many other countries, but they are still too high. When a train crashes and people die, the news dominates the headlines for days, but on every day of every week of every year, more people die on the roads than in most major accidents on our railways and other modes of transport in this and other countries. Those accidents pass largely unnoticed, except in the areas where they take place. Far too many children, cyclists and motor cyclists die on our roads each year. Indeed, we are now seeing signs that, after long years of success, the improvements in road safety appear to have reached a plateau. I hope that the Bill, when it is passed into law, will make a difference in trying to push that trend downwards once again.

Mr. Tom Harris: I welcome the tone that the hon. Gentleman has struck so far, but will he confirm whether measures considered by the Conservative party during the last Parliament to raise the national speed limit to 80 mph will be considered by the new model Conservative party for inclusion in its next manifesto?

Chris Grayling: The hon. Gentleman tries to tempt me on to Conservative party policy making, which is something that we will be doing over the next 12 to 18 months. I do not intend to share all our thinking with him today. All I will say is that the steps that we will seek to propose, as we prepare to become the Government after 2009, will be designed to improve safety on our roads. That will be a central part of what we do; it should be a central part of what all political parties seek to do in their road transport strategies.

Kelvin Hopkins: I agree with much of what the hon. Gentleman has been saying so far. He talks about improving the Bill and refers to road traffic accidents reaching a plateau. We are now getting down to a hard core of a small number of persistent offenders. Some people are very bad drivers. Will he therefore suggest to the Government that they could get to that core group by imposing on those drivers longer and more frequent driving bans—possibly even lifetime bans—rather than financial penalties?

Chris Grayling: The hon. Gentleman is right to talk about the core group. If he bears with me, I shall come on to that because it is the central part of the problem that we face.

In the spirit of congeniality, let me say that the Government have done some smart things. We welcome those and want them to continue. The 20 mph speed limit in urban areas has made a difference. It is and will be the right thing to do in quiet residential side streets.

The Government were right to champion safe routes to schools. We all want improvements to the way in which our children get to school, and changes to ensure that they do so as safely as possible.

However, the hon. Gentleman puts his finger on the real issue: the Bill does not fully get to grips with the most significant part of the challenge that we face. In Britain, well over 1 million cars—a large number of drivers, indeed—are being driven around outside the confines of the law in a systematic way. In doing so, those people are placing law-abiding British people at risk. They have no insurance and are registered at false addresses. They ignore MOT requirements and fake or ignore tax discs. They are unlicensed and have often never bothered to learn to drive. They may be driving cloned vehicles—a big challenge in many of our cities—whereby they have deliberately stolen the identity of others so that they can offend with impunity.

In many areas, those unlicensed and uninsured cars ply for minicab business on our streets. All too frequently, those cars and their drivers, who operate outside the law, kill or maim. Research shows that they are 10 times more likely to have been convicted of drunk driving, six times more likely to have been convicted of driving an unsafe vehicle, and three times more likely to have been convicted of driving without due care and attention.

The Bill does not set out a clear enough strategy to deal with the problem. Of course, there are welcome steps in it and it contains things that will help to make a difference in tackling the problem. The measures on uninsured vehicles are sensible, but much more could be done to tackle the problem of uninsured drivers. For example, a £100 fine is not sufficient to address the problem of an uninsured car sitting in the street, undriven, outside someone's house. The British Insurance Brokers Association describes the measure as "totally insufficient".

Kelvin Hopkins: I agree strongly with the hon. Gentleman. Does he agree that removal, confiscation and disposal of such vehicles would be a much more effective penalty than a small financial penalty in the form of a fine?

Chris Grayling: I very much agree and hope that Ministers, and all those serving on the Committee, will discuss that in detail. It is one way to tighten the measure. The removal of a vehicle and its return only when a heavy fine and the cost of insurance are paid is one way to address that.

Tom Brake (Carshalton and Wallington) (LD): Does the hon. Gentleman regret, as I do, that the Home Office has withdrawn funding for a special scheme called "Scrap it", which enables local authorities to take those vehicles off the road extremely quickly?

Chris Grayling: The hon. Gentleman puts his finger on a problem. The Government are always asking our local authorities to take on responsibility after responsibility. Those may be desirable responsibilities, but many areas do not receive the funding for them. The decision about whether a local authority should tackle the problem of abandoned vehicles, for example, depends on whether it can afford to divert money from other key services.

We completely support the new penalty for causing death when unlicensed, uninsured or disqualified. No hon. Member could disagree with that, although there is an aspect of the measure that could be strengthened. However, the Government could have taken much tougher action against such drivers in other ways. My hon. Friend the Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous) last year highlighted the problem of people who commit multiple offences while driving and who shelter behind false addresses. I am grateful that Ministers are willing to talk about that now. My hon. Friend has campaigned on the issue for months. Police forces around the country have made noises about it for months and have made a little progress. The measure is overdue.

The problem essentially is that offenders are registering their vehicles behind false addresses. There are a number of addresses in Essex, for example, at which dozens of vehicles are registered. When a driver commits an offence—whether going past a speed camera at high speed, parking illegally or something else—and the authorities try to track down the users of those vehicles, they find themselves dealing with the front address and have no possible means of finding the owners. That cannot be right and it must be tackled.

Officers dealing with those problems on the front line say that they do not have adequate legal backing to impound such vehicles if they find them. They are uncertain about the powers that exist. The Bill is an opportunity to provide them with much greater clarity and, perhaps, with powers to seize vehicles at the roadside if they are stopped and for automatic confiscation. However, I am sure you would agree, Madam Deputy Speaker, that it cannot be right to have vehicles on our road that rack up thousands of pounds in fines with a brazen disregard for the law. I have seen a photograph from Bedfordshire of a couple of young men in an old car driving past a speed camera, both leaning wide out of the windows and sticking two fingers up at the camera as they go by. That is the kind of brazen disregard for the law that we must tackle.

Likewise, I want to see clearer measures to tackle the massive problem of untaxed vehicles. Local authorities and local police do not often have the resources or the ability to deal with the problem in the way that they might wish. I want to see tougher action still against unlicensed drivers. There are measures in the Bill, but more could be done. We need much tougher penalties on hit-and-run drivers. We heard one or two examples from Back-Bench Members about the devastating impact of hit-and-run driving. It remains the case that if someone is involved in an accident having drunk too much alcohol, the law provides an incentive to drive away at speed. A person may be less likely to be disqualified as a result of leaving the scene of the accident than if he stays and is breathalysed. We should address that. There is no excuse whatever for motorists driving away from the scene of an accident. We should prosecute those who do with the toughest force of the law, and that should include long disqualifications.

Ms Keeble: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that a case like that of Levi Bleasdale, which was mentioned, would be partially tackled by the Bill? Nothing will compensate parents for the loss of their child, but it would make it possible to get such a driver for causing death by careless driving and to give him the increased prison sentence for driving without a licence. If the two sentences ran consecutively—my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was asked about that—the driver could be imprisoned for up to seven years. It would not compensate for a life lost, but it would be much more than the six weeks, or whatever, that the driver got.

Chris Grayling: The hon. Lady misses the point. I am not talking purely about fatal accidents, but about minor accidents as well.

Ms Keeble: It was a tragic case.

Chris Grayling: Of course, and it needed to be prosecuted with the force of the law. Having read the case, a charge of dangerous driving should have been seriously considered. As I recall, the driver was unlicensed, and the measure that we support to tackle the problem of unlicensed drivers would do the job. However, it is not always about dealing with accidents that cause death. We also need to deal with accidents in which there are serious or relatively minor injuries. There is no excuse whatever for any driver who is involved in an accident simply to drive away. There are times when the law provides a perverse incentive to do so. If someone has drunk too much, has a minor accident and drives away, he is probably slightly less likely to be disqualified for a year than if he stops and is breathalysed. That cannot be sensible. There is no excuse for driving away from the scene of an accident.

We also need to change the rules under which the DVLA operates when false addresses are used. I had a case in my constituency recently of a family barraged with legal notices because the previous owners of their house had not changed the address on their driving licences. They did that entirely deliberately so that they could use false information to commit offences with impunity. Yet the DVLA is not allowed under current rules to amend its records without written notification from the licence holder. If I move house, commit offences everywhere and leave the people who bought my house to pick up the problems that that causes—police and bailiffs knocking on the door, and so forth—the only person who can get the details changed is me, and since I am the offender I am hardly likely to do that. I hope that we can also tackle that problem.

Dr. Pugh: The hon. Gentleman may not be aware that the DVLA has a sophisticated database that enables it to take a registration plate and work out who the owner is, but it does not enable it to go the other way by starting off with the owner and finding out what cars are registered in his name. That would be a small technical change that would approve things ahead of legislation. There is no case for not doing it.

Chris Grayling: That is an interesting idea, and I suggest that the hon. Gentleman include it in an amendment and discuss it with Ministers. I am not familiar with the detail of the issue, but it could be debated constructively during the passage of the Bill.

I do not condone any motoring offence, but sometimes the Government choose the easier option when they regulate against motorists and thus fail to get to grips with the serious challenge posed by people who systematically ignore the law on tax, insurance, drink-driving and related issues. The Bill is therefore a missed opportunity. We will work constructively in Committee to address that, and we will try to introduce measures to strengthen the provisions against the most lawless drivers. I hope that the Government are willing to work with us constructively as we seek to do so.

There are three areas in which we want to change the detail of the Bill including, first, the most controversial part of the Bill—the provision to introduce much tougher sentences for careless drivers. I understand clearly and in detail the Government's motivation for proposing a change. There is a serious problem with the distinction between the offences of careless and dangerous driving. We are all aware of instances in which the Crown Prosecution Service has not pursued a dangerous driving case so the offender has escaped with a sentence that appears much too lenient, given the crime that was committed. We therefore understand why many families are angry when a motorist's actions lead to the death of a loved one but that individual is charged with dangerous driving and escapes with only a fine.

Those families and the organisations that work with them have made a powerful case to all hon. Members in the past few weeks. We accept the need to change the current system, but we have genuine reservations about the detail of the Government's proposals. When we debate those proposals, I hope that Members on both sides of the House will accept that our concerns are genuine and not party political. We are not interested in playing off the interests of motorists against the interests of road safety, as we have a duty to get these things right. I have two concerns about the proposals, including the use of the term "careless or inconsiderate" in the wording of the proposed new offence.

In framing legislation, the House must find the right balance between acceptance that people make mistakes, sometimes with terrible but unintended consequences, and the need to ensure that if people act in a way that they can reasonably be expected to know is unsafe they can be held to account when their action results in tragedy. That is not an easy dividing line for any politician to find, and I accept that there is a dilemma facing Ministers. There are serious difficulties. How do we judge whether someone should have looked a little harder when leaving a junction? How do we judge someone who swerves to avoid an animal and kills a cyclist instead? Is someone driving just within the speed limit on an icy road on a dark morning—conditions that could be considered dangerous—driving carelessly or dangerously? I do not believe that this country's tradition of fairness and justice makes it sensible to provide in law for long sentences for careless drivers. What does "inconsiderate" mean? Are we going to send someone to prison for five years for being inconsiderate? We therefore have serious reservations about the drafting of the offence. We will debate it carefully in Committee and introduce proposals to improve the current system.

Steve McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green) (Lab): I am following the hon. Gentleman's argument with interest, but is not the case that he cited, of someone who swerves to avoid an animal but inadvertently kills a cyclist, a classic example of careless driving, but with the extraordinary consequences to which he referred earlier? Is it not right to impose a heavier penalty in those circumstances for that level of carelessness?

Chris Grayling: I am afraid that I simply do not agree with the hon. Gentleman. Sometimes on the road people make snap judgments that are wrong and that have devastating consequences. There is no intent to kill. There may have been misjudgment—with greater experience, they might have avoided that misjudgment—but that does not make them criminals who deserve a long prison sentence. We must make suitable provision in law. There are cases in which people slip through the net, and in such cases the penalty should probably have been stronger. However, I am profoundly uncomfortable with the introduction of a penalty that is so wide ranging that it drags people who have committed an offence in the circumstances that I have just described into the net of a long prison sentence.

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): May I clarify something so that I can respond properly to the hon. Gentleman later? Is it the principle of the offence of causing death by careless driving about which he is concerned, or is it just the detail of the way in which we have defined "careless"? If we manage to agree on that detail in Committee, will he withdraw his objection?

Chris Grayling: It is the principle of the word "careless" that is the problem. If the Government can define in detail a form of words with which we are comfortable we are happy to look at their proposals. Traditionally, there has been an acceptance in British law of the dividing line between carelessness and dangerousness. The way in which that dividing line operates is not satisfactory, as it is handled differently by the courts and the Crown Prosecution Service. I therefore have reservations about "careless" and "inconsiderate", particularly the latter word, which is very loose indeed.

Ms Keeble: Can the hon. Gentleman expand his argument? I introduced a private Member's Bill that dealt with penalties for causing death or serious injury by careless driving, and I thought that he was supporting that approach earlier. What hierarchy of offences and penalties does he propose to introduce to achieve justice for the public, as the Bill would, if he does not accept the offence of careless driving?

Chris Grayling: I am grateful to the hon. Lady, as she has steered me towards the second part of my argument. I do not want to rehearse this afternoon what should be a careful and thoughtful discussion in Committee. The fine detail of the definitions in the Bill is properly a matter for Committee. I am simply seeking to emphasise the fact that we are not comfortable with the idea of the offence of careless or inconsiderate driving being subject to a substantial penalty. We hope that there will be a constructive debate in Committee that will find a way forward, as I accept the principle behind the Government's proposals.

The main point that the hon. Lady made, however, is extremely important, and it reveals another weakness in those proposals. Why does the provision for heavier punishment apply only to accidents where there is a fatality? Someone may be found guilty of causing an accident in which the victim dies, and that may merit five years in prison. Why is that different from an accident in which someone is paralysed for life? There is no attempt in the Bill to make provision for such a case, so I would welcome an amendment to the new provision for heavier punishment to include people who drive while uninsured or disqualified and cause serious injury, such as a lifetime injury that prevents someone from working again. That is an omission on the Government's part. The hon. Lady is right. If someone who is driving without insurance or a licence and thus flouting the laws of the road runs someone over, disfiguring them for life, why should the penalty be any different from the penalty for causing a fatality? I hope that Ministers will give that due consideration in Committee.

I hope that we have a constructive debate in Committee and that everyone in the House accepts that we share their motivations, as well as the motivations of campaign groups, so that we secure justice for the victims of utterly unacceptable behaviour on our roads. However, we do not want to criminalise people who make a misjudgment. Whether we like it or not, people in our society make misjudgments which, with hindsight, they probably should not have made. However, there was no intent, and they made a mistake. I want to make sure that there is a key difference between making an horrendous mistake and doing something that is utterly unacceptable.

My second area of inquiry concerns the Government's plan to use alcohol interlock devices in cars to reduce a driver's disqualification period. I am sceptical about that: I appreciate that it has been piloted, and that there have been discussions with the insurance industry, but I want serial drink-drivers to be taken off the road and given long bans. They should not have the right significantly to reduce their disqualification periods simply by placing a piece of technology in their cars.

We do not know whether alcohol interlock devices are foolproof. Ideas are certainly in circulation about how one can get round them, and I have had a couple of conversations about that in the past week. I have no idea whether the devices can be circumvented, but I am not sure that I want to put that to the test, as history shows that people can be pretty ingenious when it comes to getting around technological barriers.

I see no compelling reason to go down that route, or to believe that society will reap huge benefits as a result. We will merely be introducing yet another system that has to be managed and organised, at a cost to the taxpayer. I appreciate that motorists will have to pay for the piece of kit, but public officials will have to organise its installation and the courts will have to have a follow-through process to make sure that it is installed. The proposal will cost the taxpayer, come what may, and who will administer and supervise the process? We should keep serial drink-drivers off the roads, and I am not convinced that alcohol interlock devices are the right way forward.

Secondly, I now have a better understanding of why the Government propose that motorists who offend should go on driving education courses and thus gain some remission of their penalties, but I hope that they will make it clearer in Committee how they envisage that the system will work. What must not happen is that a person facing a three-month disqualification for speeding can get back on the road quickly, simply by signing up for a day's course.

Thirdly, I was pleased by what the Secretary of State had to say about safety on level crossings, and I am glad that he is thinking positively about it. We thought that the measures added in the Lords were constructive, but we believe that they do not go far enough. The House should be clear that driving a car across a level crossing that is closed and has its warning lights flashing is an offence that should be treated with the utmost severity. Some horrendous railway accidents have been caused by cars on level crossings, and sometimes the circumstances mean that it is impossible for the law to do anything. There was a tragic incident near Newbury in 2004, when it is believed that a motorist sought to commit suicide by parking in front of a train. No new laws can prevent such acts, but we should take a very different view when a driver is intent simply on dodging the crossing and avoiding delay.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wimbledon (Stephen Hammond) and I have watched the Network Rail presentation of CCTV footage of absurdly dangerous behaviour by motorists at level crossings, and I suspect that Ministers have done the same. I shall describe one example to the House. One CCTV excerpt showed a level crossing with a queue of cars. A clearly impatient driver pulled out of the queue and drove around the other cars to the crossing, which had a half barrier rather than a full one. The driver steered through the barrier, only realising at the last moment that a train was about to arrive. He braked hard and reversed quickly to get out of its way. The car missed the oncoming train by a matter of feet. Had the two collided, there might have been a multiple-fatality railway accident. Such driving can only be described as absurdly dangerous, with a wanton disregard for the safety of passengers on the train.

If that were an isolated incident we might not argue for change, but such driving is not rare. A couple of weeks ago, I received a written answer from the Minister of State to the effect that there are 20 or so collisions each year involving cars and trains at level crossings. Many more incidents go unreported, with vehicles coming close to collision or with drivers simply getting away with jumping the lights and the gates.

My hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson), who will wind up the debate for the Opposition, has told me that there have been 22 such incidents at one crossing in his constituency in the past year alone, and about 75 in all across the county of Shropshire. Therefore, we think that their lordships were right to say that the problem needed to be addressed, and the Government were wrong to question their arguments. I am delighted that Ministers have had a change of heart, and we look forward to the amendment that they will introduce.

The amendments tabled in the Lords contain a provision to issue six penalty points to drivers crossing a level crossing when its barriers are down, but that does not go far enough. Actions that so blatantly jeopardise other people's lives should incur a minimum penalty that includes a substantial period of disqualification from driving. In my view, it is as dangerous to drive across a level crossing when the gates are down as it is to drink and drive. There is no reason why there should be a noticeable difference in the punishments available for the two offences.

As has always been our intention, we will introduce in Committee our idea of how an amendment to that effect might work. However, given what the Secretary of State has said today, I hope that we can have a constructive debate and end up with a sensible basic measure to improve safety on level crossings that we can all agree on. If motorists behave in a way that is totally thoughtless and reckless, the consequences can be serious—for them, and for the many innocent people on trains that go through level crossings.

Finally, there is one big assumption behind the Bill that causes us anxiety and which we think will make it difficult to make its measures work. The Bill assumes that the police will deal with the problem of enforcing all the new penalties, and the Secretary of State said as much in his opening remarks. He mentioned the new force of traffic officers on our motorways, but he must realise that in many parts of the country, barely a handful of police are on duty at any one time. They have to cover large areas, and in too many places it is still very likely that people will get away with bad driving.

The fact is that in many parts of the country, there are too few officers to do the job, and that is why many of the root causes of danger on our roads go unaddressed. The same is true of untaxed vehicles: in many areas, the police simply do not have the time to follow up every report of untaxed vehicles on street corners or in driveways filled with scruffy cars. I know that from my own constituency experience, but on a Saturday night, those same cars might well be the ones that are used to ply the unlicensed taxi trade, or driven around by people with a reckless disregard for the law and for the safety of others.

That is why we must reform the way in which our police work. We need to make sure that they have the time to tackle problems such as I have described, and that they can do so systematically, not on an occasional basis. It is also why we need simple and achievable ways to tackle the problem posed by people who brazenly ignore the law. Once again, I believe that the Bill could have done much more in that regard.

For instance, the Bill could have proposed ways to highlight whether a car was insured, so that all uninsured cars could be easily and automatically impounded. I heard what the Secretary of State said about notification cameras, which can spot registration plates and check them off against insurance registers, but other countries have much simpler systems—for example, a disc on a windscreen—to show whether a vehicle is insured. The Department has not displayed enough in the way of ideas, innovation or smart thinking when it comes to ways to tackle that a serious problem.

The Bill could also have strengthened the sanctions available to police dealing with the problem of systematic offenders hiding behind false addresses and ignoring penalty notices. I hope that changes can be made to it in the later stages of its passage through the House that will tackle that problem. Moreover, the Bill says nothing about tackling vehicle cloning: that is a major problem for many people, and we have to deal with it.

The Bill is a patchwork of bits and pieces—some of them good, some less so. Sadly, that is the hallmark of a Government who have proved themselves to be very good at tinkering, but not always so good at setting out a clear and long-term vision and strategy for our transport system and for road safety in Britain. We will seek to change that as the Bill goes through Committee.

2.8 pm

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): I am grateful to have a chance to contribute to the debate and to give an extremely warm welcome to the Bill. I think that the remarks of the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling) were somewhat churlish, as I believe that it contains a variety of measures that will give the police a much wider range of sanctions for many more offences than is currently the case. It will enable them to do many of the things that the hon. Gentleman described, and it will be for them and the local authorities to work out how to use the measures to improve road safety.

The hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell said that the Bill did not have a strategic vision. I disagree: it maintains a clear focus on what is needed to improve road safety and deal with the different problems that arise. Moreover, implicit within it is a recognition that we need a culture change in our attitude to driving. The hon. Gentleman did not mention that, but running through the Bill is a much stronger awareness of the fact that a person who gets into a car is getting into something that can be a dangerous weapon. Cars can be responsible for very serious accidents, as well as being a statement of our personal freedom.

The Bill requires a culture change among the public. I ask the Government, as they move it forward, to make sure that information is issued about the change in responsibilities and that there are awareness campaigns to change attitudes to speaking on mobile phones while driving, children wearing safety belts in the back of cars, and speeding. The Opposition have a real responsibility to be party to that as well. Let us take the example of the debate about speed cameras. I suppose that we are not meant to be party political at this point, but I have heard, particularly from the Conservative party, constant criticism of speed cameras. The assumption is that they are there to raise money, when we all know—certainly, this is the case in Northamptonshire—that many people walking around today would be dead were it not for speed cameras and the move to bear down on speeding. A good number of young people have been spared very serious injury because speeding has been reduced.

If we are going to achieve the changes that we can get out of the Bill, we require a culture change. I find it odd that, having said there is a great need to deal with problem drivers, the Conservative party opposes, or questions and undermines, one of the most radical proposals in the Bill, which has been welcomed, looked for and campaigned for by people outside this place as well as inside it. I refer to the proposal for a new offence of causing death by careless driving. I do not understand how it is possible to talk tough on driving and then say, "Oh, but we aren't going to have a separate offence of causing death by careless driving." If the Conservatives are serious about dealing with road safety and the horrible tragedies that result from bad or careless driving—whatever we want to call it—they must be consistent in their approach. I hope that, in Committee, they will suddenly see the light, have a road-to-Damascus conversion, as they have on so many other things, and support this important proposal.

Over the years, many colleagues have pressed for a new offence of causing death by careless driving, because we have all heard the most harrowing tales of deaths caused by careless driving in our constituencies. I pay tribute to the predecessor of the hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone), who, as he knows, campaigned, as he has, on behalf of his constituents, and to many other Members who are still on the Labour Benches and who have done a vast amount of work over the years.

I took up the matter in a private Member's Bill following consultation with young people in my constituency. It was one of those cases of seeing further when one sits on the shoulders of giants because colleagues have done much more work than I have. The young people chose it as the piece of legislation that they most wanted to see on the statute book, which is interesting, as many of the briefings sent to us by outside organisations pick up on the fact that driving and road safety issues have a particular impact on young people and are of particular concern to them.

I thank the schools that took part in the consultation and supported the private Member's Bill: Kingsthorpe community college, Duston school, Weston Favell school, Northampton School for Girls, Thomas Becket school, Roade school and Unity college. In particular, they were moved by the story of Alexine Melnik, a constituent of the hon. Member for Wellingborough. She was a teenager who was killed by a careless driver. Her killer escaped with a derisory sentence. The schools met with Alexine's brother and parents, who joined them in lobbying the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, my hon. Friend the Member for Slough (Fiona Mactaggart), to get such a measure on the statute book. They followed the process through, and I hope that they will be able to come to the Committee to see the legislation they have campaigned for go through.

Mr. Tom Harris: I share some of the concerns expressed by the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling) in that I am not convinced that we should start jailing people for long periods on the basis that they are careless. Does my hon. Friend believe that every time a pedestrian is seriously injured or a killed by the driver of a car, the driver must always face a long prison sentence?

Ms Keeble: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that point. In working on my private Member's Bill, I had to talk through that issue with a number of people and, if he is happy for me to do so, I will deal with his point later. Certainly, there is an argument to be made. The details of how the measure is to work have to be spelled out, but the case for having such an offence on the statute book is overwhelming and well understood by the public, as well as being supported, I am happy to say, by the Government.

[Ms Keeble]

Other than local cases, one reason why young people in my constituency supported the measure was the statistics on the number of young people killed in road traffic accidents each year. As we have heard, many of the people killed by careless drivers are children. A recent case that has been particularly highlighted took place in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Kitty Ussher). A little girl was holding her mother's hand when she was killed. In 1999, some 191 children under the age of 14 were killed on the road. Road accidents were probably the biggest single category of fatal accidents among children. In addition, 42,051 children under 15 were injured. The statistics also show that young drivers are much more likely to be involved and injured in accidents. A total of 64,000 drivers aged 16 to 24 were involved in road traffic accidents during the last year for which figures were available. Although young people account for only 4 per cent. of the driving population, they account for 13 per cent. of accidents on the roads.

The hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell also mentioned the need to focus on where accidents take place and which children are most at risk. I believe—I am sure that the Minister of State will confirm this in his winding-up speech—that the children most at risk are those in inner-city areas. There is a close correlation between poverty and road deaths among children. It is possible to consider speed limits in those areas and make sure that we tackle issues in areas where children are most likely to be killed or injured. With those kinds of measures and sanctions in place, the graduated penalties in the Bill are the right way to go about dealing with the very real problem of speeding.

The offence of causing death by careless driving will address the burning sense of injustice held by the families of people killed in such accidents. A survey for the Department for Transport found that, when people were killed in road accidents and a conviction secured, only 20 per cent. of victims' families thought that justice had been served. So, even when the driver was caught and convicted and the victim's family at least had their day in court, there was still an overwhelming sense that justice had not been served.

In addition—this comes partly to the points made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell—there is a credibility gap in relation to offences and penalties in the existing law. There is nothing between causing death by dangerous driving and quite minor traffic offences. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that there is always room to consider carefully which charges can be used, but in the case of the child in the Burnley constituency, the driver could not be charged with dangerous driving, so he was charged with only the most minor offences. Imagine the feelings of someone who sees their child killed and the driver done for an offence such as driving without a licence.

In the context of the penalties at the court's disposal, I welcome the new offence and the prison sentence that attaches to it. In my private Member's Bill I proposed a sentence of 10 years, but the five-year prison sentence fills the credibility gap by increasing the sanctions available to the courts.

A further aspect is the likelihood of being charged with dangerous driving, which relates to a point made by the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell. From the briefings that we have had, which I am sure he also received, it seems that more and more traffic offenders are not being charged with dangerous driving, which has a high threshold. They tend to be charged with relatively minor offences, even when their driving mistakes were caused by gross negligence. The new penalties should help to redress the balance in the patterns of charging up till now.

Against that background, I welcome the new offence of causing death by careless driving. It was introduced at Committee stage in the other place, and the penalties were reduced on Third Reading. I understand that at one point their lordships thought that they were removing entirely the possibility of imprisonment. In fact, they removed only the ability of magistrates courts to impose a prison sentence, but that reduced the effect of the provision. That flies in the face of the public demand for tougher sanctions for causing death by careless driving.

Mr. Bone: The hon. Lady is making a powerful speech. Does she accept that even with the Lords amendment, the new offence of causing death by careless driving will reach the statute book and in most cases a prison sentence would be available to the judge if the person were found guilty?

Ms Keeble: The offence would be on the statute book, but the penalties would be weaker and the magistrates courts would not have the option of imprisoning offenders. The possibility of community sentencing would also be lost. Outside organisations are concerned about the impact that that would have.

There is a further point. The hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell talked tough about dangerous driving and bad drivers, but resiled from that when it came to some of the details. I hope that he will reconsider. If we tell people that they must pay more careful attention to their driving, and if we take the bold step, as my right hon. Friend pointed out, of saying that they will otherwise go to prison, there is a need for consistency and care in the message that we send out and in what we tell drivers to do. If we blow hot and cold, people are left not knowing where they stand. That also dilutes the effectiveness of a Bill that deals with the range of driving behaviour, introducing more penalties and sending out robust messages about what people ought to be doing when they are in cars.

Chris Grayling: Does the hon. Lady not accept, though, that we in the House have a duty not simply to send messages, but to make good law?

Ms Keeble: I entirely agree. The courts should have at their disposal a proper range of offences and penalties. There is clear consensus among everybody except the lawyers that there is a major gap between imprisonment for causing death by dangerous driving and the minor traffic offences—except, of course, in the case of drink driving. There is a great gap in the middle as regards what the courts can do. It is important that they have available a range of offences and penalties—what the courts do is down to them—that properly recognise the different types of accident and levels of culpability, and that delivers to the public a sense that justice will be done if their loved ones are involved in an accident.

Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): If the law was changed as the hon. Lady hopes and the court had the power to impose tough sentences in cases of careless driving, the expectation would be set that that would happen. If, having considered all the circumstances, the court decided that what happened was a momentary lapse and did not merit a prison sentence, is there not a danger that victims would have an even greater sense of injustice if the penalties available were not used by the court?

Ms Keeble: The hon. Gentleman makes a valid point. When there is an accident, it is often difficult for people to accept that no one was to blame. If a relative is killed, they might never be satisfied with what happens afterwards and might always feel that no price is high enough to pay for the death of their relative. People must be supported through that process, by agencies such as Victim Support. That is a different matter from the proper range of penalties that should be available to the courts, that fill the credibility gap and that meet the public's sense of justice.

The courts must receive proper guidance about the powers that they are to be given. I would not dare to interpret the case cited by the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell about a driver avoiding an animal and hitting a cyclist instead. There must be proper guidance about what constitutes culpable carelessness. Everybody who has driven has had momentary lapses. The question is when that is culpable and when it is a case of driving without the due regard and attention expected of a careful, competent and considerate driver. All that can be dealt with in guidance.

Earlier, I raised the issue of driving under the influence of drugs. It is acknowledged that there are problems in testing for that. I urge my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and the Department, in their work with the Home Office, to ensure that progress is made in developing a scientific test that can be conducted at the roadside. I understand from the Library notes that the roadside tests include walking along a straight line, touching the tip of one's nose and standing on one leg. To people who have seen the consequences of an accident resulting from someone driving under the influence of drugs, citing such evidence in court seems a less than convincing argument or test.

Dr. Ladyman: I want to make sure that my hon. Friend realises that that test is used only to indicate to a police officer that somebody might be under the influence of drugs. The person will be taken back to a police station, where they will be tested properly and convincing evidence produced.

Ms Keeble: I understand that, but I hope that we might develop, even as a rule of thumb at the roadside, an approach that is more convincing than such tests, which are subjective, as I think is commonly recognised, and are inadequate given the problems of drug taking that exist in society, particularly among younger people.

I strongly support the Bill. I hope that we can get it through the Committee stage and on to the statute book very quickly. I also hope that the Opposition will change their mind on death caused by careless driving. For one thing, some of the colleagues of the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell will be placed in some difficulties, after they have campaigned very strongly for a different approach. I think that the Bill will be warmly welcomed by people outside this place, and it will contribute to real improvements in road safety.

Tom Brake (Carshalton and Wallington) (LD): Perhaps not surprisingly, I support many of the measures in the Bill, as well as the Government's objectives of reducing deaths and serious injuries on the road by 40 per cent. by 2010, and by 50 per cent. among children.

Good progress has been made on this issue, which we welcome, but as the Secretary of State said, nine people still die every day on our roads, and we need to ensure that the issue is given necessary priority. I tabled some parliamentary questions today to see how many people are working on road safety in comparison with rail or aviation safety, to find out how many resources are put into these different areas and whether we are giving the right priority to this important issue.

There are some areas in which progress is not as speedy as in others. On teenagers, for instance, and particularly cyclists and pedestrians in the 12 to 15-year-old group, there are clearly problems. I welcome the fact that some specific advertising campaigns are being run to try to address that group. As hon. Members will know, accident statistics for motor cyclists have risen since 1997. More focus is needed on that area, as well as on deaths involving drink-driving, which have increased by 2 per cent. since 2002. Progress is being made, but there are areas in which we are slipping back or on which more focus is needed.

The Government cannot take action soon enough on hand-held mobile phones. I am sure that all hon. Members will have witnessed improper use, whether by a lorry driver who uses his mobile phone while negotiating a narrow road or by someone driving a car with their phone jammed to their ear by their shoulder, while they steer with their free hand if we are lucky, or with their knees if we are unlucky. The message that using a hand-held mobile phone is dangerous—more dangerous, in fact, than drink-driving—has not got through. I hope that the measures before us will ensure that that message hits home.

The Bill must also focus on speed, on which there is some agreement between the parties, but also some disagreement. I was interested that the official Opposition spokesman was unable to say whether the Conservative party would call for the speed limit to be increased to 80 mph. We have on record, however, the fact that in June 2005, the Conservative spokesman in the House of Lords clearly called for an 80 mph limit to be considered. We will await with interest the Conservative transport policy, which I have been told will be launched by the end of this year, and in which we will perhaps see the detail of the policy. If the proposal is to increase the speed limit to 80 mph, I shall be interested to see how the environmental aspects will be addressed.

The Secretary of State has explained the reasons why he thinks that it is appropriate for a reduced number of points to be available to people who exceed the speed limit by only a "relatively" small amount. I am very worried about the message that that sends out. The hon. Member for Northampton, North (Ms Keeble) said that there was a need for consistency in Government policy. I am not convinced that saying to people, "Well, if you exceed the speed limit by only a small amount, the number of points that you get will be lower than those given to someone who exceeds it by a greater amount" is a consistent message. I am sure that the hon. Lady is aware that pedestrians or cyclists who are hit by drivers travelling at 35 mph as opposed to 30 mph are twice as likely to be killed. Sending out any message suggesting that people can get away with breaking the limit by a small amount and that that is not a problem will be a matter of significant concern.

Mr. Greg Knight: The hon. Gentleman gave the example of a cyclist being hit by a speeding motorist. In those circumstances, is it not likely that the motorist will face being charged with another offence in addition to speeding?

Tom Brake: The right hon. Gentleman is entirely correct, but I am still worried about the message that is being sent out by differentiating between smaller and larger speed excesses, taking into account the fact that people are twice as likely to die with just a 5 mph increase over the 30 mph limit.

The Secretary of State has put on the record his support for safety cameras, on which the Liberal Democrats broadly agree. Such cameras have a clear role to play as part of an array of measures for improving road safety, and I do not think that politicians of any party should be afraid to say as much. The Bill also tackles the issue of devices, and identifying devices that can detect radar. Perhaps we need to await the official Conservative Opposition policy, but I understand that the Conservative spokesman in the other place argued in favour of banning equipment that could block or jam signals, but also argued that we should perhaps not be so worried about equipment that can detect signals. Some years ago, I engaged in an interesting debate in this Chamber involving Alan Clark, who suggested that such equipment is used by drivers as a means of measuring speed, perhaps overlooking somewhat the fact that most cars have speedometers for that purpose.

Of course, we support the measures to require repeat drink-driving offenders to retake their driving tests. Other hon. Members have already referred to the Parliamentary Advisory Council for Transport Safety evidence on drink-driving. I have listened carefully to the Secretary of State's response, in which he gave a justification that has been given previously for not supporting a reduction in the drink-driving limit to 50 mg per 100 ml of blood—a limit that is commonly used across Europe. The Government must explain in more detail why they do not support that proposal. We want to see a decrease in deaths and serious injuries, and PACTS evidence suggests that 65 lives a year would be saved as a result of reducing the limit to 50 mg and that 230 people a year would be saved from serious injury. Perhaps the Minister will produce some evidence that challenges the PACTS analysis, but if he does not do so, we need a firm indication of why he is not willing to support a measure that, according to PACTS, has significant safety implications.

We welcome the provision of facilities to raise fixed penalties or to secure deposits from foreign or non-GB licence holders. I have one caveat: hon. Members may have been stopped by the police and fined on the spot in another country, in which case they may have wondered whether their cash went into the coffers of the relevant body or whether it supplemented that police officer's weekly income. We know that that would not happen here, but whatever mechanism is implemented, drivers must be sure that their fines arrive in the right place, so we must provide transparency.

We welcome measures to stop the clocking of vehicles, but the Government need to do more work on vehicle registration. A couple of weeks ago, I got a letter from an organisation that asks drivers to confirm the mileage on vehicles at the time at which they were sold. However, the letter asked me to confirm the mileage on a vehicle that I have never owned, so there are clearly issues around ensuring the accuracy of such databases.

I welcome the Government's push for higher standards for professional driving instructors. On the face of it, this is a constituency point, but I suspect that all hon. Members know about it: I hope that higher standards for professional driving instructors will allow us to get away from a small number of streets in each of our constituencies being used repeatedly by driving instructors to enable their clients to practise U-turns, reversing around corners and manoeuvres. I have been lobbied on that point, and I am sure that other hon. Members have too.

The safe transport of radioactive material is a specific issue that may fall outside the remit of the Bill. I hope that the Minister will explain how the Bill will help in cases such as that in March 2002, when radioactive material in cancer treatment equipment from a hospital in Leeds went on a merry journey around the country during which it emitted a beam of radiation which, according to the Health and Safety Executive, was between 100 and 1,000 times higher than what would normally be considered to be a high dose.

Dr. Ladyman: Is the hon. Gentleman referring to the case that we prosecuted and in which the offenders were found? If so, what is he complaining about?

Tom Brake: I am simply saying that one of the purposes of the Bill is to address the safe transport of radioactive material. The Minister prosecuted the case, but the vehicle went on its merry journey across the country unleashing radiation doses between 100 and 1,000 times higher than what is normally considered to be a very high dose. He should not need to stand up and say, "we prosecuted", because the incident should not have happened in the first place. Will he confirm that the provisions in the Bill on the safe transport of radioactive waste will ensure that such incidents do not occur in future?

We support the Government's promotion of best practice, and I am sure that all hon. Members can provide good examples of it. An organisation called Transportation Planning (international) has built a website focusing on helping motor cyclists to improve their hazard perception, which is a key issue in road safety.

Paul Rowen: The Minister has said that off-road bikes and small vehicles are difficult to deal with, but the matter could be addressed by designating public bridleways and footpaths as areas in which such vehicles cannot be driven. The issue is serious—it is a matter of great concern for horse riders and walkers—but the Bill does not address it.

Tom Brake: From a sedentary position, the Secretary of State has said that the Bill addresses that matter, and I hope that the Minister will explain exactly how it does so.

The Secretary of State used the parliamentary term, "rubbish", to describe reports that automatic number-plate-reading technology will be used to spot people who are not wearing their seat belts or who are using their mobile phones. Is he saying that that technology will never be used in that way? I am not necessarily expressing a view on whether that would be a good or bad thing, but if the technology is available, why would the Secretary of State exclude the possibility of its ever being used in that way?

Mr. Kidney: Far be it from me to explain what is in the Secretary of State's mind, but the report was "rubbish" because it was a PACTS report from six months ago rather than a Government proposal. It was about using technology to detect offences rather than using surveillance to watch people as they go about their business. The matter is currently the subject of an investigation by the Transport Committee, which seems reasonable to me.

Tom Brake: It will be interesting to see the Transport Committee recommendations, which I am sure the Minister and the Secretary of State will consider carefully. We will wait to see whether the Secretary of State needs to row back from the statement that those reports were "rubbish".

I have already referred to the official Opposition's proposal to increase the speed limit to 80 mph, which we will examine carefully.

Chris Grayling: I understand the hon. Gentleman's difficulty this afternoon—he does not know whether he has been reshuffled and whether he will be Liberal Democrat transport spokesman by the end of the debate. He is curiously interested in Conservative party policy making, although he has not set out any Liberal Democrat road safety ideas. Will he set out those ideas in the remainder of his remarks?

Tom Brake: I am sure that when the hon. Gentleman looks back at Hansard he will see that I have clearly set out a number of Liberal Democrat positions on the Bill. He will have an opportunity to consider our proposals in greater detail in Committee. Those proposals will be put forward by whoever is the Liberal Democrat spokesman on that stage of the Bill.

We agree with the Conservatives on the proposals made by the British Red Cross. It no longer suggests changes to the practical driving test to allow first aid to be incorporated in it, but is instead considering whether there are grounds to change the theory test, and possibly the hazard perception test, to include elements of first aid. That would be sensible because, according to the Red Cross, 57 per cent. of deaths caused by road accidents happen in the first few minutes after a crash before the emergency services arrive, and up to 85 per cent. of those could be prevented if first aid were administered immediately. The Minister will be aware that on Second Reading in the other place, Lord Davies of Oldham said:

> "Let me make the obvious point that we accept what the noble Lord says. We are considering extending the test to include additional first aid material."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 22 November 2005; Vol. 675, c. 1609.]

I hope that the Minister is able to clarify what progress has been made on that and whether the Government's hand will be forced, to some extent, by what is going to happen in 2008 with European Union legislation relating to commercial drivers having to demonstrate that they have basic first aid skills.

I hope that the Minister can clarify another matter that was raised on Second Reading—the use of rear seatbelts for 14 and 15-year-olds. I understand that there is a gap in the provisions that could be sorted out simply by making it the driver's responsibility to ensure that they wear seatbelts.

Other Members have mentioned the conspicuousness of heavy goods vehicles. In the other place, their lordships decided to amend the Bill to include a reference to conspicuousness stating that > "The Secretary of State may by regulations made by statutory instrument require the fitting of retro-reflective tape".

Will the Minister clarify, first, whether he is willing to accept that change, and secondly, whether he would be willing to accept a stronger provision requiring that the Secretary of State "shall" ensure that retro-reflective tape is fitted? HGVs have been involved in a significant number of accidents, which would presumably be reduced by adding such reflective strips. In 2001, there were 9,000 collisions in which an HGV was struck by another vehicle. In 34 per cent. of those cases, the HGV was struck on its side. It is not unreasonable to assume that a significant number of those accidents could have been avoided, or their seriousness reduced, as a result of fitting that tape. That would cost about £100 to £150 per vehicle—not a significant extra cost given that the retail price of a new vehicle is in the order of £100,000 and that it could make a great difference in terms of reducing road accidents and improving road safety.

Given the scale of road accidents and deaths—nine per day—Liberal Democrats argue, as we did in the Lords, that there is a need for a road accidents investigations board, similar to those that exist for aviation and rail, to investigate the accidents that occur. Some of those will be one-offs, while some will not. Sometimes there will be a problem in a particular location. In other cases, it will be difficult to identify a pattern when looking at individual accidents, but by looking at the totality it may be possible to draw conclusions from them. My hon. Friend the Member for Bath (Mr. Foster), who considered this when he was our transport spokesman, found that Sweden has a similar organisation, which noted that because Sweden is a rocky, mountainous country, there are often large rocks by the roadside or in the road. It identified that as an issue of national significance that it needed to resolve. That is the sort of matter that the board could consider.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bath, who is proactive on these issues, has requested, possibly because he has the largest pedicab manufacturer in the country in his constituency, that we consider pedicab licensing, or at least allowing local authorities to choose to license pedicabs if they are so inclined.

I am sure that many Members will have been lobbied about the issue of sleep disorders. The research shows that one in six HGV drivers suffers from a severe sleeping disorder of which they are often unaware. I thank the hon. Member for Halifax (Mrs. Riordan), who is in the Chamber, for that information. I hope that she may have an opportunity to refer to it shortly. The Government could focus more attention on that matter.

There is much to be welcomed in the Bill and much that we can support, but there are many issues to which we will need to return in Committee, including drink-drive limits and reduced speed limits of 20 mph and 30 mph in residential areas—a significant matter that I did not mention. It is unacceptable that the limit on unclassified roads is 60 mph, which is completely inappropriate in many cases. The Committee is the right place to discuss those issues. We therefore do not seek to detain the House further and are happy to join the Government and the official Opposition in supporting the Second Reading of the Bill.

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): This week, my Select Committee—the Science and Technology Committee—is taking evidence in New York and Washington. I pulled out of the visit at the last minute because I had promised several of my constituents that I would not only push for a change in the law in this policy area, but bring their concerns to the Floor of the House and try to express some of their grief.

I want particularly to discuss clauses 20 to 33, as amended in the other place, on new offences, increases in penalties, and other provisions about offences. Since my election to Parliament in 1997, I have been outraged by the outcome of several trials following serious road traffic accidents that have resulted in the death of my constituents. The first family that I dealt with was the Willis family, whose son Gareth was killed at the age of 29 on 22 May 1999 in a head-on crash on the crown of a bridge by a hit-and-run driver while riding his motorcycle. His son, Joseph, aged seven, was a pillion passenger. Although he was thrown off the bike into a field and badly injured, he fortunately survived. However, the car driver ran away from the scene of the accident, although he gave himself up the following day.

Initially, the 31-year-old driver was given a 30-month sentence for causing death by dangerous driving and banned from driving for five years. Half the sentence was suspended for community service. The driver had had only two driving lessons, was driving at more than 50 mph in a 30 mph restricted area without a licence or insurance. He had several previous car crime convictions and had been drinking earlier that day.

Gareth's family were devastated by their loss and especially by the sentence—so much so that they came to see me. The Attorney-General referred the case to the Court of Appeal and the driver's sentence was increased, but only by one year. Regrettably, the appeal was heard on 16 November 2000 without the family being informed or invited to make an oral impact submission, which they were entitled to make, about the effect of the accident on the family.

Another tragedy with which I have dealt was the death of eight-year-old Billy Joe Dean in the village of Stoneclough, which lies between Bolton and Bury. A 40-year-old male was riding his 1,000 cc Suzuki motor cycle on 24 August 2002, having just left a public house. Evidence was given in court that he accelerated to such an extent that he performed a wheelie as he approached a double bend. The motor cyclist lost control of the vehicle, which glanced off an approaching Porsche and hit Billy Joe as he was walking along the pavement. Billy Joe died almost immediately from his injuries because he was crushed by the motor cycle, which flew through the air and hit him against a garden wall. The accident shook the village of Stoneclough and the BBC chose it as one of two cases of causing death by dangerous driving that it included in a documentary, which was broadcast with a view to getting the change in the law that the Bill tries to establish.

The motor cyclist received a six-year jail sentence for causing death by dangerous driving, driving without insurance and driving while disqualified. The sentence was reduced to five years in the Court of Appeal. He was also banned from driving for eight years. He had badly injured himself in the collision and submitted a guilty plea in court. Like the Willis family, the Dean family learned of the reduction of the sentence on appeal through reading about it in the Bolton Evening News. Both families were outraged at the outcome of the trials and the way in which they, as indirect victims of their sons' deaths, had been treated by the British judicial system.

The Criminal Justice Act 2003 increased the maximum penalty for causing death by dangerous driving from 10 to 14 years, but the courts hardly ever apply the sentence at the top end of the range.

Six other tragic accidents, which occurred in my constituency or a few yards outside its boundary, led to the deaths of three-year-old Amicie Nwokeochar on 15 November 2003; 36-year-old Lisa Halligan and 28-year-old Michael Jeffries, killed in the same accident on 1 May 2004; 13-year-old Carla Bate on 8 August 2004; nine-year-old Ellesse Ruth Gore on 19 October 2005; 46-year-old Ellen Newman, killed, like Billy Joe, on the bends in Stoneclough village on 5 January this year, and 45-year-old Laura Entwistle on 21 January this year.

I have been closely involved with the Nwokeochar tragedy, which was caused by a gentleman who was a few weeks away from his 90th birthday. I have applied for an Adjournment debate to bring to light the safety record of older drivers and I shall therefore not dwell on that incident today. I am also involved with the family of Ellen Newman. They recently approached me for help.

In two of the six accidents that I just cited, several other people were seriously injured. In four, the driver left the scene of the accident. The families of the victims of such tragedies often find it hard to accept the significantly reduced sentences that are given when the driver enters a guilty plea. That is a problem. Victims' families also know that prisoners can be released on a Parole Board hearing after the half-way point of the sentence. They will be released on licence two thirds of the way through a sentence in any case. In some cases, the drivers are released from prison not long after the trials, when the families continue to grieve. I do not believe that those families ever stop grieving.

When a person—they are nearly all young men—drives a stolen car without a licence or insurance at high speeds in restricted areas, especially if he has previous convictions for road traffic offences, or has taken alcohol or other drugs that affect his ability to drive, and kills another person, often leaving the scene of the accident, the courts should inflict a severe sentence, which takes account of all the offences committed on the day. Drivers who kill while committing multiple offences should be charged with a greater offence than causing death by dangerous driving. The offence of vehicle homicide has been floated in some quarters.

"Dangerous Driving and the Law", an evaluation of the operation of the Road Traffic Act 1991, which was commissioned by the former Department for Transport, Local Government and the Regions and published in 2002, reports that 46 per cent. of the dangerous driving offences that it examined were committed by multiple offenders—those, mainly young males, who have previous road traffic convictions.

It is clear to me from hon. Members' contributions, including mine, since the 1997 general election, that the law on serious traffic offences is regarded as unsatisfactory. We reflect the view of the public, who are rightly outraged by a legal system that considers death and injury to be less serious if it is caused by someone driving a motor vehicle. Those who commit crimes such as petty theft or burglary regularly receive more severe sentences from the courts than those who kill—often wilfully—on our British road system.

For those reasons, I welcome the new offences, for which the Bill provides, of causing death by driving while unlicensed, disqualified or uninsured, with a maximum sentence—hopefully, in each case—of two years. An amazing 1.2 million drivers—one in 20 motorists—regularly drive without insurance.

In England and Wales, an indictable offence of manslaughter is available but few prosecutions are made under that heading. RoadPeace believes that the proper charge following a culpable road death is manslaughter. However, I welcome the fact that the Bill allows, for the first time, an alternative verdict to be brought when prosecution for an offence of manslaughter fails.

The test for dangerous driving in section 2A of the Road Traffic Act 1988 is defined thus:

> "Did the driver's driving fall far below what would be expected of a competent and careful driver and would it be obvious to a competent and careful driver that driving in that way would be dangerous?"

It can be difficult to obtain a conviction of causing death by dangerous driving under that definition, as police forces throughout the country will confirm.

Trials collapse for various reasons, including a lack of convincing evidence produced by either the police or the forensic services, failure of witnesses to convince either a judge or a jury of the driver's guilt, and sometimes a badly handled prosecution case. Even in successful cases, the sentences applied are often low, given that the driver's behaviour has resulted in one and sometimes more deaths. The courts do not appear to appreciate that the maximum sentence that is currently available is 14 years.

The lesser offence of dangerous driving is an either-way offence, with a maximum penalty of only two years' imprisonment. The summary offence of careless and inconsiderate driving is available in two forms: driving without due care and attention, or driving without reasonable consideration for other road users. Clause 23 increases the maximum penalty for the offence of careless driving from £2,500 to £5,000. I welcome that.

A new indictable offence of causing death by careless driving while under the influence of alcohol or drugs was introduced, on the recommendation of the 1988 North report, by the Road Traffic Act 1991. A further indictable offence of causing injury by furious driving was introduced by the Offences Against the Person Act 1861, and right hon. and hon. Members might have noticed that the Bill retains that rather curious offence.

The lesser charge of careless driving often appears inappropriate, particularly in cases in which there has been a fatality and the evidence points to the fact that there has been an element of dangerous driving. The gap between the higher offence of dangerous driving and the lower offence of careless driving is seen by many, including me, as just too great. That is why I support the introduction of the new offence of causing death by careless or inconsiderate driving, with a maximum sentence of five years, as set out in clause 20.

That is one of the more controversial aspects of the Bill. It is almost exclusively opposed by the legal profession, as it will make accidental conduct seriously criminal and worthy of imprisonment for the first time. However, the Crown Prosecution Service has stated:

> "The new offence will be valuable in bridging the existing gap between causing death by dangerous driving and careless driving. In the most difficult cases that fall very close to the line dividing these two offences, it will enable prosecutors to place both offences on the indictment, thus allowing the jury to make their assessments of the facts."

Research has found that the introduction of a new offence of causing death by careless driving was favoured by only 55 per cent. of those who responded to a postal survey—not a great percentage. Nevertheless, most right hon. and hon. Members who have contributed to this debate since I came to the House in 1997 appear to believe that the consequences of a motorist's action, especially in provable cases of dangerous driving, should be taken into consideration by the courts. Although the present law allows that, the courts tend to behave differently. Even with a charge of careless driving, the fact that death has been a consequence should be a serious consideration in some cases, but at present it is not, even though it has been allowed by the law in England since the Simmonds appeal in January 1999.

It is my opinion that the most serious cases of road traffic accidents involving death and serious injury should be dealt with by the Crown court; the majority are dealt with at present by magistrates courts. That was also the opinion expressed in the Transport Committee's report on traffic law and its enforcement, published at the end of 2004.

Probably one of the most difficult cases that I have been closely involved with is the Haque case. My constituent, five-year-old Hishamul Haque, was killed at the Camelot theme park at Charnock Richard, near Chorley in Lancashire, on the evening of 18 April 2004. The Haque family had travelled with their relatives and several children to the theme park in three cars during the morning, and had spent the entire day enjoying themselves at Camelot. They decided to return to their cars at about 5.30 pm, where they had some refreshments. Then, a game of football began in the almost empty car parking area. On the fringe of the car park are larger bays for the parking of coaches and buses, and the two areas are separated by another area which is marked by broad white lines and is used as a service road to the car parks.

A service bus entered the car park just after 6 pm and proceeded to drive along the service road. The bus driver admits seeing the group playing football to his right, and also admits having seen Hishamul Haque chase the football out of the crowd in his direction and obviously across the path of the bus. The driver's explanation was that he kept to the left of the service road to avoid a collision with the young boy, who was running from his right towards the bus. However, the driver did not brake to stop the bus, and neither did he sound his horn. He also claims not to have seen or heard Mr. Haque, the father, shouting and gesticulating at him about the approaching danger. Tragically, it was too late and Hishamul was crushed by the front and rear wheels of the bus. The collision occurred in the part of the car park reserved for coaches and buses, to the left of the service road.

There has been a dispute about the speed of the bus. The driver claimed that he was driving at between 10 and 15 mph, while Mr. Haque claimed that he was driving at between 30 and 35 mph. Other witnesses, and evidence from a police reconstruction of the accident, support the driver's account. Lancashire police arrested the driver on a charge of suspected manslaughter. However, following consultation with the Crown Prosecution Service, the driver was charged with causing death by dangerous driving. Before His Honour Judge Slinger in the Crown court at Preston on 9 December 2004, the defence was successful in applying for the proceedings to be dismissed on the ground that the evidence did not meet the test for dangerous driving in section 2A of the Road Traffic Act 1988, to which I have just referred.

Obviously, the family were devastated by this decision and they came to see me for advice. I arranged a meeting with the Crown Prosecution Service at Preston to discuss Judge Slinger's decision. On 13 to 15 February 2006, a trial was held in Chorley magistrates court before Judge Ward, and the driver was acquitted of a careless driving charge.

While Britain has the safest roads in Europe, too many people still die every year and 10 times more are injured. Significantly, almost one third of the deaths are caused by a person at work on the roads. I welcome the progress that the Bill makes, and I congratulate the Transport Committee and the Department for Transport on all the work that they have done to allow the Bill to come before the House. During the last summer vacation, I read many research reports published by the Department, and I am full of praise for the amount of work that it has done. I am grateful for this opportunity to enter into a debate on a policy area that is of great interest to many of my constituents.

3.17 pm

Mr. Greg Knight (East Yorkshire) (Con): We can all support the aims of the Road Safety Bill, because safety should be paramount on our roads at all times, and all classes of road user have a part to play—not only vehicle drivers but pedestrians, cyclists and passengers. Safety on our roads cannot be achieved merely by soaking motorists with fines and penalty points. The most effective approach is a mixture of education, incentive and, when a transgression has occurred, punishment, whether against a motorist for speeding, a cyclist for ignoring a red traffic light or a pedestrian for jaywalking—that is, stepping off the kerb into the highway when it is unsafe to do so. This is an ongoing battle, and it will not be won by the passage of the Bill. However, Members in all parties will have played their part if, during its parliamentary passage, we seek to improve its scope.

I turn first to the Bill's contents, before making one or two observations on matters that are—for the moment, at any rate—outwith its scope. Some of its provisions are non-contentious, and rightly so. The provisions on road safety grants are to be welcomed. It is right and proper that the income from fines should be used for local transport facilities, or to fund road safety improvements. Similarly, I welcome the provisions for graduated fixed penalties, and on graduated fixed penalty points. Those proposals make sense; graduations should certainly apply to points as well as to fines. Indeed, when the breach of the law has been minute, or there are exceptional circumstances, there might be a case for nil points being imposed. I hope that that is something we can examine in detail in Committee. Flexibility is important so that, as far as possible, punishment always fits the crime.

I have some concerns about vehicle examiners giving fixed penalty notices. When the Minister responds, I hope that he will address them. The police are trained in road traffic matters and the rules of evidence. Consequently, an honest policeman doing his job has a sense of fairness and justice when dealing with a motorist. If we give the power to issue fixed penalty notices to vehicle examiners, what training will they have? Will they be required to maintain a notebook in which to write down any comments made by a motorist that may be relevant in any plea of mitigation? What guidance will be given about when and where they should operate? Will they still need to be accompanied by an experienced police officer? If not, what powers will they have to stop a vehicle on the highway? I hope that the Minister can answer those questions when he addresses us later.

Clause 5 and schedule 1 clearly envisage a system in which fixed penalties are issued when the offences are detected remotely—that is, when video footage is viewed and vehicles that may not have insurance or a valid MOT are identified. Will the Minister consider formulating guidelines so that provision can be made for a camera to photograph and monitor vehicles before they are stopped by vehicle examiners on appropriate occasions?

During busy periods, it would make sense for vehicle examiners to have someone viewing a screen showing vehicles some distance away so that vehicles that have insurance and a current MOT can be allowed to pass without being pulled over. Vehicle examiners could then focus on those vehicles that have already been identified as perhaps being shady in some respect or as being on the road unlawfully. Where a law-abiding motorist is going about his business, every effort should be made to prevent him from being stopped unnecessarily and thereby having his journey time lengthened. I think that that makes sense, and I hope that the Minister does, too. Will he reassure the House that if these examiners are given the powers envisaged in the Bill, they will not suddenly appear in every constituency setting up road blocks and stopping traffic merely to raise more money for the Government? I hope that they will have a duty to behave reasonably, not oppressively.

The provisions in clause 11 relating to financial penalty deposits will be welcomed on both sides of the House. They are clearly aimed at foreign truckers who are competing for work with British truckers. Foreign truckers are, generally speaking, able to put cheaper fuel in their vehicles, and once they get to this country they often flout our laws and ignore fines when they are imposed. I warmly welcome the provisions in clause 11, which are long overdue. Most law-abiding motorists will welcome them too. But will they be used only against heavy goods vehicles, or will they also be used against private vehicles?

I shall give the Minister an example. Some years ago, I was introduced to an American gentleman who was over here studying. He revealed that his studies were expected to take three years or so. He had brought over an American vehicle, a Chevrolet Corvette. For those who do not know what that is, it is a powerful sports car. His idea was to use his American car with American plates while pursuing his studies and to sell the car over here when he concluded them and returned to America. I was appalled and alarmed to discover that he had allowed his insurance and the American equivalent of vehicle excise duty to lapse, but had kept the car on American plates. He thought it was a rather good wheeze to have motoring on the cheap while he was in the UK. That sort of behaviour is to be deplored. I know that it does not occur on the same scale as heavy goods vehicle drivers ignoring their fines, but does the Minister intend clause 11 to catch people who are in the UK for the time being and are using a vehicle registered overseas which does not have valid tax and insurance? Those cases ought to be caught by clause 11.

I am less sceptical than my hon. Friend the Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling) about alcohol ignition interlocks, but in Committee we should look closely at how the Minister thinks they will work, and at the ways in which some people might seek to get round them. I have heard that if a motorist fills up two or three balloons of the sort that are used at parties while he is sober and when he gets into his car after he has had a drink he connects one of them to the interlock, it will release the ignition so that the car can be started. We need to look at ways in which the unscrupulous, dishonest and drunk motorist could abuse this system if we approve it.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for giving way, because he is one the leading experts on this subject. On foreign number plates, I do not know if he is aware that in east Anglia there are a large number of east European migrant workers, many of them doing an excellent job working in the food processing industry in particular, and many of them have brought their cars over. There are examples where serious offences have been committed and the police have been unable to do anything about them.

Mr. Knight: I share my hon. Friend's hope that the Bill, particularly the clauses that relate to the exchange of information, will bring an end to that practice. I hope that we can arrive at a situation where the exchange of information with overseas Governments allows us to check vehicles. If they should not be on the road, I would favour their being impounded and confiscated.

The Liberal Democrat spokesman mentioned two points of interest; they will be referred to again in Committee, so I shall not go into too much detail. The first related to first aid and whether we should require a person taking a driving test to have a basic knowledge of first aid. At first blush, it is quite a good idea. However, I took my driving test 40 years ago, and if I had been required to learn the basics of first aid then, I would probably have forgotten them by now—so I would not welcome having to advise an injured person I came across by the roadside about the first aid attention he should receive. The idea is worthless unless there is a mechanism for making sure that motorists are kept up to date.

Alison Seabeck (Plymouth, Devonport) (Lab): As a former lifeguard who has gone through all the training—although I have used my skills only outside a swimming pool—I take the right hon. Gentleman's point that skills have to be continually upgraded if they are to be used. But basic skills have been reasonably standard for some time, and we could save lives if motorists understood the basics and were able to take initial action.

Mr. Knight: The hon. Lady and I do not disagree on this point. If we were to have a free vote now, I think that on balance, I would go into the lobby for having some basic training. If we can save just one life, it is worth doing.

Tom Brake: The proposal would of course apply only to new applicants, not to people such as the right hon. Gentleman who gained their licence a number of years ago.

Mr. Knight: I realise that, but my point was that with time people who have taken their test become mature drivers, so at any one time there may be only a small percentage of motorists on the road who have up-to-date knowledge of first aid. If the provision is to be effective, we need to consider giving refresher courses—but that is something that we can properly explore in Committee.

[Mr. Knight]

My next point is about cycle helmets. The Secretary of State said that views on the issue were fairly evenly divided. I agree, but I am alarmed that the Government are sanctioning a change in the highway code, and it will recommend that cyclists wear a cycle helmet. That sits ill with the fact that the Government are saying that as a matter of policy they are on the fence. In that case, why does the highway code argue that cycle helmets are necessary? If the highway code says that, there is a danger that soon lawyers will be arguing that if a child is knocked off a bike by a motorist who is guilty of careless driving, any damages in a civil case should be reduced if the child was not wearing a helmet. If the highway code is to be altered in that way, Ministers need to reflect again on their position.

Tom Brake: If the highway code were changed in that way, is the right hon. Gentleman aware that there would be a risk of contributory negligence where cyclists were not using designated cycle paths?

Mr. Knight: The argument of contributory negligence could certainly be used in that example and many others, which is why it is important to send a clear message to all road users—not just motorists, but cyclists too—about what they should or should not do. I hope that the Government will give that clear message before the Bill completes its parliamentary passage.

I have some questions about the operation of clause 22 and schedule 4. I should declare an interest, as I am the owner of a number of historic and classic motor vehicles, some of which are subject to the statutory off-road notification procedure, although they are all insured, so the provisions do not affect me personally. However, there is growing concern among the classic car fraternity about the scope of the provisions, so when the Minister winds up I should like him to clarify how wide he intends them to be.

I realise that the explanatory notes do not form part of the legislation and that they are for the guidance and benefit of Members, but in paragraph 86, on page 16, the Government set out their view of the scope of the provision on insurance:

"Other exceptions may apply where the vehicle is no longer kept by the registered keeper; it is not kept for use on a road or other public place or has been stolen."

Precisely what do the Government mean by the words "it is not kept for use on a road or other public place?" Do they mean a vehicle not kept for current use on a road, or for current or future use on a road?

At present, if a classic vehicle is undergoing restoration, the owner may decide not to use it for a couple of years so they take it off the road, fill in a SORN form, which is sent to the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency and acknowledged, and are then under no further duty whatever. Although the owner of a motor vehicle, even one undergoing restoration, ought to have insurance—especially if the vehicle is valuable—at present there is no requirement to insure that vehicle. Will that situation change, and if so, will it change both for vehicles subject to SORN and for those that are exempt? As I understand the DVLA rules, a vehicle that has been off the road since 31 January 1998 is exempt from the SORN procedure. Let us suppose that a family has an heirloom—perhaps a vintage Bentley—the wheels have been removed, the engine is seized and the vehicle is in a garage, but at some point members of the family hope to put it back on the road. Under the new provisions, will they be required to take out insurance?

Dr. Ladyman rose—

Mr. Knight: If the Minister wants to answer me now, I shall be delighted to give way.

Dr. Ladyman: The right hon. Gentleman was kind enough to give me advance notice that he was thinking of raising that point, which I know he wants to explore further in Committee. The answer to his question is no; the intention is that it will not be necessary for such vehicles to be insured. Either they will be SORNed, in which case there will be no need for insurance, or there will have been no licensing activity since 1998, so a SORN will not be necessary.

Mr. Knight: I am most grateful to the Minister. His intervention will have put many minds at rest.

I have one more question about this part of the Bill. Where a vehicle has been seized but the owner produces documents and pays any dues, the explanatory notes say:

"If the vehicle has already been disposed of, the regulations may provide for a sum to be paid to the vehicle's owner provided the claim is made within a prescribed period."

That sounds reasonable. Presumably, the sum to be paid will actually be a proper recompense for the seizure and crushing of the vehicle and not a paltry amount that reflects only 10 or 20 per cent. of the vehicle's value. I am assuming from the wording that there is good will behind the provision, and that the Minister intends the regulation to recompense the owner properly. He is nodding, so I am obliged to him for that assurance.

Clause 45 refers to the range of particulars to be included in the vehicle's register. We all understand why it is desirable to include mileage, to stop clocking—the unlawful practice, mainly but not exclusively, of some second-hand car dealers, who realise that if they wind back the odometer they can vastly increase the vehicle's value on the second-hand market. I welcome that aspect of the provisions, but I hope that they will not be used for an identity card-like collation of personal information. I hope that we do not reach the point where, for example, the vehicle keeper has to give his passport number or date of birth. I realise that the form already includes a space for the date of birth, but the information is voluntary, not compulsory. If the Minister intends to broaden the provisions to make vehicle keepers give far more personal information, I hope that he will tell the House so on Second Reading, rather than let that intention emerge in Committee.

I intervened earlier to ask the Secretary of State about clause 50, which I consider very important. I am pleased that Ministers are thinking about ways of addressing this problem, although they may not feel that clause 50 is the answer. The clause provides for a specific offence when a motorist deliberately seeks to drive across a railway level crossing when warning signs are flashing to indicate that he should not do so. It provides for a period of imprisonment, a fine and up to six points on the licence.

I rather agree with my colleagues on the Front Bench. I hope that whatever the formulation to which we return, Ministers will consider whether it might be more appropriate to provide for a compulsory period of disqualification. I am not sure that I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Epsom and Ewell that the period should be 12 months, as it is for drink-driving, but it could certainly be argued that even in the most marginal cases a motorist should be deprived of his licence—if only for a month or two—so that the dangerous circumstances that he has created can be brought home to him.

When I was in Leicester the other day visiting friends, I happened to pick up a copy of the excellent local paper, the Leicester Mercury. On page 8, a report headed "Drivers risk death in level-crossing dashes" said:

"Nearly 30 motorists risked their lives last year by dashing across level crossings in front of oncoming trains.

British Transport Police say 27 drivers in the county had ignored flashing lights and descending barriers.

Seven of the offences were so bad they were classed as near-misses by rail bosses."

That is what was happening in just one county. The problem is still with us. None of us wants to see a repeat of the horrific accidents that have occurred in the recent past, and I hope that when the Secretary of State crystallises his thoughts he will bear in mind what has been said here today.

I am disappointed that the Bill does not deal with a number of other issues, which I hope we shall have time to debate during the remainder of its passage. One is the question of flexible speed limits, which are in force on the M25 to improve road safety and traffic flow. I think that they have largely been a success, and that there is an overwhelming case for trialling them on other roads, not necessarily just in a downward direction. I know that the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake) is a little agitated at the thought of 80 mph speed limits on motorways, although that is the speed in France and, where a speed limit operates, in Germany; but I think we should consider trialling flexible speed limits on motorways where, on a clear day with light traffic flows, overhead signs could indicate that motorists were allowed to travel at 80 mph.

Tom Brake: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for giving way a third time. What does he think would be the average speed of drivers on motorways if the speed limit were increased to 80 mph?

Mr. Knight: There is no doubt that during the period of flexibility many motorists would exceed 80 mph, just as many exceed the limit now. It must be accepted that some motorists would drive at 85 or 86 mph.

Mr. Tom Harris: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware of a single country in the world that has raised its national speed limit and experienced a consequent reduction in the number of casualties caused by road accidents?

Mr. Knight: I am talking about flexible speed limits, not a permanent increase in the speed limit. I use the word "flexible" in the sense that most people would recognise; it is possible to flex downwards as well as upwards. There are occasions—when it is foggy or there is snow on the ground—on which the speed limit on a motorway should be reduced to below 70 mph. I think that we should trial the system of flexible limits to see where it takes us. I do not believe that it would lead to the consequences envisaged by the hon. Gentleman if it were applied when traffic flows were light and road conditions good.

I also think that we should consider introducing flexible speed limits in the vicinity of schools. I know that a certain organisation has conducted a letter-writing campaign asking all Members to support blanket speed limits in villages and blanket 20 mph speed limits near schools. I think that it has something of a case, but I do not support the one-size-fits-all suggestion. There a number of villages in my constituency in which I would not want a 30 mph speed limit to be introduced, because the roads passing through them can safely carry traffic at a higher speed.

However, I think that we should consider using flexibility, particularly with the advent of electronic speed signs and flashing warning signs, which are now available to us but were not a few years ago, and at trialling 20 mph zones outside schools, although not during the school holidays, because an inappropriate speed limit will be disobeyed by motorists. If they feel that the speed limit is not just they will ignore it, but we could try it an hour or so before school commences, or 15 minutes before schoolchildren come out and for an hour after the school day has finished. That is what I would like to see. Let us try flexible and temporary speed limits where appropriate. They will signify to the responsible driver, when he sees the flashing "20" sign, that school children are about to be in the vicinity. I think that most drivers would respond to that positively.

Mrs. Siân C. James (Swansea, East) (Lab): In Wales we have successfully trialled the 20 mph speed outside schools. I am currently campaigning hard on behalf of the community at Manselton primary school in Swansea. There has been a serious accident outside the school, and we must put schoolchildren's safety first. I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman would agree that that is paramount in any circumstances.

Mr. Knight: I do agree. I hope that in addition, the hon. Lady will agree with me that to have a 20 mph speed limit in force during the six or eight weeks when a school is on holiday is not the way to proceed. We should focus the speed limit on when children are likely to want to cross the highway. That will send a message to the driver that he is approaching the school at a dangerous time and should slow down.

Traffic calming is something else that we could address during the passage of the Bill. I would like the Government to announce that it is their policy to phase out speed humps, which are widely discredited. I think that the hon. Member for Bassetlaw (John Mann) introduced a 10-minute rule Bill on that matter fairly recently. Chicanes, build-outs and electronic warning signs all have their place, but speed humps are a menace and are increasingly seen as such.

[Mr. Knight]

I would like to share with the House a report in The Daily Telegraph on 8 October last year. Under the headline, "Bus passenger paralysed by speed bump", the article said:

"A bus passenger has been paralysed after damaging his spine as the vehicle drove over a speed bump.

Neil Price, 53, an electrical retailer, of Kendal, Cumbria, was travelling on a Stagecoach bus in Dalton-in-Furness. He is now in the Royal Preston Hospital with two broken vertebrae and a damaged spinal cord. Doctors have told him it will be two or three weeks before they know whether he will walk again."

There is also an article that I managed to pick up off the internet, so I am not sure that the named author is the actual author, but it reinforces the point. Under the headline "Speed Humps are a Curse", it reinforces the point:

Paramedics are warning that speed humps are killing hundreds of people a year by increasing ambulance response times."

It goes on to quote the chairman of the London Ambulance Service as saying that more lives are lost through delays caused by speed humps and other measures than are saved by them.

The article goes on:

"Emergency services chiefs have also criticised Councils for introducing speed humps without any apparent consideration of their adverse effects. Two firefighters in America suffered spinal injuries in separate incidents when they hit their heads on the cab roof as their vehicle went over a hump.

Speed humps are by far the worst form of traffic calming because they damage vehicle suspension systems and are also dangerous for those travelling in an ambulance who may have spinal or other injuries ... Austrian researchers found that exhaust pollution can soar tenfold as drivers accelerate away from humps.

The humps can also increase road noise if ... heavy vehicles are crossing them."

The article concludes with a comment by an RAC spokesman:

"About six months after the humps are installed, people generally come back and say that it has caused problems with the amount of noise ... and pollution. A few months after these humps are introduced, most people want to get rid of them".

Given the advent of new technologies, I hope that Ministers will look into different ways of calming traffic. A number of villages in my constituency have the benefit of flashing electronic signs, some of which are powered by wind; they have a fan on top that recharges the batteries. They are excellent and shock motorists when they flash. Many motorists do not know that they are there, and to judge by what I have observed from the pavement as they approach them, they seem to have the desired deterrent effect without the negative effects of speed humps.

Planning guidance should also be regarded as relevant to road safety. There are far too many congested roads and vehicles parked on pavements and blocking access points, thereby causing delay and holding up emergency vehicles. During my visit to Leicester, to which I referred earlier, I read in the excellent Leicester Mercury that Blaby district council is going to lay down "concrete grass". It is setting aside

"£20,000 to expand parking areas ... by putting down a surface of concrete with holes through which grass can grow.

The council said the scheme was in response to problems with housing developments built without adequate parking facilities or garage space."

It is ridiculous in this day and age that planners are allowing developers to build houses without any off-street accommodation for the motor car. People do not need a triple, double or even single garage for their car; all that they need is a piece of land 18 ft x 6 ft and a dropped kerb. That would reduce road congestion and eliminate the danger that pedestrians face as they negotiate parked cars with two wheels on the pavement. Planners ought to be telling developers, "Unless you make provision for the motor car, you won't get your planning permission." I hope that the Minister will speak to his colleagues in another Department and see whether they can be sold on this idea, which would make a huge difference.

My final point about road safety and matters outwith the Bill concerns British summer time. It about time we ended the annual ritual of putting our clocks back every October, mainly to appease a handful of Scots. The evidence in favour of such a change is overwhelming.

Mr. MacNeil rose—

Mr. Knight: I guess that I asked for that. Okay, I give way.

Mr. MacNeil: As one of the handful of Scots to whom the right hon. Gentleman alludes, I in part agree with him. It seems strange at times that the clock is changed six or seven weeks before mid-winter, and back again about 15 weeks after mid-winter. I still want the changing of the clocks, but perhaps the period could be altered.

Mr. Knight: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that, and I shall answer his point in a moment.

The Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents estimates that between 500 and 2,500 lives could be saved each year if we remained on British summer time. Our colleagues north of the border now have their own Parliament, but I understand that they have not been given the power to set their own time zone. I would happily vote for Scots to have the ability to set their own time zone, and for us to maintain British summer time 12 months a year in England and Wales, in the interests not only of road safety but of tourism. I represent an area that includes the beautiful town of Bridlington. Lighter evenings encourage tourism and reduce energy costs, because there is a better matching of waking hours and daylight hours. We should introduce such a change.

As you may have gathered from my remarks, Mr. Deputy Speaker, in my view the Bill is not the complete answer to improving road safety, but it is a small step. I hope that the Minister will show us in Committee that he is willing not just to take one small step, but to take on board some of the other suggestions made today, and that he is willing to turn that small step into a journey forwards in the interests of road safety. If he does that, this will indeed be a Bill worthy of its name.

3.54 pm

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): Road safety is a policy area that has benefited immeasurably from cross-party consensus for many years. For decades, Labour and Conservative Governments have adopted the approach of long-term strategy tied to demanding targets for casualty reduction. Over that time, there has been great success in achieving those targets. It is remarkable that we have reduced in absolute terms the numbers of people killed or seriously injured on our roads over two decades in which the amount of traffic on our roads has continued to grow every year. As policy makers, we are entitled to congratulate ourselves on some success, but we need to ponder the amount of death and carnage still seen on our roads. More than 3,000 lives are lost every year, with 10 times that number seriously injured. We are entitled to say that we have had successes and that our policy works, but more remains to be done. That is why we are debating a new Road Safety Bill today.

We are keen, these days, on making decisions based on evidence. There is evidence that adding some measures to the Bill would save more lives. The first was mentioned by the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight). Changing the clocks—our time pieces, not the odometers on our cars—twice a year may be a wider issue than can be addressed by a road safety Bill, but the Transport Research Laboratory estimated in 1999 that having lighter evenings would save some 100 lives and prevent 2,000 serious and other injuries a year.

Mr. Tom Harris: I rise simply to put it on the record that not every Scot is opposed to the scrapping of Greenwich mean time. My hon. Friend is correct to say that many lives would be saved, and a proportion of those lives would be Scottish. On that basis alone, I am in favour of scrapping it.

Mr. Kidney: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that point.

The right hon. Member for East Yorkshire gave different figures, and the Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents has recently updated its estimate. It says that 130 lives would be saved and up to 2,500 injuries prevented every year. I appreciate that it is a reserved matter, so this Parliament would make the decision, and that it has wider implications than just road safety. More lives would be saved in the workplace, and it would have massive benefits for the economy, especially in tourism, sport and leisure.

Mr. MacNeil: Perhaps we could have a compromise, with the clocks being changed back to Greenwich mean time a month or five weeks either side of midwinter, instead of the present seven weeks before and 15 weeks after?

Mr. Kidney: That is a generous offer, but I suspect that it will not be decided by this Bill. I urge the Government to consider seriously whether we should have that debate and whether we could all agree on a proposal for change. We have heard Scots voices in this debate that suggest that the objections to the change are not uniform.

I am grateful to Richard Allsop from PACTS for another piece of evidence. Last year, it was estimated that if we reduced the maximum drink drive limit from 80 mg of alcohol in 100 ml of blood to just 50 mg, we could save 65 lives a year. That is a modest change for a valuable saving. I hope that Government and Opposition Front Benchers will give serious consideration to that change, unlike in the last Parliament, when we considered a similar Bill. After all, it would put us back in the mainstream of maximum limits, because at the moment we are out on the edge when it comes to comparison with the legal limits in other countries.

Allied to the drink-driving limit is detection of the people who drive with excess alcohol in their blood. I am a member of PACTS, which I mentioned earlier, and it recommends that we move away from waiting for people to commit an offence before we can test whether they are drunk while driving. We should move towards not random testing, whereby the police can stop anyone they like, whenever they like, for any reason, but to targeted testing, whereby, if the police have intelligence that there is a concentration of people driving with excess alcohol in their blood, the police can conduct tests in the area to try to detect them.

Those hon. Members who were part of the previous Parliament have largely seen such provisions before. It is pleasing to acknowledge that the Government listened to the debates and arguments during the passage of the previous Road Safety Bill, as far as it got, and that they have made improvements in the Bill. It is a shame that one of those measures—the sentences that magistrates courts could impose for the proposed new offence of causing death by careless driving—was watered down in the other place, and I hope that we can review that decision during the Bill's passage, to restore something that is strongly supported by hon. Members and the public generally.

Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West) (Con): I was not here for the opening of the debate because I was attending a Commonwealth Parliamentary Association seminar. Would it be a good idea to invite the Minister to try to bring together groups, such as RoadPeace and Brake, with Members of the other House to hold a small seminar to find out whether they can get their minds together and agree a way for the courts not to be denied information about cause of death, so that it can be taken into account where it is relevant to the penalty?

Mr. Kidney: The hon. Gentleman and I used to co-chair PACTS—I think he still does, but I do not—and I thank him for that constructive suggestion. He missed the speech of the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling), the Conservative spokesman, who has some hesitation about the new offence. The approach that the hon. Gentleman suggests might have some appeal to his hon. Friend.

Further piloting of the alcolock is a very good suggestion. It is a way for the law to address the offender's specific problem before the courts. The more we can do that, the better in sentencing offenders in future. However, as well as those measures, I certainly agree with the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell about the need for more effective road policing. I remind the House that the Department for Transport, the Home Office and the Association of Chief Police Officers jointly announced a road policing commitment in January last year, and the House needs to monitor the effectiveness of that announcement and ensure that we are getting the effective policing that we were then promised.

I support more use of rehabilitation courses for drink-driving offenders, so I welcome the simplification of and extra incentives for those rehabilitation courses under clause 34.

During debates in Committee on the previous Road Safety Bill in the last Parliament, I argued for further extensions of speed awareness and driving improvement courses for other road traffic offenders. Those courses help to address the offender's specific problem and try to put it right for the future, rather than simply sentencing historically for an offence that has been committed previously. Those courses are constructed to look forward to try to ensure that the same behaviour does not occur again.

I also support the proposal in the Bill for graduated penalty points. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said that when he first consulted on that idea more than a year ago the opinion of those who responded was quite closely balanced. More than a year later, the balance has shifted much more towards acceptance of graduated penalty points as part of sentencing procedure. However, the sticking point remains, as the Secretary of State well knows, the concern that many hon. Members have—I am very much one of them—that sending out the message that breaking 20 mph limits and 30 mph limits, even by quite a small amount, is less serious. Breaking the speed limit in precisely that way could have the greatest possible effect on other people.

After all, as other hon. Members have said already, hit a child pedestrian at 20 mph, or even 30, and the child may survive, but drive at closer to 40 mph, and there will be less chance to take avoiding action and the injuries that occur will be probably fatal to the child. With a penalty of two points each time, it will take six offences, instead of the current four, over three years for drivers to tot up enough points to lose their driving licence. The idea that that message will incentivise them to be careful on roads with those speed limits is misplaced to say the least.

On the proposed new offence of causing death by careless driving, I recognise the concerns of those, including the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell, who say that punishment should be commensurate with the guilty act and not with its consequences, but to take a vehicle out on a road is to undertake a responsible activity. As I set out, it is foreseeable that hitting a person with a vehicle will cause injury—perhaps fatal injury—and that should be within the driver's contemplation. The existence of the offence will underline the responsibility that we all assume when we get behind the wheel. Of course, imprisonment for committing the offence is not compulsory or obligatory but will be reserved for those who have clearly failed, by the greatest amount, to shoulder their responsibility.

On specific aspects of driving that need attention, young drivers are most at risk of causing or being involved in road crashes. The insurance industry knows only too well about that preponderance. Some imaginative schemes exist, such as the offer by some insurance companies to reduce the premiums of those who go on to take pass plus as well as their driving test. Norwich Union has a novel pay-as-you-drive insurance, which encourages people to stay off the most dangerous roads or off the roads at the most dangerous times of the day.

Coming along behind those measures—this has a slightly more general application—are technological solutions, such as intelligent speed adaptation. Imagine when it will not be possible for the driver to exceed the speed limit because of how the vehicle is controlled. That will allow us to throw away all the speed humps and speed cameras, which must surely be attractive to many people and worth giving up the joy of breaking the speed limit. Such technology goes wider than measures that affect just young drivers, but it is important that we are young driver-aware in education, publicity and policing.

When we debate the Bill in Committee, I hope that we will give more attention to protecting cyclists, as seems likely from previous contributions. We want to promote cycling. It is a healthy activity, both for the cyclists and for the environment of the world that we all occupy. However, cycling on our congested roads is a dangerous activity. Let me give an example from my postbag. When my constituent, Alastair Semple, was knocked off his bike by a car at a roundabout, he found so little sympathy that the police were not even going to prosecute the car driver for careless driving until Alastair collected sufficient evidence, including photographic evidence, to persuade them that a prosecution was merited. We need more cycle lanes, stronger policing and better education for drivers and, I confess, for cyclists too. We need more publicity from the Department like the advert "Think bike", which relates to motorcycles and is, I think, successful.

It has been estimated that around a third of road casualties occur as a consequence of people driving in the course of their work. We need to create a stronger focus, through the Bill, on employer responsibility for training and education, and, frankly, for not putting their workers under impossible time pressures. There are excellent examples of good employer practice, and we need to ensure that more employers, especially those in small and medium-sized enterprises, get the message and behave equally responsibly. The Bill goes with the grain of the national strategy for reducing casualties, and for that reason it should be supported. It has been improved as a result of consideration in the last Parliament, but it remains capable of further improvement in this one. I hope that in Committee we will have an opportunity to debate some possible improvements that can be made.

4.10 pm

Mr. Lee Scott (Ilford, North) (Con): I agree with the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake), who raised the issue of pedicabs, which are unchecked and unregulated, and cause major problems on our roads. There is no recourse for anyone involved in an accident with them, and that issue should be tackled as a matter of urgency. The hon. Gentleman and my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) spoke about first aid training for drivers.

I appreciate that refresher courses would be required, but if someone has learned something there are some aspects that they will never forget. If that training saves one life, it is worth while, but I recommend that we go a stage further. Some of our European neighbours and many other countries make it compulsory to carry first aid kits in all vehicles, which benefits everyone if a vehicle is involved in an accident or, indeed, if the driver and passengers witness an accident. I urge the Government to consider making it a legal requirement to carry first-aid boxes in cars.

Speed cameras have been mentioned. I fully support them where they make our roads safe. However, there is a speed camera in my constituency at the bottom of the M11 exit to the Redbridge roundabout, where accidents have gone up by 300 per cent. since it was installed. Either it is the wrong place and needs to be moved, or one must assume that it is there for other reasons. Speed cameras should be there to make our roads safer, and for no other reason. Hon. Members have spoken about the blight of mini-motorcycles, which is a huge problem. In my constituency and, I am sure, in others, one sees very young children with no head gear or training driving unlicensed vehicles on the road. We have read in the press about many accidents and, indeed, fatalities. That must be stopped. It is not simply a matter of asking our police force or, indeed, local authorities, to enforce a ban—new legislation is required to bring mini-motorcycles into line with other road vehicles.

I am in favour of a 20 mph speed limit near our schools. I praise the London borough of Redbridge for its work in imposing those limits around schools in my constituency, particularly primary schools. My right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire said that there are certain times of year when a limit is not necessary, but I disagree, as they are needed throughout the year, including school holidays, in residential areas where children play. The 20 mph limit has saved many lives over the years, and it will continue to do so. As we have heard, the question of whether a child is hit at 20 mph or 30 mph can make the difference between serious injury and a life and death situation.

Mr. Bone: Is my hon. Friend aware that in America 15 mph limits are flashed up at the beginning and end of the school day? Is there not a danger that a permanent 20 mph limit will be ignored?

Mr. Scott: My hon. Friend makes a valid point, but I am afraid that I disagree. The permanent enforcement of lower speed limits is required. Cars are usually parked in the street—as we heard, planning regulations mean that homes do not have off-road car parking spaces—creating narrow spaces where children run in and out. Children will be children, and if we can do something to prevent fatalities, we are duty bound to take such action.

The flashing speed signs just mentioned by my hon. Friend offer a valid way to reduce traffic speed in such areas and they should be used. However, I am not as opposed as my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire is to the use of speed humps. They are not needed in some places and should be removed, but they add to traffic calming in residential areas. We need to look at all methods of traffic calming, and we should not lose the contribution that speed humps make.

We have heard today about some tragic cases involving fatalities caused by drink-driving or by people using drugs or mobile phones while driving. Drivers who hit and run must be punished most severely, and such matters will be teased out further in Committee, but how do families feel when one of their members is killed by someone who has been caught driving while drunk? When such a person is given a light sentence by the court, we have to ask whether he or she is paying the price for the crime that has been committed.

If no crime has been committed in such an incident, it is clear that the court must be able to respond accordingly, and I am sure that that is another matter for consideration in Committee. We need to look at the penalties that the court can apply, but it must have the power to send an offender to prison in some cases.

We have also heard about cars from eastern Europe. In my constituency, I see many people driving around in cars that are not roadworthy. Often, they are uninsured, and it is frequently alleged that the people behind the wheel are not qualified to drive. I hope that the Bill will tackle that problem. How can such people be prosecuted if they commit an offence that leads to a tragic accident?

I support and welcome much of the Bill. As other Opposition Members have noted, some elements need teasing out in Committee, but any measure that can save a life or prevent the tragic suffering of families who have lost a loved one must be welcomed, and I do so.

Mr. Tom Harris (Glasgow, South) (Lab): It is a delight to be able to take part in a debate that, so far, has been almost worryingly saturated in consensus. However, I shall try to continue in the same spirit.

I begin by congratulating and paying tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Ms Keeble) for her contribution today and for the immense work that she has done in previous years as part of the campaign to introduce the new offence of causing death by careless driving, which is included in the Bill. I expressed my reservations about that earlier in the debate, and I look forward to thrashing the matter out at length in Committee. I hope that my hon. Friend is a member of that Committee, as the power that she leant to her arguments will serve her well there.

I also pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon). His contribution to the debate was one of the most powerful and moving speeches that I have heard during my time in the House.

Keeping with the spirit of consensus, I welcome this very important Bill. I take this opportunity to pay tribute to my own council, Glasgow city council, and in particular to Robert Booth, the director of land services. He has spearheaded the statutory speed limit of 20 mph around every primary school in the city. That system is an innovative departure and, in line with the suggestion from the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight), allows the flashing speed limit signs to be switched off during the schools' summer recesses. I welcome that and think that it is an effective use of the new power. I know that the hon. Member for Ilford, North (Mr. Scott) does not believe that the 20 mph limit should be switched off during school holidays, but I am sure that we can discuss that in Committee.

[Mr. Tom Harris]

The right hon. Member for East Yorkshire referred at length to his dissatisfaction with traffic humps—so-called sleeping policemen—and I agree with much of what he said. In a previous existence—as well as while being a Member of this House—I found that residents often felt that sleeping policemen were a panacea. They think that if there is speeding in their neighbourhood, they should get some traffic humps. If someone is tragically killed in an accident, the answer is always traffic humps, but it is not always the right answer. The emergency services have grave reservations about sleeping policemen. I might not go as far as the right hon. Gentleman in saying that they should not be used at all, but I think that people have unrealistically high expectations of the effects that sleeping policemen will have on their neighbourhoods.

Paul Rowen: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that one effect of speed humps is an increase in injury for certain people? In my constituency, the local bus company has sought to withdraw bus routes because humps have been put in to an extent that is unacceptable for people who are driving along those routes. Does he agree that we need to investigate alternative solutions?

Mr. Harris: I understand what the hon. Gentleman is saying, although I would be more cautious. I would suggest that, if someone suffers an injury from driving over a road hump or if the vehicle itself is damaged, the driver might be going a bit too fast. About a year ago, a friend of mine in my constituency—an elderly gentleman—complained about a series of road humps in Ardencraig road in Castlemilk. He told me that they were a waste of time. I said, "Why's that?" He said, "When my daughter's driving me to my house in the afternoon we have to slow down and it takes ages." So, perhaps road humps are more effective than the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire suggests. Of course, individual situations require individual solutions.

Mr. Bellingham: The hon. Gentleman is speaking a great deal of sense about road humps. I agree that the people who complain that their cars are damaged are obviously going far too fast. One of the problems that I have come across in my constituency is the displacement of traffic on to roads that do not have road humps. I can think of an example involving four roads that are all parallel. Two of them have traffic calming involving road humps and the other two do not, and all the traffic has been displaced to the two that do not. The issue of traffic engineering is complex and must be thought through very carefully.

Mr. Harris: The hon. Gentleman is right. That is where the role of local authorities is crucial. There is no point in considering a single road and deciding on a solution. A strategy has to be considered so that if traffic calming is implemented on one or two local roads, the knock-on effects on nearby roads are taken into account. In my experience, Strathclyde regional council, where I used to work, had a good record of doing exactly that—as does Glasgow city council.

Alison Seabeck: There is clearly not a standardised road hump anywhere in the country. Plymouth city council has just had to get the contactor that put in speed humps incorrectly along a whole road to remove them. Does my hon. Friend agree that, if we are going to have road humps, they should be standardised? They are often different heights.

Mr. Harris: I may have given the impression earlier that I am some kind of expert on road humps and, if that is the case, I apologise for misleading the House. There may well be a case for standardising sizes and lengths of road humps and my hon. Friend may well have an excellent case, but I am not qualified to offer her an opinion on that.

There is another point that I want to mention, and I appreciate the range that you have allowed to Members taking part in the debate, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because these are important issues, although they are not specifically mentioned in the Bill. A new practice that has unfortunately become more widespread in the past 15 or 20 years, although it was not heard of many years ago, is residents parking their cars on pavements. When I worked as a press officer for Strathclyde regional council many years ago, it was interesting that many of the residents who demanded road humps for their area were exactly the same people who parked their cars on pavements that were supposed to be used by pedestrians. Road engineers had, and have, a sensible response to the practice. If people park their cars on the road—where they belong—and thus reduce the width of a residential road, through traffic must slow down so that it can navigate the road safely. It makes absolutely no sense to widen a road by parking on the area intended for pedestrians and at the same time to ask for road humps.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was absolutely correct to say that the UK has a good road safety record, although he was also right to say that it is not good enough and that we must improve it. I sometimes fear that society in this country sees more than 3,000 deaths a year as an acceptable level of violence, although I know that my right hon. Friend would not subscribe to that sentiment, far less give voice to it, which is just as well given that when Reginald Maudling, a previous Conservative Home Secretary, used the phrase in the House, he was promptly attacked by Miss Bernadette Devlin—I do not propose such a course of action today.

There is no other aspect of public life in this country in which more than 3,000 deaths a year would be remotely acceptable or tolerated. If that number of deaths occurred on the railways or British domestic airlines, the situation would not be allowed to continue. The hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake) talked about the number of people who are devoted to examining safety on the railways and airlines. We, as a society, have come to accept the number of deaths, but that should be at the root of our attempts to address the problem.

Tom Brake: The hon. Gentleman expresses support for a proposal that I advocated earlier. Would he be willing to put his name to an amendment that would introduce a road accident investigation board that could examine the pattern of road accidents and try to find solutions, as is the case for aviation and rail?

Mr. Harris: I will resist that temptation because such a body would simply be another quango and would create more bureaucracy—I am not instinctively in favour of such developments. Additionally, given the number of accidents that take place, such an investigation unit would repeat its investigations each time that one occurred. On balance, such a publicly funded and unelected quango would not achieve a great deal, but I look forward to hearing the hon. Gentleman's arguments in Committee.

When the Bill becomes an Act, its success will depend on the greater acceptance and use of speed cameras. I declare an interest at this point because I have six penalty points on my licence. I was clocked on the M6 in December 2003—I will not tell hon. Members the speed—and five months earlier, I was caught by a speed camera on the A9. Even though the offences were five months apart, I found out about both endorsements in December 2003 and thus went from having a completely clean licence to having a licence with six points on it in two weeks. I reveal this partly in case someone else reveals it first and, secondly, because it has made me think carefully whenever I drive. I need my car to do my job.

After such a fright from getting six penalty points on my licence in such a period of time, I have driven more carefully since the end of 2003 than at any other time in my life, and I have speed cameras to thank for that. I did not enjoy being caught, but it is an inevitable argument that even where speed cameras do not save lives—for example, the stretch of motorway where I was caught is not a particular accident blackspot—getting caught has led directly to a change in my behaviour. That outcome should be welcomed as a direct result of the proliferation of speed cameras in this country.

There is a huge amount of media outrage, and it was suggested earlier that some Opposition Members are not as enthusiastic about the proliferation of speed cameras as some Labour Members. We see evidence of the Daily Mail Big Brother agenda every time new speed cameras go up. The George Orwell analogy is so over-used that I wonder whether any of the sub-editors have read "1984". I do not remember Winston Smith being clocked for doing 80 mph on the M6. "1984" was about slightly more important freedoms than the freedom to break the law and endanger other people's lives.

I am not in favour of restrictions on individual freedoms. For example, I did not vote to support the 100 per cent. ban on smoking in public places, but there is no such thing as the right to break the law. That should not be tolerated by the House. If speed cameras can contribute to a change in the culture whereby speeding becomes unacceptable, in the same way as drink-driving has become unacceptable, speed cameras will be seen historically to have made a major contribution to the safety of our culture. It is often said by the anti-speed camera lobby that speed cameras turn ordinary law-abiding citizens into criminals. They do not. Law-abiding citizens turn themselves into criminals by choosing to break the law by speeding. That is an unpleasant message to give, but it is fact.

I want to challenge my hon. Friend the Minister on part of clause 18, which outlaws speed assessment equipment detection devices. I know exactly the kind of devices to which that refers, but could there not be a wider interpretation of the word "device"? Last year the AA published its new road map of Britain, which included the precise location of every stationary speed camera in the country. Whatever the protestations of the AA, the only reason for publishing the exact location of every speed camera in the country was in order to warn its members, the purchasers of that map, when they may get caught speeding. In other words, it was a device enabling people to break the speed limit on long stretches of road, and then to slow down when they were approaching a speed camera, in order to avoid prosecution. I hope that the clause will outlaw such a measure.

Stephen Hammond (Wimbledon) (Con): One could take the alternative view—that the measure was telling people how to conform to the law.

Mr. Harris: I could take that view, although I will not. That is exactly the argument that the AA used when it was justifiably criticised for producing such a reprehensible publication.

Dr. Ladyman: Before my hon. Friend digs too deep a hole for me to climb out of, although the AA received a great deal of publicity for having produced that document, it was based on a document produced by the Government. We publish the sites of all speed cameras, as does every camera partnership. The reason we do that is in line with the argument suggested by the hon. Member for Wimbledon (Stephen Hammond)—we want people to know where the blackspots are, where the cameras have been located, so that they can address their offending behaviour and drive safely at those sites.

Mr. Harris: That brings me to another point. I do not think that most drivers would respond in such a way. Personally, I do not believe that speed cameras should be visible from the road. Having speed cameras aimed at catching lawbreakers but painting them black and yellow—there are lines on the road, but they have to be there—to warn people that they are about to be monitored is completely self-defeating.

The hon. Member for Ilford, North mentioned a problem in his constituency on the approach to a roundabout from a slip-road off the M11, where accidents had increased by 300 per cent. since a speed camera was installed. I do not know anything about the particular circumstances, but I wonder whether the reason for the increase is that the visibility of the camera forces drivers to slow down too quickly, perhaps causing cars to bump together. There is a simple answer: do not make the cameras visible. If somebody is driving within the speed limit at all times, they have no need to know where any of the cameras are. The idea that either the Government or the AA are making the locations of cameras known in order to safeguard people pushes the limits of credibility. The AA performed a service for particular drivers, as it knew that drivers needed to know the location of cameras in order to hit 80 and 90 mph between them.

Another device that is used to beat speed cameras is special reflective number plates. There was an advert in Glasgow a few years ago—it has now been removed—next to the Clydeside expressway promoting reflective number plates that it said were guaranteed to beat speed cameras. Of course, there may be some loophole that allows such number plates to be sold legally. I hope not, and I hope that the police would investigate any such advert. Will the Minister clarify whether such a device would be counted as one aimed at beating the speed camera?

Dr. Ladyman: I shall give my hon. Friend the clarification that he seeks now. The Bill is intended to make legal devices that simply tell people where the cameras to which he refers are. In addition, however, a covert activity of speed detection is carried out by the police using radars. What the Bill makes illegal is devices allowing people to tell where such covert activity is taking place.

Mr. Harris: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that clarification.

Finally, I come to mobile phone offences and clause 26. Although once again the civil libertarians might say that the current law, which prevents drivers from using a mobile phone—at the moment, there is only a fixed penalty—and clause 26 are some sort of infringement of civil liberties, I have found among my own voters that that is not what concerns people. People are concerned that the law is already flagrantly flaunted and rarely enforced. Outside this Palace earlier this week, I watched a van driver turn off Westminster bridge and left into Millbank, stopping at the traffic lights in front of police officers and speaking on his mobile phone as he went.

Of course, I welcome the measures in the clause, and I believe that people who use their phone irresponsibly while driving should have their licences endorsed. If that ultimately means disqualification, so be it, as that is their choice. However, the clause will only be as effective as the current law unless police officers do some serious enforcement. That is the only thing that will prevent people from using their mobile phones while they are driving. While it is obvious that people who use their mobile phones while driving are not being prosecuted or challenged, there is very little inducement for law-abiding motorists to fork out the money to have a hands-free kit installed in their car. That is what the Government should be encouraging people to do, and it will happen only once people who refuse to do it are held to account.

I am grateful for the opportunity to participate in the debate and hope that I have remained largely consensual, because I welcome the vast majority of the Bill. The Whip is present in the Chamber, and I am sure that he has noted my willingness to serve in Standing Committee—I will be massively disappointed if my plea goes unheard.

4.40 pm

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): As the hon. Member for Glasgow, South (Mr. Harris) has said, the debate has been consensual, and party politics should not divide us in this policy area.

I will focus on one specific area in the hope that the Minister will see fit to table amendments to deal with a serious road safety problem brought to my attention by Bedfordshire police. At the moment, many drivers routinely commit large numbers of moving road traffic offences that principally involve speeding, but that also include dangerous driving such as jumping red lights. They get away with it because their vehicle details are incorrectly registered.

That matter involves blatant discrimination. Law-abiding members of the public who correctly register their vehicles rightly pay the penalty of the law when speed cameras or police officers catch them, while people who incorrectly register their vehicles get away with driving extremely dangerously. In my constituency, for example, the A505, which runs from south of Leighton Buzzard to north of Dunstable has a 50 mph speed limit, but drivers have recently been recorded driving at speeds of up to 119 mph on that road. One driver did 82 mph in a built-up area in Dunstable, where there is a 30 mph speed limit, while another jumped a red light six seconds after the light had turned red. I can also show the Minister ample photographic evidence of drivers making rude gestures to speed cameras because they know that they cannot be touched as the law currently stands.

Since I raised the matter in an Adjournment debate on 8 December, five people have been involved in fatal accidents and three people have been seriously injured in incidents in Bedfordshire involving cars with incorrectly registered details. The tragedy is that some cars have been caught doing outrageous speeds on many occasions—one vehicle has been clocked by speed cameras on 73 occasions and a motor bike has been caught 61 times. It is obvious that death and serious injury could be prevented if the police were able to act on the ample evidence provided by speed cameras.

To give the Minister an idea of the scale of the problem, Bedfordshire police recorded 1,000 offences in December this year on which no action could be taken because it was impossible to trace the vehicles concerned. Those offences resulted in more than £30,000 of outstanding fines, many of which have lapsed under the six-month rule. The public expenditure implications are important, and I am sure that the Minister wants all fines to be collected.

Several hon. Members have mentioned PACTS. After my Adjournment debate on 8 December, the director of PACTS, Robert Gifford, pointed out in a letter that > "You are quite correct that this is a significant issue both for police resources and for road safety. As the Road Safety Bill will be returning to the House of Commons in the New Year, there may be an opportunity to raise these issues at Committee stage."

I am happy to show the Minister that letter.

I would like to quote a couple of paragraphs from a letter written by the chief constable of Bedfordshire police, Gillian Parker. I want to place on the record my admiration for her in pursuing this issue. I am grateful to her and to her officers for all the work that they have put into trying to bring it to the Government's attention. Mrs. Parker writes as follows:

> "Most vehicles involved in these offences are registered with false details, or to a false or non-existent address. This makes the process of identifying the registered keeper and the driver virtually impossible.
> Even when these vehicles are stopped as a result of PNC markers placed upon them, the driver is able to provide identification and gives a plausible account as to who the registered keeper is. The evidence is usually insufficient to enable positive action to be taken and we are left no further forward in identifying the true offender in relation to the offences outstanding."

She continues:

"Advice has been sought from CPS and our local judiciary, there is agreement that to apply the Section 3 test to speeding offences, that is to suggest speeding per se also represents careless and inconsiderate driving, would be inappropriate and unlikely to succeed in court. As a result we are powerless to seize these vehicles under this legislation.

When our offenders are stopped they usually hold driving licences and insurance, albeit registered to false addresses. Therefore, we cannot use the powers under The Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005."

When I spoke in the House on this subject on 8 December, I quoted similar stories from the police forces of Cambridgeshire, Essex, Greater Manchester—interestingly, the local police force of the Minister who responded—Suffolk and Thames Valley. Today, I can tell the House that I have additional information from the police forces of Nottinghamshire, Derbyshire, Humberside, Lincolnshire, Wiltshire and Warwickshire, which are facing the same problem. That is 12 police forces in total. That does not mean that the other 31 police forces are happy with the current law, but merely that we have not yet managed to get responses from them.

Let me quote the comments of some of those other police forces in case the Minister or any other Member thinks that the problem is peculiar to Bedfordshire police, which it certainly is not. Nottinghamshire police says:

"I agree with the Bedfordshire legal advisors and other Forces that this legislation—that is, section 59 of the Police Reform Act 2002—

"is not appropriate to deal with this type of offence and offender. S.59 relates specifically to vehicles being used in a manner causing alarm, distress or annoyance. Therefore, if we cannot show the alarm etc, we have lost the powers. Unlawful use does not necessarily involve problems caused directly to members of the public. This legislation was introduced to combat the problems caused by the 'boy racers', around towns and cities in particular. I am surprised that the Home Office even suggested this."

Humberside police says:

"I agree that the Police Reform Act Powers are insufficient in this respect. While all powers have to be proportionate, the ease with which the non-compliant can continue to evade justice is alarming and unfair for the rest of us."

Derbyshire police says:

"Section 59 of the Police Reform Act 2002 is not appropriate as it relates to confiscating vehicles which are causing alarm, distress or annoyance."

Lastly, Wiltshire police says:

"If we rigorously made every possible attempt to trace some of these registered keepers and nominated drivers I agree with your comments that we would be left with a paper trail with no realistic prospect of tracing/convicting the offender on many occasions."

I apologise for quoting at length from different police forces but I hope that the quotes show the scale of the problem. Although hon. Members could be forgiven for believing that Bedfordshire police might not be fully competent—they are—I hope that the fact that 12 police forces have gone on record to say that the law is inadequate to tackle the problem will convince the Minister that we need to sit down together to examine the issue more seriously.

The Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the hon. Member for Leigh (Andy Burnham), tried to convince me during my Adjournment debate on 8 December that section 59 of the Police Reform Act 2002 gave the police adequate powers. I asked the chief constable of Bedfordshire to raise that with the head of the Association of Chief Police Officers' road policing business area. I am sorry to say that all that has happened is that the relevant chief constable raised the matter with the Home Office, which gave the same advice as the Under-Secretary was given when he replied to the Adjournment debate on 8 December.

The Under-Secretary also said that powers under the Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005 could be used to deal with the problem. As I have already said when referring to the comments of the chief constable of Bedfordshire, the powers in the Bill to seize vehicles apply only if valid driving licences and insurance cannot be produced. In most of the Bedfordshire cases, that does not apply and drivers have been able to produce valid documents. That means that highly dangerous offences continue to be committed time and again, and the police can do nothing about it.

I have raised the matter with Conservative Front Benchers and we are prepared to table amendments to deal with the problem. It would be regrettable if we had to do that. As I said at the beginning of my remarks, it would show the House of Commons at its worst if we divided on party political lines about the matter. Party politics should not come into it. It should be a case of sitting down together and ascertaining why the current law is unsatisfactory.

In my Adjournment debate on 8 December, we had the absurd and almost comical position whereby the Under-Secretary stood at the Dispatch Box to tell me that the powers were adequate while, above him in the Public Gallery, two serving officers from Bedfordshire police shook their heads as he spoke. It is incumbent on us all to listen to serving police officers who deal with the matter day in, day out and desperately want it to be resolved.

Problems also exist with the requirements that we make of people when they register their vehicles. I do not know whether the Minister is familiar with the address of 25 Duke street in Chelmsford. There is no particular reason why he should be. However, it is well known not only to Essex police but to Bedfordshire police and, indeed, to many police forces in the eastern region because it is purely a drop-off postal address, at which many vehicles are registered. It is an address of convenience. When the police turn up there, they have no hope of apprehending the relevant driver. There are therefore problems with the registration of vehicles.

I had the opportunity to speak to the Minister briefly before the debate and I shall listen carefully to his winding-up remarks. I genuinely believe that there is a misunderstanding on the part of some civil servants in the Home Office. I appreciate that Ministers must take advice and listen to their civil servants, but I hope that I have given enough evidence to show that the police need extra powers to seize vehicles, the owners of which have committed multiple offences of driving at outrageously dangerous speeds, and to tackle the problem. I greatly look forward to the Minister's response.

Mrs. Linda Riordan (Halifax) (Lab): May I urge the Minister to seize the opportunity provided by the Road Safety Bill to address the problems of unidentified and untreated sleep disorders among drivers, as a means of improving road safety? The hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake) mentioned this issue earlier. The Bill, and the Department for Transport's "Tiredness kills" campaign, include welcome measures—the Secretary of State mentioned picnic areas—to address the problem of sleepiness in tired but otherwise healthy drivers.

However, those measures fail to educate or regulate the estimated 4 per cent. of the middle-aged population who suffer from the sleep disorder known as sleep apnoea, and who might be unaware that they have a medical condition, as such conditions are not checked for under the present licensing system. Sufferers of obstructive sleep apnoea have been shown to have a worse driving performance than healthy drivers who are over the alcohol limit.

A case study from the Sleep Apnoea Trust illustrates the problem. It states:

"For many years prior to my car accident there were periods during the day when I felt utterly exhausted. Unknown to me I was experiencing poor quality sleep every night and to an extent it was affecting my whole life. My ability to concentrate was poor. In August 1997 we had been out walking in the morning, had a light lunch (no alcohol), a further walk in the afternoon, and I was driving home when I apparently dozed off and next thing was that we hit a tree at about 60 mph. Fortunately, neither I nor my wife was seriously injured, although I was taken by ambulance to hospital with an aggravated spinal complaint.

The car following me up the hill was being driven by an off duty traffic policeman on holiday. Being first on the scene he checked for alcohol then asked several questions from which I subsequently realised (after diagnosis with sleep apnoea) that he was obviously familiar with the condition. Previous visits to my GP had not revealed anything untoward, it was put down to long and irregular hours (I suspect more than likely the general lack of understanding of the Sleep Apnoea condition)."

The prevalence of sleep disorders is significant and growing. As obesity is a contributory factor to OSA, the incidence of the disorder is likely to increase. The largest British survey to date of drivers of heavy goods vehicles studied 900 drivers over two years and found that one in six had severe OSA. It also found that one in three HGV drivers had moderate OSA. Awareness of sleep disorders among members of the public, drivers and employers of professional drivers is unacceptably low.

Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend on her work as chair of the all-party group on sleep disorders. This is an important issue. Does she agree that many drivers would hesitate to report the fact that they suffered from drowsiness because they would be afraid of losing their licence? They are probably not aware that this is a curable disease. Should not the Department for Transport and the Department of Health work together to publicise these issues?

Mrs. Riordan rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I am obliged to say to the hon. Lady that she really needs to direct her remarks to what might, in her view, be in the Bill that we are discussing. We cannot have a general discussion about sleep disorders. That would be more appropriate for another occasion, perhaps even an Adjournment debate. She must somehow relate what she is saying to the Bill, and not just by vaguely alluding to the fact that sleep disorders may cause road accidents. She must propose what might be done in the Bill to address the issue.

Mrs. Riordan: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker; I do beg your pardon. I thank my hon. Friend for her intervention. I will cover the point that she raised later in my speech, as well as outlining what I would like to see in the Bill.

As I was saying, awareness of sleep disorders among members of the public, drivers and employers of professional drivers is unacceptably low, given the associated risks. Indeed, the Department is well aware of that. In 2004, an expert workshop convened by the Department for Transport on driving and medical aspects of excessive daytime sleepiness concluded:

"The key issue was how to address the undiagnosed, but potentially high-risk, driver with a sleep disorder . . . The major focus should be on identifying and treating unrecognised patients rather than just addressing the issue of driving in those already known to have OSA".

I am concerned that from the answers to parliamentary questions that I tabled in the autumn, it would appear that the DFT has not undertaken research into the medical status of individuals involved in sleep-related traffic accidents, nor kept a record of the number of accidents where a sleep disorder was a contributory factor. That suggests a fundamental gap.

Tom Brake: I hope it will be a helpful intervention if I suggest that sleep disorders are the sort of thing that the road accidents investigation board, which could form part of the Bill, could investigate.

Mrs. Riordan: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his intervention and agree with him.

Additionally, the licensing system needs to be more robust. Research undertaken by the Institute of Advanced Motorists and published in February 2006 found low awareness of the effects of medical conditions upon driving among occupational drivers and their employers. In a survey of 1,000 drivers in England, Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland, seven out of 10 said that their employers neither offer nor require medical check-ups. It is also worth noting that although the symptoms of sleep disorders can be managed cheaply and effectively, enabling most drivers to return safely to driving, there is a failure to provide those medical services, which results in a disincentive to report to the DVLA.

Mark Hunter (Cheadle) (LD): The hon. Lady has raised a number of important points, but the key is surely that the Bill does nothing to address concerns about driver sleepiness as a result of the sleep disorders to which she has referred. Would the hon. Lady agree that a major disadvantage of the Bill is that it does not envisage strengthening the process of awarding licences or reviewing medical fitness to drive? Would she also agree that those issues need to be considered by the Department for Transport and that a regular review of medical fitness is required to deal with the problem?

Mrs. Riordan rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Both the hon. Members for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake) and for Cheadle (Mark Hunter) have nobly tried to help the hon. Lady bridge the gap between the notes that she has prepared and the content of the Bill. I must urge her to take the escape route that is being offered to her in order to come to the point directly.

Mrs. Riordan: Thank you, Mr Deputy Speaker.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman, and I am asking the Minister to work more with other Departments to bridge the gaps so that drivers can feel safe to have medical checks and continue to drive.

It must be communicated to drivers who experience persistent sleepiness that in addition to the short-term measures outlined in the Bill, such as stopping at a safe rest area or drinking a high caffeine drink such as coffee, they may need to seek medical help to establish whether their sleepiness derives from a sleep disorder.

Secondly, the Department should take steps to inform drivers about sleep disorders and their responsibility to report any concerns they may have over their medical fitness to drive. The processes of awarding a driving licence and reviewing fitness to drive should be strengthened to increase the likelihood of sleep disorders being identified in drivers. Lastly, the DFT should collaborate with the Department of Health to ensure the speedy diagnosis and treatment of drivers with sleep disorders to help to remove the existing disincentive to report symptoms or to seek medical health.

Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): When the Secretary of State opened the debate he pointed out that the national road safety figures were improving, which is welcome—but, unfortunately, in my constituency they are doing anything but that. Last year there were 20 road fatalities—about four times the national average—and this year, sadly, there have already been four deaths. It is only March, yet we are already approaching the national yearly average, so it would be gratifying if the number did not increase at all this year.

There is a mixture of reasons for those accidents. The coroner has not yet reported on many cases so we cannot talk about them, but in one accident involving young drivers the report has been made and the cause was drink-related excessive speed. My constituents were affected particularly by the prevalence of multiple fatalities, especially of younger drivers, and I shall discuss some of the remedies to prevent such accidents.

One good thing that came out of those tragedies was the good response of the local community. Mike Webb and Jimmy Martin, driving instructors and members of the Forest and Wye Valley Driving Instructors Association, have put together, in their own time, an excellent presentation, which they have been taking to schools in the area, to get through to youngsters the importance of safe and careful driving, to try to save lives. They have been working with the fire and rescue service, the police and the county council's road safety team.

I am pleased that the county council has targeted highway improvements in its budget plans for future years, to ensure that our roads are safer. Local authorities will be bidding for road safety grants from the Department for Transport and it is worth noting that there are some straightforward physical changes that can be made, especially in rural areas—for example, the proper installation of road drainage. In Gloucestershire county council's new contract, drainage will be a key performance indicator. It is important to make sure that there is no surface water on roads, as it appears to have been a factor in at least one of the casualties last year.

The Secretary of State mentioned the number of accidents that do not involve another vehicle. In my rural constituency, a number of fatalities occur when people lose control of their vehicle and hit a sizeable roadside tree. The county council is looking into the idea of cutting back trees, which will have several benefits. It will improve visibility, reduce ice cover—because the road will not be in shade—allow boundary features and road signs to be more visible, and provide more space for horse riders to get off the road if necessary. Neither measure—proper road cleaning or control of vegetation—would cost much. When we consider the financial costs of a road fatality, quite apart from anything else, such investment is sensible.

The Bill includes proposals for road safety grants, for which local authorities will bid and which the Department will award based on the road casualty figures and the quality of the local authority's casualty reduction plan. I welcome the proposal for the grants. My only plea to the Minister is that the application and assessment process should not be painful for local authorities, or require huge amounts of bureaucracy. Furthermore, given the variety of road safety performance and geographical area, as well as the nature of the road network, there should be significant local flexibility when assessing casualty reduction plans. After all, local people have a much better idea of what needs to be done to improve road safety in their area.

The hon. Member for Northampton, North (Ms Keeble) touched on the statistics about young drivers, noting that young men account for only about 4 per cent. of the driving population, but for more than 30 per cent. of dangerous driving convictions. It is clear from the various meetings that we had following road accidents in my constituency, with young drivers in particular, that we need to do more than provide education and training in the theory and practice of driving. We should bear in mind the attitudes that young males bring to driving. For one thing, they think that they are invincible; unfortunately, when they discover that they are not it is often too late, and they, or others, pay the price. There are also societal factors. Young men are influenced by, for instance, magazines that emphasise the attractiveness of speed. We need to combat such influences.

I am trying to persuade the emergency and education services in Gloucestershire to adopt a scheme that has been successful in Surrey, called Safe Drive Stay Alive. It was the idea of a Surrey firefighter, Rob Green, who was the victim of an accident caused by a speeding uninsured young driver. The Bill may help to prevent such accidents. The driver hit Rob Green and his wife when they were travelling on a motor cycle. Sadly, Mrs. Green was killed, and her husband lost both legs and suffered severe burns. When he returned to work, he developed the idea of a touring performance for young people approaching, and reaching, the legal driving age of 17. The first event was staged in Dorking. Groups of sixth-formers were bussed to a venue several times a day to see a production involving a filmed reconstruction of a genuine road accident in which a young person had been killed and others severely injured. The film used all the emergency services, and was shockingly realistic. I viewed it on a DVD with which I was supplied.

Following the screening, the audience was addressed by the emergency service personnel who had been involved in the original accident: the firefighter who cut the passengers free, the paramedic who was first on the scene, the doctor who pronounced the young person dead, the policeman who had to visit her parents, and the victim of another road accident who had ended up confined to a wheelchair. Apparently, the effect on the audience was profound. Subsequent research confirmed that the event had changed the young people's attitudes to driving, and made a noticeable difference to the way in which they conducted themselves.

As I have said, I am encouraging the relevant authorities in Gloucestershire to adopt that idea. I should like the Minister to think about it as well. If such programmes are bid for as part of the road safety grant arrangements, he may consider it appropriate to fund them.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): The hon. Gentleman is right to suggest that we should target certain age groups with certain messages. The increasing prevalence of accidents among born-again bikers is often overlooked. They acquire very fast machines in middle age, and late middle age. A road in my constituency, between Ashby-de-la-Zouch and Rempstone, is a death trap. The number of accidents there is significant. Should we not target groups of that kind as well?

Mr. Harper: My point was not exclusive, but the statistics show a notable prevalence of casualties and convictions for dangerous driving among younger people. In my constituency last year, a significant number of such drivers were young. The hon. Gentleman makes a good point, however. All drivers need to think about the way in which they conduct themselves on the road. At many of our meetings following road accidents, many older and more experienced drivers were frank about the fact that they too might not have the right attitude to driving. They may have as much to learn as some younger drivers. Nevertheless, there is unmistakable evidence that young people account for a significant percentage of road accidents.

The pass plus course is one of the training opportunities for drivers, particularly new drivers. I have tabled some questions on that matter to the Minister, and raised it at oral questions. One of the things that I am thinking about is how to arrange things so that young drivers, in particular, see the benefit of undertaking such training. One of the blocks is that pass plus carries a financial cost. Sometimes, if a younger driver has just paid for driving lessons and is having to fund a car, taking other training is quite expensive. There is one obvious method to make that more affordable—providing young people with significant discounts on car insurance, which is a significant cost, as a result of having done pass plus or other training.

Many insurance companies offer discounts for pass plus, some of which can be quite significant—but that is not always the case. I have spoken to a number of young people in my constituency who have taken pass plus or other training courses. For example, Sarah Rudge, a 19-year-old from Mile End, and Jonathan Jones, an 18-year-old from Pope's Hill, recently took a Royal Society for the Prevention of Accidents course. I presented them with their certificates in my constituency office. I talked to them about what happened. They struggled to get improved insurance quotes, even though they had taken some training and demonstrated that they were careful drivers and approached driving with the right attitude.

If it is not possible for the Government to fund pass plus for younger drivers, perhaps they can have talks with the insurance industry to look at the evidence from drivers who have taken extra training to see whether it has had a significant effect on the safety of their driving. If it has, perhaps they could try to get the insurance industry to assess the risk properly when they offer quotes. That seems a good way to encourage increased take-up.

The insurance companies have an incentive to encourage safer driving, particularly with younger drivers. If people have accidents in which they are seriously injured, which stops them from being able to work and means that they need significant support throughout their life, it can be incredibly expensive. I have been given one example of a 22-year-old driver who attempted to overtake at high speed and had a serious accident. Considering the medical costs, the damages for injury, the modifications to his housing, the fact that he was not going to be able to work for the rest of his life, and the fact that his previous job had been modestly paid, the insurance company was looking at a total claim of £3 million. That may be exceptional, but in view of some of those factors, it is easy to see that the financial arrangements could be made to work in the right direction and encourage young people to become better trained and better qualified, and to approach driving with the right attitude. I urge the Minister to do that in conjunction with the insurance industry.

I did not intend to say anything about the proposal to tighten the penalties for causing death by careless driving, but one remark by my hon. Friend the Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling) was worth elaborating on—his remark about what happens to drivers if they swerve to avoid an animal and cause a road accident and a death. In certain parts of my constituency, we have a significant deer population. The main roads through the forest are not fenced. A person can be driving perfectly safely and reduce their speed because they know deer are about—but deer, unlike some other animals, can give no warning. They can come out straight in front of the driver. They are of a significant size. The driver reacts. There is no time to think—it has happened to me; fortunately, there were no other vehicles in the vicinity. The driver swerves to avoid the animal and crosses to the other side of the road. At a different time, they could have caused a serious road accident, although there would have been no intention to do so. The person would not have been driving dangerously. I would not want people in that situation to be criminalised and put in prison.

Dr. Ladyman: I should make it absolutely clear that the circumstances that the hon. Gentleman is describing would not generate a charge of causing death by careless driving, because such behaviour simply is not careless. Let us not create constructs that lead us to criticise this legislation for the wrong reasons.

Mr. Harper: I thank the Minister for that intervention, and I do not want to make too much of the issue. Some Members have focused today on what happens as a result of an accident, but however appalling such results are for the families concerned, in making law and setting penalties we have to consider the motivation and behaviour of the driver, regardless of the consequences.

Mrs. James: Like many Members present today, I have several high-profile cases in my constituency involving young people who lost their lives. I appreciate what the hon. Gentleman is saying, but I cannot let it pass. In the past year, three young people—Lesley-Ann Morgan, her fiancé and a friend—lost their lives in a very serious crash in my constituency when returning from a happy family evening. The wedding of Lesley-Ann and her fiancé had been soon to take place; now they are buried next to each other. Although their families have received a lot of support, they remain greatly concerned about the sentence handed out. The two young men in question, who were racing at speeds in excess of 70 mph in a 30 mph zone, could have been sentenced to 22 years imprisonment. We should never think that the families' feelings should not take precedence.

Mr. Harper: I take that point, and it is clear that in such cases the right offence for someone to be charged with is dangerous driving, which addresses the question of intent. The hon. Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon) mentioned similar cases in his constituency, and his complaint seemed primarily to be about the sentences that the courts had chosen to impose. I do not know the details of those cases, but if the complaint is the sentences being chosen, giving the courts more options will not solve the problem, bearing in mind the fact that they are not taking up the options that they already have. The Crown Prosecution Service could perhaps do with some guidance in that regard.

I welcome the fact that the Bill will allow an alternative verdict to that of manslaughter in cases where such a charge is brought; that is a sensible move. We should encourage the prosecuting authorities not simply to go for the easiest charge, for which they know they will secure a conviction. If they genuinely think that the circumstances merit the higher charge of causing death by dangerous driving, they should prosecute on that, rather than going for the easier charge. That would go a long way towards dealing with the admittedly tragic cases in which the CPS should have brought a charge of dangerous driving, but chose a different charge.

My hon. Friend the Member for Epsom and Ewell also touched on enforcement. Unless there are sufficient traffic policemen to enforce offences, there is little point in having them. Speeding is a case in point. The cause of accidents in rural constituencies such as mine is often not speeding per se, but driving at inappropriate speeds. In other words, even if people are driving well within the speed limit, if they are approaching a bend, or there is poor visibility or dangerous weather conditions, they could still be driving inappropriately fast for the conditions. We can deal with that problem only if sufficient traffic officers are available to catch such people and advise them, or to take other action. Regardless of how many speed cameras there are, they are suitable only for catching people exceeding the speed limit. In many cases, driving at the speed limit is very dangerous, and we need to catch such people. That is not going to happen unless we have sufficient enforcement.

The hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake) and my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) mentioned making first aid training part of the driving test. The other aspect of an early response to accidents is ambulance response times, which will never be as quick in rural areas as they are in urban areas, even when the system is working well. We have had some very slow ambulance response times, which I have taken up with the Minister's colleagues. An initial speedy response is important, and it is worth considering how we could build first aid training into the driving test. We could also consider how we could encourage all drivers to be more skilled in that area, without making it compulsory.

I, too, have found from observing the reaction of drivers as they are triggered, that vehicle-activated warning signs have been effective. The signs appear to have the desired effect and could be made more flexible. For example, my right hon. Friend suggested that the limits could be variable on busy roads and according to the weather conditions. Such signs are often better than speed cameras, and I commend them to the Minister.

I welcome the Bill, although it can be improved. I hope that the Minister will take on board the comments that I have made—I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) will do so—and make improvements to make it an even better Bill.

Sir Peter Soulsby (Leicester, South) (Lab): It is clear from contributions by right hon. and hon. Members on both sides that there is broad consensus on the majority of the Bill. However, as was evident from the contribution by the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling), which has been echoed to some extent by the hon. Member for Forest of Dean (Mr. Harper), there are significant differences of opinion about the need for a specific new offence of causing death by careless driving and a potential punishment of imprisonment for up to five years.

I shall concentrate on that issue, but before doing so I pay tribute, as others have, to my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Ms Keeble), who has campaigned on it for a considerable time. She rightly drew attention to the feelings of the families and friends of people killed by those subsequently convicted of careless driving but who escaped appropriate penalties. The families and friends feel burning resentment at such sentences, and understandably so.

[Sir Peter Soulsby]

I shall follow the example of my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon), who told us of cases in his constituency. I wish to draw attention to a particular case from mine because to some extent it forms a response to the remarks of the hon. Member for Forest of Dean by pointing up the gap between the present offences of dangerous driving and careless driving, and the penalties associated with them. The case illustrates why that gap must be filled.

On the afternoon of 12 June 2004, 12-year-old Callum Deacon, from the Saffron lane area of my constituency, was out on his bike with friends in Asquith way. He was hit and, tragically, killed by a speeding motorcyclist. Significantly, the motorcyclist did not brake immediately, but carried on for a few hundred yards. Because he did not brake, there were no skid marks, so it was not possible to tell definitively at what speed he had been travelling.

Incidentally, I was encouraged by the remarks from my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) about the dangers associated with motorbikes. In our consideration of the Bill, we are right to focus not only on cars, but on motorbikes and to recognise the dangers for those who ride or are hit by them. Callum's body was catapulted 40 yd down the road, so we can well imagine at what speed that motor cyclist must have been going, but it was apparently impossible to prove his speed satisfactorily for the benefit of the courts to ensure a conviction for dangerous driving. The driver admitted careless driving, as he had not braked, but because there were no skid marks and because his speed could not be determined precisely, the judge very reluctantly—he expressed his dissatisfaction at having to do this—had no alternative but to rule that there was insufficient evidence to convict for dangerous driving, although that had been the charge.

As a result of the inability to convict for dangerous driving, the motor cyclist, who had admitted careless driving, was fined £2,000 and given a few points on his licence. To my mind and those of many hon. Members, that penalty was derisory. It is not surprising that Callum's parents, Mandy and Ivan, who had to wait 20 months for that verdict, described it as an insult to his memory. Of course, they know, as we all know, that nothing can bring Callum back, but they have, very much to their credit, actively campaigned to ensure that drivers who cause death by careless driving receive an appropriate prison sentence in future.

Mr. Harper: I am listening very carefully, and the hon. Gentleman says that the difficulty of assembling evidence was the reason for sentence imposed in that case. If the motor cyclist was charged with causing death by careless driving, given the difficulties with the evidence and proving the speed and so forth, he would not be given a prison sentence, because the judge would not consider that he had the necessary evidence in front of him. The danger is that we may hold out the promise of something that simply will not happen. If the evidence had existed, we would not need the new charge, because the motor cyclist could have been convicted of dangerous driving.

Sir Peter Soulsby: It is important to remember that the defendant admitted careless driving, and it was very clear, too, that the judge was most dissatisfied by the gap that existed between the maximum penalty that he could impose for the admitted offence of careless driving and the very high hurdle for dangerous driving, which he had been unable to establish. That gap is significant, and the Bill sets out to fill it.

As I have said, Callum's parents know that nothing can bring him back, but their campaign has been actively supported by the community in the Saffron lane area and by the Leicester Mercury. The right hon. Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight), who has some connections with Leicester, paid tribute to that paper earlier, and I do the same: it is has actively campaigned on behalf of Callum's memory, and its headline, "Insult to our boy's memory", is very much a reflection of local feeling on the issue. As is typical of the Leicester Mercury, it very much reflects the community that it serves.

David Taylor: My hon. Friend's constituency almost neighbours mine. Yes, the Leicester Mercury has an excellent record of campaigning on such tragic events. The Weir family of Donisthorpe in North-West Leicestershire, whose teenage son, a pedestrian, was killed late at night by a lorry driver who died of a heart attack some weeks later, were unable to get to the bottom of the evidence because of the lack of a charge. They will never know precisely and unambiguously what happened, because the inquest procedure was inadequate. They would certainly love to see such an offence on the statute book, although it will do nothing to ease their hurt.

Sir Peter Soulsby: That example—right hon. and hon. Members could no doubt give others—adequately illustrates the gap in the law and, I believe, the overwhelming public support there will be for the provision when the Bill is enacted, as I hope it will be.

To digress, I welcome the Secretary of State's remarks. In addition to strengthening legislation, he drew attention to the need for the courts to take seriously—certainly far more seriously than they appear to do on occasion—the causing of death by driving motor vehicles, whether it is by driving dangerously or, as the Bill provides, by driving carelessly.

I welcome the proposals to toughen the range of penalties for careless driving. I hope that it will be possible in Committee to consider toughening the penalties still further. I know that Callum's parents would agree that the sooner the Bill is enacted and implemented, the better. From the experience of other hon. Members and the examples given, I know that, like me, many people disagree fundamentally with the hon. Members for Forest of Dean and for Epsom and Ewell. There is a need to fill the gap.

Tom Brake: I thank the hon. Gentleman for letting me have the opportunity to put on the record the position of the Liberal Democrats on death by careless driving. I hope he agrees that it should be possible in Committee to provide sufficient clarity for those of us who are not opposed in principle to the offence so that we can support the Government's position.

Sir Peter Soulsby: I welcome that contribution. Concerns can be addressed in Committee. No doubt hon. Members who serve on it will want to return to the subject to ensure that they are.

Callum's death is by no means unique or, I suggest, unusual. It is one of many cases in which justice has been denied to the friends and relatives of those killed by careless drivers. There have been far too many such cases. With some exceptions, the majority of right hon. and hon. Members will agree that we should quickly ensure that his death is one of the last cases when those who are guilty appear to escape proper punishment because of an unacceptable gap in the law.

5.37 pm

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): It is a great pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Leicester, South (Sir Peter Soulsby), who spoke on the very subject that I want to talk about. After five hours of debate, I am glad that we have returned to that important issue. I also very much welcome the agreement between Front-Bench spokesman to move forward so that we find the right law to deal with the problem. The Government should be congratulated on introducing the Bill, but it needs improvement.

I want to talk specifically about what has become known in my constituency as Alexine's law. Alexine's parents and family have taken a close interest in today's proceedings. There is a huge gap in the law between careless driving and causing death by dangerous driving. Let me spell it out: as the law stands, if someone pleads guilty to careless driving, the maximum punishment is a £2,500 fine and discretionary disqualification; the maximum punishment on conviction of causing death by dangerous driving is 14 years' imprisonment, an unlimited fine and mandatory disqualification.

One problem with the current law is that the police and the Crown Prosecution Service are likely to accept a plea of guilty for the offence of careless driving to be sure of a conviction—the very point that the hon. Gentleman made. In many of those cases, they should push for the offence of causing death by dangerous driving. However, that means that more evidence has to be gathered and more work done, and there is a chance that the defendant will be found not guilty. That is why we absolutely need something in between. It is not acceptable for someone to take another's life, even if unintentionally, then plead guilty to careless driving in the knowledge that they will escape with just a fine. Off the record, the police say that the best way to murder someone is with a car, as the penalties are not very high, even if the perpetrator is caught. Such a statement may appear ludicrous in the light of the picture that I have painted but, sadly, it is the truth. I thank the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the hon. Member for Slough (Fiona Mactaggart), for the help that she has provided on the issue of causing death by dangerous driving. She has provided me with informative advice through letters and meetings, and I am grateful. I pay tribute, too, to Brigitte Chaudhry of RoadPeace who, with her colleagues, has worked hard to highlight the gap in the law.

As secretary of the associate parliamentary group for justice for road traffic victims I have met and listened to the victims' families. I have been told of extremely sad and tragic cases in which young people have been killed, yet their killers have escaped with just a small fine because it is easier for the courts to prosecute someone who pleads guilty to careless driving than find the evidence to prosecute someone for causing death by dangerous driving. There are obvious budgetary pressures on the Crown Prosecution Service as well.

I became aware of the huge gap between careless driving and the offence of causing death by dangerous driving when my predecessor, together with our excellent local newspaper, The Evening Telegraph, campaigned for a new law and a new offence of causing death by careless driving. On 7 June 2004, 17-year-old Alexine Melnik was tragically killed in a road traffic accident. Alexine, whose parents live in Rushden in my constituency, had her whole life to look forward to, but it was cut short. The person driving the car that caused the crash pleaded guilty to careless driving. He was given a £500 fine and he kept his licence; 17-year-old Alexine lost her life. Alexine was returning from Great Yarmouth as a passenger in a car travelling on an A road on a hot, sunny afternoon. Her car was hit from behind—both cars were travelling at a speed of about 50 mph—and was knocked into the oncoming traffic. She lost her life, but the driver who caused the crash could not remember what had happened. He had been up since 4.30 am, and many people would conclude that he had fallen asleep at the wheel. There is clearly a case for stronger prosecution in such cases. It is not acceptable for lawyers in the House to say that there are sufficient laws in place, as those laws are not used. There is a gap, and we need to fill it.

Alexine's family has been campaigning since her death for a change in the law so that a new offence of causing death by careless driving that attracts a custodial sentence can be introduced. As I said, the campaign is known locally as Alexine's law in remembrance of Alexine Melnik. If that law is introduced, although it will not bring her back, it will certainly mean that she did not die in vain. Mr. and Mrs. Peter Melnik and their family have campaigned tirelessly to raise the issue, and last March Mr. Melnik gave evidence when the previous Road Safety Bill was in Committee. The dedicated campaigning of the Melnik family and other families across the country who have been sadly affected by the gap in the law has made a genuine difference. It is their hard work, borne out of the tragedies that they have suffered, that has highlighted the issue to the Government and to Parliament. No one who heard Mr. Melnik's evidence could fail to be impressed by his integrity and determination to seek justice for families who have lost loved ones as a result of other people's bad driving. One can only marvel at the courage that Mr. Melnik and his family have shown.

As a result of lobbying by road safety groups and affected families, the Home Office carried out a consultation exercise entitled "Review of Road Traffic Offences Involving Bad Driving". I believe that it is right that the views of the public are sought before elected representatives make decisions. In fact, I have been running a campaign called "Listening to Wellingborough and Rushden" since 2001. I felt that politicians of all parties had become a little arrogant and out of touch, and that they were happier to preach to people than to listen to them.

My campaign seeks the views of local people, groups and organisations, and then campaigns for change on their behalf. As part of the campaign, I contacted many people to make them aware of the Home Office's consultation, and urged them to submit responses in favour of the creation of a new offence of causing death by careless driving.

The response was huge, with people from all political parties supporting a change in the law. In my response to the consultation, I stated that I felt it was imperative that the new offence of causing death by careless driving needed to be created. I also said that people so convicted should face heftier punishment, which should include a prison sentence.

There are two reasons for that, and the first is that a tougher penalty will act as a deterrent. As Mr. Melnick said:

"We have a duty of care to others when we take to the wheel of a care. We cannot wash our hands of that responsibility when things go wrong and the outcome doesn't suit. If we are put through the pain and anguish of a proper and intensive investigation in order to establish . . . an understanding of what happened, I contend most people would consider it to be a minor inconvenience when compared to the trauma and finality of death.

We are a civilised society and one of the cornerstones of it is the value and respect for human life. Just because we drive a car doesn't absolve us of the responsibility to uphold that value."

Secondly, the new penalty will give the victim's family a sense of justice. Although a life cannot be brought back, a small fine imposed by the courts is no justice for a family who have lost a love one because of bad driving. I was pleased when the Minister of State intervened earlier to make it clear that, with this Bill, we are talking about bad driving, not about people who suffer a lapse of concentration or who swerve to avoid a deer in the road. They will not be prosecuted, but at the moment those who drive badly get away almost scot-free.

I have raised this issue on many occasions in Parliament. In my maiden speech, I stated that I would do all in my power to bridge the existing gap in the law. I have addressed two oral questions to the Prime Minister, and several written questions to the Home Secretary. I was very pleased that, as a result of the Home Office consultation and the pressure brought to bear by MPs and the public, including Mr. Melnik, the Government introduced a new offence of causing death by careless driving in the Road Safety Bill.

The provisions of the new law would have given the courts the option of handing down a custodial sentence of up to five years for someone found guilty of causing death by careless driving. That was a major step forward in closing the gap between the offences and the punishments of careless driving and causing death by dangerous driving.

There is well documented opposition to the heftier punishments associated with the new offence. Members of the legal profession have concerns about a custodial sentence because of the issue of intent. There are also concerns that a custodial sentence could be given when a person has committed an unintentional act rather than a deliberate one. Some people say that no one gets into a car with the intention of killing someone, but I believe that the courts should be allowed to decide whether to dole out the maximum penalty on conviction.

It may be that, in most cases, a prison sentence of five years is not appropriate, but we need to give the courts the option of deciding whether it is. They need the widest discretion, after hearing all the facts and evidence. We are always hearing from the judiciary that the Government dictate what they can and cannot do, but this Bill gives us an opportunity to give the courts the option of different punishments.

When the House of Lords considered the Bill, it voted against a custodial sentence being handed out in a magistrates court, but the vote was very close. It was still in favour of the option of a custodial sentence if someone was convicted in a Crown court. I reiterate my belief that we should give both courts the option of different punishments. That includes a custodial sentence to be handed out on conviction. I urge the Government to adopt the right course of action and reverse the decision made in the House of Lords. I believe that the Secretary of State gave that assurance earlier.

I would like the new offence of causing death by careless driving and the maximum sentence of five years' imprisonment to be part of the Bill. My main fear is that if the Bill is left as it stands, people will plead guilty to careless driving in the hope that their case will be heard in a magistrates court, where there is no chance that they will receive a custodial sentence. That would still result in a weakening of the law because defendants would know that if they pleaded guilty to careless driving, they could get off with a punishment that was much less severe than the one that they deserved. Given the tragic and sad stories that I have heard as secretary of the all-party group on road traffic victims, that is just not acceptable. I urge the House to give the courts—both Crown and magistrates—the opportunity to impose a custodial sentence following a conviction for careless driving when a death has occurred.

I congratulate the Government on listening to the concerns of victims of road accidents and the House of Lords on introducing the new offence of causing death by careless driving. The new law needs to be considered in detail in Committee. It is very encouraging that Parliament is working as it should. Both sides have concerns, but want to move things forward. I hope that Alexine's law passes on to the statute book as quickly as possible.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): It is a great pleasure to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone), who has campaigned on road safety since he came to Parliament, following the example of his predecessor. I will turn to his points a little later.

We should remember that in 2004, 3,221 people were killed on the roads—just under nine a day—and there were 280,840 casualties. If that number of people were killed on our railways, aeroplanes or ferries, there would be a national outcry and the issue would take over the press for weeks. If that number of people were killed in Iraq, there would be a similar response. However, that carnage takes places on our streets, outside our homes and in our country lanes and, for some strange reason, there does not seem to be a sense of national anger. The debate has been constructive and this is an instance of when politicians must take a lead and make tough, and sometimes unpopular, decisions in the interests of the whole community.

The Opposition welcome much of the Bill as a genuine attempt to reduce the slaughter on the roads and will take a constructive and, we hope, helpful stance in Committee. Although we extend that broad welcome to the Bill, we feel that it could be improved and will aim to achieve that wherever possible. It could be more imaginative and, in places, tougher. In seeking to achieve that aim, we hold it as profoundly essential that the number of tragedies on the road is reduced. We have heard numerous cases from hon. Members on both sides of the House. Tragedy is an apt word, because behind the crude statistics, human beings are dying, often in horrendous circumstances. That should be no one's fate and we should wish it on no one—and no driver wishes it on anyone.

There was a terrible story last Christmas involving the death of a 16-year-old girl who was thrown from a car that was being driven by her brother when it collided with another vehicle in Oxfordshire. One cannot begin to imagine the grief of the parents who have to live with that every day. In February, three people from one family died after their car came off the road and plunged into a nearby river. Last December, just a mile from that scene, a father and a seven-year-old also died. The local constable Mick McCready said:

"When you have just dragged three people out of a river, you want to find a way of stopping road accidents."

That is what we have been trying to discuss constructively this afternoon.

The problem involves huge numbers of people. The Minister has answered parliamentary questions that I have tabled. In 2004, there were 34.27 million substantive licence holders driving 25.75 million cars, 2.9 million vans and 434,000 lorries between them. It is pertinent to some of the clauses of which we strongly approve that the number of foreign-registered vehicles leaving the UK has rocketed from 671,000 in 1997 to 1,595,000 in 2004.

We welcome measures in the Bill that bear down on serial offenders and some hard core offenders on matters such as driving uninsured vehicles. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous) for his powerful and clearly argued speech on a problem of which I was unaware. I hope that in Committee we and the Minister can agree on amendments that would resolve such an extraordinary problem and that would have the support of a number of police forces.

As the answers to the parliamentary questions showed, the sheer number of drivers and vehicles requires drivers' co-operation and collaboration with the authorities in order to improve road safety. With such large numbers, coercion will not work. I entirely agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) who, in a long and detailed speech, argued that we need flexibility. We wholeheartedly approve of the proposals for flexibility on points, for example.

However, there are profound differences in the way in which we believe road safety should be approached in order to achieve our common objective. In some ways, the Bill is a wasted opportunity. In some respects it does not go far enough, and it fails to take a holistic view of the problem. There should be a change of attitude in the way that we deal with road safety. To achieve the aim of reduced casualties requires a partnership not just between the enforcement agencies and road safety professionals, but with all road users, especially drivers. Road safety should not be an "us" and "them" problem, with one group aspiring to impose duties and obligations on another. It should be a shared enterprise.

That is where parts of the Bill are wrong. It follows a long line of legislation adding to the number of controls imposed on drivers and adding to the penalties. In this context, the vexed question of speed cameras arises. Ten years ago there were 200,000 speeding fines. That number increased to 2 million last year, bringing in more than £114 million. All those revenues should be spent on road safety improvements. Whatever our opinions on the use of speed cameras, they have caused ill-will outside the House and are widely perceived as revenue-raising devices, not road safety devices. By resorting to a combination of draconian law and indiscriminate enforcement, there is a risk that we are losing the hearts and minds of drivers, when we need their co-operation to help improve road safety.

I have seen reports that 1 million drivers have six or more points on their licence. It was very honest of the hon. Member for Glasgow, South (Mr. Harris) to admit that he was one of them. Those drivers are, on the whole, law-abiding, hard-working people trying to go about their daily business, who have been caught. I should declare that my wife gave me a GPS device which tells me where cameras are. Unlike the hon. Gentleman, I am in the happy position of not having any points—touch wood. I believe that the device has made me drive better. Can the Minister clarify that devices that show where cameras are positioned will continue to be allowed?

Dr. Ladyman: Such devices will continue to be perfectly legal. I have one myself.

Mr. Paterson: I am delighted at the cross-party consensus. We agree with the Government that devices that jam detection devices should be banned. We all have detectors in the front of our head. They are called eyes. The more devices there are to tell us where cameras are, the better. We want people to drive at the right speed and within the law.

In 1829, Peel stated:

"Police must secure the willing co-operation of the public in voluntary observance of the law to be able to secure and maintain the respect of the public."

I am worried that we will be at risk of losing respect for the law and voluntary observance if we have too much unfocused regulation. The resort must sometimes be to the stick, but it must also be to the carrot, and there is not much carrot in the Bill.

On the stick, we will seek in Committee to toughen penalties still further. My hon. Friend the Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling) mentioned level crossings. Incredibly, the Shropshire Star has reported that in 2005, as I think he mentioned,

"73 offences were reported involving motorists ignoring the red flashing lights, driving over the crossing, zigzagging across as the barriers are in the process of lowering and even colliding with lowered barriers."

[Mr. Paterson]

Sadly, some of the incidents occurred in Wem, in my constituency. That is completely insane, idiotic and stupid behaviour, and the Opposition will table amendments to toughen up on people who break rules on level crossings.

The hon. Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon) mentioned a terrible hit-and-run tragedy. Again, we will be looking for greater penalties for those who leave the scene of an accident in which an injury has occurred before the emergency services arrive. As my hon. Friend the Member for Epsom and Ewell said, there is currently an incentive for someone who might be over the alcohol limit to drive away from an incident as fast as possible to give himself time to sober up. The hon. Member for Bolton, South-East raised a valid point: we must bring in tougher measures on hit-and-run drivers, who I think form part of the small hardcore that I mentioned earlier.

Careless driving was mentioned by the hon. Members for Northampton, North (Ms Keeble) and for Leicester, South (Sir Peter Soulsby), and by my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough, who has done so much on this matter. He mentioned the terrible case of Alexine Melnik. The Opposition have been open about the fact that we have reservations about clause 20 as it stands, although we welcome clause 33. We will discuss the provisions in detail in Committee. I discussed the concerns briefly with my hon. Friend prior to the debate. As I understand it, in the Alexine Melnik case, the driver—they may or may not have gone to sleep—who drove into the back of the car in which she was a passenger, driving her into the path of an on-coming vehicle, had been up and working since 4.30 that morning.

We will look hard at the problem in coming days and produce our own amendments, but I will be interested to hear the Minister's comments on the following. I have a definition of manslaughter from "Webster's" dictionary:

> "The unlawful killing of a man, either in negligence or incidentally to the commission of some unlawful act, but without specific malice, or upon a sudden excitement of anger."

"Archbold" gives a definition of dangerous driving that has two requirements:

> "The way he drives falls far below what would be expected of a competent and careful driver"

and

> "It would be obvious to a competent and careful driver that driving that way would be dangerous."

As a layman, it seems to me that getting up at 4.30 in the morning and working all day, apparently without a break—I am obviously not au fait with all the details—is not behaviour that conforms to that of a competent and careful driver. I hope that the Minister will comment on whether a route forward might be to look at the laws of manslaughter and dangerous driving and see whether they can be enforced in a more effective manner.

Our concern is that clause 20 as it stands hangs on the effect of the offence. If the person who was struck in an accident was a strong and fit middle-aged man, the incident happened in a town and the ambulance arrived within a few minutes and he was quickly taken to hospital, he could survive. In a rural area such as mine or the Forest of Dean, where an ambulance cannot be expected to attend within minutes—I think that the minimum in my area is 18 minutes—and the person involved is elderly and not terribly fit, exactly the same impact could cause a death. In one case, the circumstances would not lead to prosecution for death by careless driving, and in the other they would. I endorse the comment by my hon. Friend the Member for Epsom and Ewell that we must examine the issue of severe injury.

Dr. Iddon: I have cited the Haque case, which went from arrest on suspicion of manslaughter through the Crown court, where the charge of dangerous driving was dismissed, and ended recently with an acquittal in Chorley magistrates court. I have discussed that matter with the Crown Prosecution Service, which referred to the Kondeh Conteh appeal case. Kondeh Conteh was a man who was found guilty of causing death by dangerous driving and who got off in the Court of Appeal, where it was stated that the case did not meet the threshold for dangerous driving. The definition is difficult to interpret, and the precedent set by such cases has caused problems.

Mr. Paterson: That intervention is helpful. Perhaps we can examine the definition of dangerous driving, which carries a maximum sentence of 14 years, to see whether we can plug that gap. Hon. Members on both sides of the House have raised examples, and there is clearly a problem.

We are concerned in principle that the sentence will depend on the effect of the action, which could be capricious. As I have said, a fit young man hit at 30 mph in a town might survive because of an effective intervention—a doctor or nurse might be nearby or the ambulance might be very quick—but the same impact would kill a person in the country. In such cases, someone will go to jail and someone will not.

Ms Keeble: When a stabbing takes place, the victim might or might not die, which determines what the perpetrator is charged with. We are considering the degree of care exercised in driving and the level of culpability, which is the difference between dangerous driving and careless driving. The problem is that the gap between dangerous driving and minor traffic offences is too great.

Mr. Paterson: I am grateful for that comment, but I am not sure whether the hon. Lady has answered my point. We acknowledge the existence of a problem, which we intend to address. We should probably move on from that point, because we intend to discuss the matter in detail in Committee. If a fit young man were hit by a car in a town as a result of dangerous driving, the impact may not kill them, but if they were hit in the country, where ambulances take longer to arrive, the offence would be triggered.

Ms Keeble: Like the hon. Gentleman, I read that point in the briefing. Whether a person is killed as a result of an offence depends on a series of issues, including their level of health, and the charge is determined by that outcome, so I am not sure whether his point holds.

Mr. Paterson: The hon. Lady probably wants to include serious injuries, too.

Ms Keeble rose—

Mr. Paterson: I will move on, because we will discuss the matter in detail in Committee. We have concerns about clause 20, which we want to discuss, but we acknowledge the existence of the problem and want to find a solution. We are not convinced that clause 20 is right, and we will table amendments that will hopefully lead to a constructive debate in Committee.

The hon. Member for Glasgow, South touched on 20 mph limits. Picking up on the comments by my right hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire, we agree that there should be various speed limits and greater flexibility. I, too, have been impressed by the impact of self-illuminating signs that are triggered by vehicle movement, and I like the suggestion that more of those signs should be erected near schools. It is worth remembering that 70 per cent. of all accidents involving injury occur in urban areas.

Fifty per cent. of deaths and injuries on roads occur on main roads, and many of those accidents are caused by car drivers overtaking lorries and creating head-on collisions. We should like to discuss raising the maximum speed for lorries on unrestricted single carriageway roads from 40 mph to 50 mph. That would lead to serious environmental gains. Moreover, it is ridiculous that modern lorries have to grind along in a lower gear given the new braking and suspension systems. There would be a safety gain because frustrated drivers would not be provoked to overtake at inappropriate moments.

Mr. Tom Harris: Might not that increase the likelihood of accidents? Car drivers will still inevitably want to overtake, but they will be given far less time to do so because the vehicle that they are overtaking is going faster, leaving a much smaller window of opportunity.

Mr. Paterson: There is a sporting chance that the hon. Gentleman will get on to the Committee, and we can discuss this in some detail. I do not agree with him. I think that holding lorries back to 40 mph is frustrating for car drivers. The figures are pretty dramatic. As I said, 50 per cent. of deaths and injuries occur on main roads, and many of those involve head-on collisions.

We are looking to toughen up our amendment on reflective markings. That would be very effective. Forty-five per cent. of all fatalities occur at night. The hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake) referred to the evidence from the University of Darmstadt that 37 per cent. of all side collisions occur because trucks were seen too late. The cost of reflective markings—about £100 to £150—is trivial compared with that of a new truck, which is worth £100,000 to £150,000.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, North (Mr. Scott) mentioned rudimentary first aid training. We are strongly in favour of introducing that in the theory part of the driving test. More than half of all road accident casualties occur before the emergency services arrive, so the actions of bystanders are vital. Research by Hussain and Redmond in 1994 showed that up to 85 per cent. of preventable pre-hospital deaths involve factors such as a blocked airway that could be avoided if people at the scene knew rudimentary first aid. According to the Red Cross, a person with his airway blocked will probably take about four minutes to die. That is far too short a time for an ambulance to arrive. All that one has to do, apparently, is to tilt the person's head backwards, although I am no medic—I would not wish anyone to find me around at the time of an accident.

Drivers under the age of 29 make up more than a third of those involved in accidents, and drivers between the ages of 17 and 20 are six times more likely than a driver over 40 to be involved in a collision that causes injury. It is interesting that some of the new EU countries—Slovakia, Slovenia, Latvia and Estonia—have practical first aid tests as part of the process of learning to drive. We support proposals to make a few simple changes to the theory test that would impart vital life-saving skills and be of real benefit.

My hon. Friend the Member for Forest of Dean (Mr. Harper) made some excellent points about young drivers. The hon. Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Andrew Miller) touched on the good work that is done by the Institute of Advanced Motorists. We would like to discuss the idea of having different tiers of licence and different tests so that there is, in effect, a graduation process. It is somewhat irrational that we allow young people, who have probably taken a few driving lessons and passed their test having had experience only in towns, to be suddenly let loose on motorways, with no limit on the horsepower of the car. As the institute says, there would be real benefits in people continuing to develop their driving skills after passing the basic test. It is well worth pursuing discussions with the insurance industry to see whether that would have a financial bite. As the Secretary of State said, people might be more inclined to take it up if there is a financial gain. We would therefore like to pursue that in Committee.

We are not happy about the way in which the Bill treats training as an alternative to punishment. We believe that that is psychologically wrong. Driving should be perceived as a progression and people should be encouraged to take driving courses voluntarily. The psychology of making it an alternative to punishment is not quite right and we would like to discuss the matter further.

Andrew Miller: The hon. Gentleman may be interested to learn that, in Cheshire, the police have employed such a practice for a long time. Young drivers who experience minor incidents such as small bumps, in which nobody is hurt, and may have been prosecuted for a road traffic offence, are given the option of going on some driving awareness courses. That is a good idea.

Mr. Paterson: That is a helpful intervention. Any sort of training or driving course is a good idea. However, it should not be viewed as a punishment, but a sensible action and a progression from the basic test. It should be like getting scout badges, with the benefit of reduced insurance. However, that is the sort of detail that we could discuss further in Committee. Looking at the clock, I see that I am beginning to run out of road, but I should like to make a couple of other points.

[Mr. Paterson]

The prohibition on the use of hand-held mobile phones while stationary in a traffic jam is absurd and we would like to raise that in Committee. There are safety gains to allowing people to use their phones in such circumstances. For example, a carer for an elderly person or a young child waiting to be picked up at school may need to be contacted or make contact. If the car is stationary with the hand brake on, or if it is in park, I do not understand why the phone should not be used.

Motor cyclists should be allowed to use bus lanes. I do not understand why they would interfere with their function for buses. We would like to probe that in Committee.

We are behind the Government in trying to improve road safety and we will co-operate in every way to introduce sensible and workable provisions. However, we want to improve the Bill. We will try to toughen some aspects and restore the balance in road safety regulation to ensure that ordinary people who happen to drive cars are fully engaged and committed to and co-operative in the urgent and vital task of reducing the carnage on our roads.

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): It is good to follow the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson). From his tone and his description of the way in which Conservative Members will handle the Bill, we can all look forward to an enjoyable and constructive Committee stage. I suspect from the comments this afternoon that we will spend more time in Committee discussing the things that are not in the Bill than those that are. However, we must wait and see.

One day, I may write a book on parliamentary strategy. If I do, I shall dedicate a chapter to the tactics that the Opposition have to adopt when they agree with the Government. It is not the Opposition's job to agree with us or give us an easy ride. Broadly, they have three strategies. The first is the missed opportunity strategy, whereby they accuse us of not doing a pile of things that we could have done. The second is the Trojan horse strategy—suggesting that we intend to do something that we have not included in the Bill. The third is the devil-in-the-detail strategy, whereby they say that they will explore the measure with us in Committee. All three were thoroughly deployed this afternoon. The Liberal Democrats have a fourth strategy, which is to say that every argument has two sides and they agree with both.

Before I deal with specific points, let me start with the comments of the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling). He made some sensible points but appeared to try to build a case that the thrust of the Bill was not where it should be—on the hard-core offender. He gave a series of examples of actions that are clearly against the law now. The problem is not to make them against the law because they are already illegal, but enforcing the law. The Government share the hon. Gentleman's interest in enforcing the law as it stands. We work hard and closely with the police on such issues. When someone is an outlaw, the answer is not to create more law but to catch the outlaw and enforce existing law.

Dr. Ladyman: Let me make a bit of progress. I judge from the mood of the House that people can smell their dinners and that they do not want to be here all night. I shall make some progress before I give way.

The hon. Gentleman also talked about people failing to stop after an accident, but I did not understand whether he was arguing that no law existed in that regard, or that the penalties were insufficient. I can tell him that failing to stop after an accident can already attract a six-month prison sentence, a £5,000 fine, a mandatory endorsement and a discretionary disqualification. It is already a serious offence, and clearly the law has to be enforced.

The hon. Gentleman and several other hon. Members mentioned railway crossings. Several provisions on that matter were put into the Bill in the House of Lords, and we understand their purpose. However, we are not sure that they have really hit the mark or that they are necessary. There is clearly a case for the existing law on who is responsible for making improvements at level crossings to be clarified, and we intend to table amendments to that effect.

However, most of the debate on that subject today was about the punishment for jumping red lights at level crossings. We shall consider those points carefully and discuss them in Committee to see whether there is an issue there. I saw just such an incident a few weeks ago when I was waiting in a traffic queue at a level crossing in my constituency. It was a level crossing with double barriers, but the diagonal single barriers came down first, and someone drove down the outside of the queue of traffic and gambled on being able to cross the line before the second set of barriers came down. That is clearly the kind of idiotic behaviour that the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) described earlier, and the law on that has to be enforced. At the moment, however, the penalties for that kind of behaviour are the same as those for going across a red light anywhere. If we are going to change that penalty, we need to widen the debate and ask whether the penalty for crossing red lights in general are tough enough, rather than limiting the discussion to level crossings. That is something that we shall consider carefully and bottom out in Committee.

The new offence of causing death by careless driving that we want to create was mentioned by my hon. Friends the Members for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon) and for Leicester, South (Sir Peter Soulsby), the hon. Members for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone) and for Forest of Dean (Mr. Harper), and, in particular, my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Ms Keeble), who has campaigned on that issue for many years. The tragic cases outlined by my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East explain more eloquently than I possibly could why we need to create the new offence.

The hon. Member for Wellingborough made particular sense when he described the gap between the present offences of careless driving, which attracts a £2,500 fine and a possible ban—not even a mandatory one—and of dangerous driving, which attracts a mandatory ban, a substantial custodial sentence and other possible penalties that are available to the courts. That gap is clearly too big, and it needs to be filled. We shall have a debate about exactly how we structure that offence and the penalties that should apply, and I hope that the Conservatives will then withdraw any objection that they might have in principle. I hope that they will be convinced that the new provision can work in practice and that they will support us. We will certainly work hard to bottom that out with them in Committee.

The hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake) mentioned a number of issues. He was the first to talk about the Red Cross in regard to first aid, although the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) and one or two others also mentioned it. Let me remind the House that the theory test already includes a series of questions on first aid, so anyone who wants to be sure of passing that test needs to have swotted up on first aid. It is certainly the case that one does not automatically get a question on first aid because questions are chosen randomly from a body of questions available for the test. However, the questions are there, and one has to swot that area of expertise to be sure of passing the test.

Tom Brake: I understand that something like 20 out of about 1,000 questions are on first aid. There is potential for the number of question on first aid to be increased, and we could look to see whether there is a case for adding something about first aid to the hazard perception test.

Dr. Ladyman: I am not sure how one would introduce first aid into the hazard perception test, but I agree with the hon. Gentleman that it would be possible to increase the number of questions in the theory test and therefore increase the chance of getting a question on first aid. I have already put the Driving Standards Agency and the Red Cross together to discuss that possibility. I have also said that if we can find some way of providing training materials, perhaps a DVD on first aid, we will look at ways of distributing it with the theory and hazard test DVDs that we sell through stationers around the country. We charge about £8 for those DVDs, and the theory and hazard tests can be practised on one's computer. I am prepared to look at whether we can distribute some first aid material through that route. However, I am not convinced of the need for a mandatory test.

The hon. Gentleman and others mentioned retro-reflective markings. My officials have given me a note suggesting what to say on that, and, rather injudiciously, they have suggested that on reflective tape I should say that I am reflecting. The clause introduced in the Lords requires the fitting of retro-reflective tape to comply with the United Nations Economic Commission for Europe regulation 104 specifications. We have not yet decided what action will we take in respect of the clause, but such regulatory powers already exist so it is not needed. The use of retro-reflective tape on all road vehicles is already permitted under the Road Vehicles Lighting Regulations 1989, as amended in 2005. We will require it on all new vehicles in the United Kingdom as soon as the European regulatory process will allow us to do so, so we can make progress on this without legislation.

Tom Brake: Will the Minister tell the House what additional information he will receive and how he and his officials will come to a conclusion about whether the Government want to support this clause?

Dr. Ladyman: My view at the moment is that we do not need this legislation. We can already do this on a satisfactory time scale that will not place additional costs on industry. The hon. Gentleman said that the measure would cost only £100 per rig, but if there are million rigs in the country that is an additional cost to industry of £100 million. At the moment, we are double checking whether we need legislation in order to be able to do this on an appropriate time scale.

Mr. Paterson: The amendment that we tabled in the Lords applies to new trucks and rigs. However, the Minister commented that the provision might be contrary to European law. Can he elaborate on that?

Dr. Ladyman: I do not mean that the provision is contrary to European law. My understanding is that this will eventually be mandated by European law. Therefore, if we wait for that to take place there will not be an additional burden on our haulage industry compared with the rest of Europe. We will all be on a competitive, level playing field. However, it may be 2010 before the provision comes in, and that is the issue on which we need to agree.

The right hon. Member for East Yorkshire raised a number of points, including a plea for sympathy for the owners of heritage Bentleys—of which there are not many in the estates of Ramsgate, but I am sure that those of my constituents who have a heritage Bentley tucked away somewhere will be grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. He also referred to British summer time, as did my hon. Friends the Members for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) and for Glasgow, South (Mr. Harris), and one or two other Members. I was surprised to hear so many Scots Members saying that they would be keen to see change in one form or another. We have been quite open about the research that we produced and there is no question but that a change would be of significant road safety benefit, but that is not the only issue to be taken into consideration. There would be difficulties for people in the north and for industry, agriculture and others. We have to be careful about leaping into that morass.

Mr. Greg Knight: May I put two points to the Minister? First, my comments about historic vehicles apply just as much to Morris Minors as to vintage Bentleys. Secondly, on British summer time, will the Minister reflect on whether the Government would be prepared to provide the House with an opportunity on Report for a free vote on the issue?

Dr. Ladyman: No, I cannot promise that. I note the right hon. Gentleman's comments about heritage Morris Minors, but equally that the appropriate example from his constituents' point of view was a Bentley.

[Dr. Ladyman]

My hon. Friend the Member for Stafford mentioned alcohol levels. He is a long-term campaigner on road safety and he made a powerful case, but I am not persuaded that the time is right for a 50 mg limit, because we are not yet enforcing the 80 mg limit properly. The police need to be able to target their fire on serious offenders at the 80 mg limit. Once the enforcement rate is high at that level, there may be an argument for a future Government to reduce the limit to 50 mg, but that time has not yet arrived.

My hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Forest of Dean spoke about young drivers. I am looking into the matter and just this week held a meeting with the Driving Standards Agency to discuss our programme. A few years ago, we consulted widely about young drivers—whether we wanted provisional licensing, or P plates—and the feeling was very much that that was not the way to go. In this country, our strategy has always been that a person should be a fully competent driver to pass the test and obtain their licence. Staged or progressive licensing is not appropriate. Before someone goes on the road, they should be a competent driver and pass the test.

The pass plus programme is a slightly different issue and we need to consider how to incentivise people to participate. We are talking to insurance companies, but even if they gave discounts I am not sure how much that would help, as many young people go on the road for the first time on mum and dad's insurance—the kid will not have an incentive to do pass plus unless they are paying for their insurance from their own pocket. A broader campaign of education, targeting resources on younger drivers, looking into training for younger drivers and working with approved driving instructors to provide young drivers with the necessary experience might be more fruitful lines to explore, and I am talking to the DSA about those ideas.

Hon. Members raised a number of other issues. My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, South and the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire mentioned road humps. However, I have to say that if somebody drives so fast over a road hump that they are injured, I have not the slightest bit of sympathy for them. The road hump would be doing its job by slowing them down. Road humps are always installed in consultation with the emergency services and various designs are available to meet different needs.

My hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mrs. Riordan) spoke about sleep disorders such as tiredness and sleep apnoea. One aspect of being moved from Department to Department is that Ministers' crimes tend to follow them around. When I was a health Minister, my hon. Friend's predecessor initiated a debate on sleep apnoea to which I responded, so I am well aware of the issue. Primary care trusts are responsible for ensuring that services are available for the care of people with sleep disorders. We have launched a prominent campaign, advising all drivers to take at least 10 to 15 minutes' rest every two hours. Only last week I made a pitch to an informal council of transport Ministers in Austria, suggesting that we launch a trans-European campaign on driver tiredness. I think that that would be an appropriate campaign for Europe to focus on.

Both the hon. Member for North Shropshire and my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, South mentioned speed cameras. My hon. Friend wants the cameras to be hidden—painted black—while the hon. Gentleman wants a better partnership with the motorist.

As I told my hon. Friend earlier, the road camera programme is aimed at areas where there is overt enforcement. We want people to know that there is enforcement in those areas, because we want them to control their behaviour at known blackspots. In addition, the police retain all the powers that they have always had to carry out covert enforcement. We encourage them to use those powers. We certainly do not want to legalise devices that would let people know where the police are covertly enforcing speed limits. We do not want radar detectors to be legalised, for example.

Mr. Paterson: Will the Minister give way?

Dr. Ladyman: I will give way briefly, but I want to end my speech after that.

Mr. Paterson: If overt enforcement is intended, would it not be better for the cameras to be painted bright yellow?

Dr. Ladyman: Absolutely—and they are. Not only are they painted bright yellow; we insist that they are placed where people can see them. Not long ago, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made a statement about the way in which we would change the use of cameras and the use of money. That is relevant to the view expressed by the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell that money raised by the cameras should be spent on road safety and similar initiatives.

We have made it quite clear that people should know where the cameras are, and should be able to see them. We will change the way in which speed limits are indicated where enforcement takes place, so that people are clear about the speed at which they ought to be driving.

Mr. Jim Devine (Livingston) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Dr. Ladyman: Very briefly.

Mr. Devine: The police in my area advertise in the local paper where the speed cameras and speed traps will be. Does my hon. Friend think that that is a good idea?

Dr. Ladyman: I am happy for my hon. Friend's local paper to advertise the location of the speed cameras and the areas of enforcement. What I do not think it will have advertised is where the police are undertaking covert surveillance, because the police will not have told the paper where that is happening.

We are not in the business of trapping motorists. We are in the business of trying to create a partnership in which motorists understand that we are serious about enforcement and about their observing speed limits, but equally serious about the need for the limits to be practical. They must understand that we are serious about road safety, and that we are not just after their money.

I believe that my right hon. Friend's statement represented a significant step towards that understanding. I also believe that all road users—whether they are pedestrians, cyclists or motorists; whether they are driving to work or driving for pleasure—will see real benefits in the Bill. As it makes its sedate way towards its Committee stage, I commend it to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time.

ROAD SAFETY BILL [LORDS] (PROGRAMME)

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 83A(6) (Programme motions),

That the following provisions shall apply to the Road Safety Bill [Lords]:

Committal

1. The Bill shall be committed to a Standing Committee.

Proceedings in Standing Committee

2. Proceedings in the Standing Committee shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion on Thursday 20th April 2006.

3. The Standing Committee shall have leave to sit twice on the first day on which it meets.

Consideration and Third Reading

4. Proceedings on consideration shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion one hour before the moment of interruption on the day on which those proceedings are commenced.

5. Proceedings on Third Reading shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion at the moment of interruption on that day.

6. Standing Order No. 83B (Programming committees) shall not apply to proceedings on consideration and Third Reading.

7. Any other proceedings on the Bill (including any proceedings on consideration of any message from the Lords) may be programmed.—[Mr. Alan Campbell.]

Question agreed to.

ROAD SAFETY BILL [LORDS] [MONEY]

Queen's recommendation having been signified—

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 52(1)(a) (Money resolutions and ways and means resolutions in connection with Bills),

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Road Safety Bill [Lords], it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of—

(1) expenditure incurred by the Secretary of State in consequence of the Act; and

(2) any increase attributable to the Act in the sums payable out of money so provided in consequence of any other Act.—[Mr. Alan Campbell.]

Question agreed to.

ROAD SAFETY BILL [LORDS] [WAYS AND MEANS]

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 52(1)(a) (Money resolutions and ways and means resolutions in connection with Bills),

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Road Safety Bill [Lords], it is expedient to authorise—

(1) the making of the provision for financial penalty deposits and provision for imposing fees and charges, and

(2) the making of payments into the Consolidated Fund.—[Mr. Alan Campbell.]

Question agreed to.

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): I propose to put together the Questions on motions 6 and 7.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 118(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation),

Dogs

That the draft Dog Control Orders (Prescribed Offences and Penalties, etc.) Regulations 2006, which were laid before this House on 26th January, be approved.

Environmental Protection

That the draft Environmental Offences (Use of Fixed Penalty Receipts) Regulations 2006, which were laid before this House on 26th January, be approved.—[Mr. Alan Campbell.]

Question agreed to.

EUROPEAN UNION DOCUMENTS

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 119(9) (European Standing Committees),

Competition: Maritime Transport

That this House takes note of European Union Document No. 16106/05 and Addendum 1, Draft Council Regulation repealing Regulation (EEC) No. 4056/86 laying down detailed rules for the application of Articles 85 and 86 to maritime transport, and amending Regulation (EC) No. 1/2003 as regards the extension of its scope to include cabotage and international tramp services; and endorses the Government's intention to support the Commission's proposal to repeal Regulation 4056/86, whilst encouraging the Commission in its ongoing discussions with the liner shipping industry and its customers.—[Mr. Alan Campbell.]

Question agreed to.

PETITIONS

Croft Road-Hay Lane Link

6.40 pm

Anne Snelgrove (South Swindon) (Lab): I have pleasure in presenting a petition signed by 450 residents of Wroughton and Croft roads in my constituency. It expresses opposition to the proposal of a link between Croft road and Hay lane with a tunnel under the M4, which will have a direct connection to junction 16 of the M4. I am grateful to Charmian Spickernell and all those who have worked to collect the signatures and organised protests against the tunnel.

The petition reads:

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your honourable House shall urge the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister to consider the plight of the residents of Wroughton and Croft Road and others in the Borough of Swindon and elsewhere who fear the consequences for traffic and carbon emissions and endeavour to ensure that the alternative route crossing the railway and linking back to Swindon with shorter local journeys and the opportunity for a public transport interchange is now considered.

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound will ever pray &c."

To lie upon the Table.

Train Services (Maidenhead and Twyford to London)

6.41 pm

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead) (Con): I am pleased to present the "save our trains" petition, signed by 786 people in the Maidenhead constituency and others. The petition has 500 signatures that were collected by the Maidenhead Advertiser. I am grateful to it for its support for the "save our trains" campaign. I am also grateful to Angie and Michael Scott, Adam Hale and Emma Hobbs, who all worked to collect signatures for the petition. In addition to those 786 people, 961 petitioners have signed the on-line petition, making a total of 1,747 signatures, against proposed cuts in train services from Maidenhead and Twyford to London.

The petition reads:

The Petition of constituents of Maidenhead and others,

Declares that the Petitioners oppose the proposed cuts in the number of fast and semi-fast trains between London and Maidenhead and Twyford. The Petitioners further declare that the Department of Transport, Network Rail and First Great Western should recognise the importance to local people and local businesses of good transport links for Maidenhead and Twyford.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Department of Transport to recommend that Network Rail and First Great Western abandon the planned cuts in services and reinstate fast and semi-fast services in the December 2006 timetable, thereby ensuring that the Maidenhead area continues to enjoy good train services that benefit local people and local businesses.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Ambulance Services

6.42 pm

Mrs. Janet Dean (Burton) (Lab): I am pleased to present a petition containing 497 signatures from residents of Mayfield and Ellastone in my constituency.

The petition

Declares that the petitioners are concerned by the plans to reorganise ambulance services and believe that they will result in a significant drop in the standards of emergency medical care in their rural part of Staffordshire.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for Health and the Minister of State for Health Services:

1. to guarantee that the high standards of emergency medical care the petitioners enjoy at present will be maintained;

2. to guarantee that community first responders will continue to attend all the types of incidents they attend now without any reduction in the drugs they are allowed to use to help patients or to protect themselves; and

3. to exclude Staffordshire Ambulance Service from the proposed reconfiguration programme until such time as its high standards have been matched across the remainder of the proposed West Central region.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Train Services (London to Bedwyn)

6.43 pm

Mr. Richard Benyon (Newbury) (Con): I present a petition on behalf of rail users in west Berkshire and the Newbury area, who are outraged at the loss of rail services from London to Bedwyn. There are further signatures from people who are alarmed at the congestion that these cuts in rail services will cause in Newbury, Reading, the M4 and beyond.

The petition

Declares that the fast and semi-fast services between London and Bedwyn, which served the stations in between, were a great benefit to local people and businesses.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urges the Secretary of State for Transport to abandon plans for cuts in services between London and Bedwyn.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Terminator Seed Technology

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Alan Campbell.]

6.45 pm

Mr. Anthony Steen (Totnes) (Con): Before I speak on this matter, I want to say what a pleasure it is to see the Minister of State in his place, particularly given his interest in these matters. Putting up a Minister of State in an Adjournment debate also shows that the Government see this as an important matter, so I am very grateful that he is here—[Interruption.] Well, if the hon. Gentleman is not a Minister of State, he jolly well ought to be.

I want to discuss the Government's position on continuing the moratorium on the commercial use and field-testing of terminator seed technology, and what the Minister hopes that the conference of the parties to the convention on biological diversity will achieve when it meets in Brazil on 20 March. The moratorium was agreed in 2000, and there is concern that it will be overturned. If it is amended to permit case-by-case assessment, its very purpose will be in jeopardy.

It may be useful if I explain to the House what terminator technology is. Terminator technology, or varietal genetic use restriction technologies—known as V-GURTs for short—produces seeds that grow into plants that have sterile seeds, often referred to as "suicide seeds". The plant itself appears normal, as do the seeds that it produces, but if planted they would never germinate.

I do not want to be drawn into a debate on genetic modification technology; I want to concentrate exclusively on terminator technology. Of course, GM technology can be used to modify seeds to accomplish many different outcomes, such as higher crop yields, greater disease resistance or drought resistance. An example of the latter is planting in the Sahara crops that do not need much water.

I was one of the first Members of Parliament, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as I am sure you recollect, to raise the issue of GM crops—by way of a debate in this Chamber in July 1998. I was then co-chairman of an all-party group on GM, and I want to make it plain that this very important subject is not the exclusive prerogative of either the Green party or the Liberal Democrats—strangely, I cannot see any of them in their places this evening, such is their concern.

Mr. John Horam (Orpington) (Con): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising this very important topic and I, too, am delighted that the Secretary of State, as I think he is, is in his place—[Interruption.] Oh, well—whoever. We are delighted to have a Minister of such seniority to answer these questions. However, he should be aware that this is not simply an issue for rural areas. Although there are probably only three farms in the whole of Orpington, my constituents are as concerned about this issue as constituents in rural areas are. The people of Orpington fully support my hon. Friend's suggestions.

Mr. Steen: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention; at least I have support on the Conservative Benches. It is worth commenting on the fact that there are no Liberal Democrats here, but I will not dwell on the point any longer, because the House will recognise it as a matter of fact. My hon. Friend is right to say that interest in this issue is not peculiar to the people of south Devon, although many of them are interested in it. It should arouse worldwide interest, and certainly interest in urban seats just outside London. I repeat my gratitude to my hon. Friend for being in his place and for raising that important point.

Terminator technology is just one form of genetic modification, but many believe it to be the most significant development because it alters seeds' fundamental characteristic—their self-reproducing nature. The Government announced on their website on 21 February—when, incidentally, the House was in recess—that > "an application for a GMO (Genetically Modified Organism) incorporating GURTs would be dealt with in the same way as any other GMO."

I believe that to be a wrong assessment. V-GURTs have a unique property. They are not just any type of genetic modification; they have ramifications that could affect the entire planet.

Why would anybody want to introduce terminator technology? There are two possibilities. They may want to prevent the contamination of non-GM crops by GM crops, thus resolving a fundamental concern about GMOs. Or, as most people suggest, the technology is designed to ensure greater profits for seed manufacturers by requiring new seeds to be purchased annually. However, the seed industry should not be painted as the villain in this picture. I have no interest in seed companies—although I might like one, I do not have one—but they are commercial businesses that have a duty to their shareholders and employees to make profits. Their decision-making process should, and largely does, focus on what is in the best interests of the company, rather than any wider audience.

The decisions are taken within a framework of national and international law. Monsanto, the very large company that trades in seeds, has made a welcome decision not to use terminator technology, but the decision on what technology is acceptable is properly the remit of elected representatives in Parliaments such as this, and of Governments. It is Governments' responsibility, not the companies', to determine the appropriate use of innovative and controversial technology.

If terminator technology will prevent GM contamination—that was an issue in my constituency in 1998, when the first GM trials took place outside Totnes and resulted in many people destroying crops and being sent for trial in Plymouth—why do environmental groups not hail it as a great invention? It is partly because so little is known about the precise nature and behaviour of the technology. As Dr. Srinivasan and Professor Thirtle recently said:

> "The nature of interaction of terminator varieties with other crops and species is not known. It remains to be assessed whether terminator varieties are, accidentally or otherwise, capable of rendering the seeds of (adjacent) non-terminator varieties also sterile."

Gene silencing and gene instability could result in the seeds behaving in unexpected and unpredictable ways. Some scientists have speculated that the process will render only 80 to 85 per cent. of the so-called suicide seeds sterile, leaving 15 to 20 per cent. carrying the gene in an inactive form. That clearly poses the danger of the gene spreading into other crops through cross-pollination. It has also been suggested that it would be impossible to ensure that all seeds were treated with the chemical—for example, ethanol—required to switch on the terminator gene. That obviously creates the potential for wide margins of error that could result in the unintended spread of those GM seeds.

In the worst-case scenario, terminator seeds would have more than the intended consequences of producing sterile plants. The technology could leak out and prove much more dangerous than the spread of other types of GM contamination. If the technology proved imperfect and spread, farmers could end up unwittingly planting sterile seeds that would diminish their crop yield, with disastrous consequences. How can we consider lifting the moratorium on that technology, when the evidence is so vague?

Let us suppose that the technology worked perfectly and produced seeds that were always sterile. Should we then give it the go-ahead? Should the Government go to Brazil and say, "Whoopee, we've got the answer—let's go ahead"?

I have no doubt that the Minister is aware that at least 1.4 billion people—nearly double the size of the population of India—mainly in developing countries, currently practice seed saving from one year to the next. That has been practised since crop civilisation began many hundreds of thousands of years ago. It is not only cheaper than buying new seeds every year, but allows the development of regional varieties particularly adopted to local conditions. Obviously, that practice would not be possible if people started out with a suicide seed. The seed collected from the crop would be useless and new ones would be needed.

However, so long as farmers can choose not to buy such seeds, it could be suggested that there is no reason why the market should not determine the commercial success of suicide seeds versus fertile seeds, whether GM or non-GM. Could countries that wish to ignore such technology simply do so? The concern is that if all big multinational seed producers decide to use terminator technology and produce only suicide seeds, there is a real possibility that farmers may not have a choice about whether to buy into that technology in the future. The choice would have gone. The danger is that companies might produce only seeds with agronomic characteristics that also come packaged with a terminator gene. It might be that not only all new seed varieties came packaged with a terminator gene, but seed companies modified all their seeds, so that all existing varieties became terminator seeds—suicide seeds.

It is worth remembering that innovation and development in seed technology are essential if we are to feed the world's rapidly increasing population, which it is estimated will reach 10 billion people in 2070. As Monsignor Bruce Kent said, the train has left the station; there is no way of stopping the population of the globe doubling by 2070. Therefore, we need seed companies to continue with research and development, and they need to be able to recoup their research expenditure from sales.

Terminator technology has been a solution to the weaknesses of patenting law and its enforcement. It is clear therefore that if the moratorium on terminator technology is lifted, those companies will have understandable reasons to make the most of its obvious advantages for profits, particularly if we do not improve patent law. That could well result in the end of the local adaptation of varieties and community-based seed, which would clearly have adverse consequences for biodiversity.

In any case, agriculture is not a precise science, and it is inevitable that terminator seeds and normal seeds might become mixed up over time, particularly on small-scale holdings in developing countries, where land is not clearly separated by substantial fences or hedges. In such circumstances, accidental mixing or physical contamination could easily occur, and it would have devastating consequences if, as a result, the crop was significantly less than what had been planned.

It takes no great stretch of the imagination to envisage the horrendous food shortages and famines that could occur as a result in countries where food is already in high demand. In Africa, 90 per cent. of all seed planted is from farm-saved sources, and the vast majority of farmers are subsistence farmers. Thus those who live at subsistence level are most vulnerable and most at risk. The Kenya Small Scale Farmers Forum said in September 2005:

> "We do not trust regulations or seed companies to ensure that GURTs seeds do not accidentally contaminate or get mixed in with conventional seed, or planted by mistake. But farmers planting sterile seed face disaster and hunger."

For such reasons, many developing countries are vehemently opposed to that technology. A number of African non-governmental organisations released a statement on 2 February 2006, calling for the moratorium to be strongly reaffirmed, if not made concrete in an outright ban. The effect of terminator technology on developing countries is particularly worrying in the light of concerns that even if individual countries decide to ban the use of terminator seeds, the Government's institutions and structures in those countries are often not sufficiently well established to be able to enforce such a ban, and thus it may well creep in by the back door.

It being Seven o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn. —[Mr. Alan Campbell.]

Mr. Steen: In conclusion, I do not believe that terminator technology should be ruled out for ever. We cannot say that. What we do know is that there is insufficient evidence on how the technology would operate in practice, when one takes into account the possibility of gene silencing and gene instability, and cross-pollination if some seeds that carry the gene turn out to be fertile.

As things stand, there is little to recommend the commercial use of so-called suicide seeds when we consider the likely impact on developing countries, which are especially vulnerable to any crop failure. If terminator seeds become mixed up with normal seeds, the scale of the catastrophe could be horrific. Once the technology is let out of Pandora's box, there is no putting it back. We must be more certain of the consequences before we release the genie from the bottle—if the House will excuse the mixed metaphors. We can guess, however, that the consequences could be far-reaching and dramatic. This could be another historic turning point, as significant as the agricultural or industrial revolutions. It could be a major technological change in society and the world.

I urge the Minister to reaffirm the Government's commitment to a precautionary approach and not accept a case-by-case assessment at the meeting tomorrow to determine the EU's position on terminator technology at the conference of the parties to the convention on biological diversity in Brazil later this month. I hope that he can give me a robust reply, because at least his party and mine have shown, by being here, our interest and concern about this new and quite frightening technology.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): I congratulate the hon. Member for Totnes (Mr. Steen) on securing the debate and thank him for the usual generosity and kindness displayed in his introductory remarks. I hope that he and the hon. Member for Orpington (Mr. Horam) will not feel slighted if I disabuse them of the notion that they have either a Minister of State or a Secretary of State to reply to this important debate; I am afraid that they have a mere Under-Secretary. I apologise for the absence of my hon. Friend the Minister for Climate Change and the Environment, who usually speaks on such matters. He is in Brussels at an Environment Council. My fellow Under-Secretary of State also cannot be here, but he will attend the forthcoming conference in Brazil on behalf of the Government.

I listened with great care and interest to the hon. Member for Totnes. He is right to draw attention to the subject in light of the forthcoming meeting on the UN convention. I am grateful to him for giving the Government the opportunity to put one or two things on the record, because there has been misleading reporting in the past week or so in the national press.

Terminator seed technology, which the hon. Gentleman described well, is still at the concept stage. It will not be with us in the foreseeable future. As he acknowledged, the leading biotechnology company Monsanto has said that it has no plans to market terminator seeds. The Government are not aware of any commercial activity in terms of that development anywhere in the world.

As with all new technologies, terminator seeds present both risks and potential benefits, as the hon. Gentleman also acknowledged. Those need to be carefully considered before countries agree to approve them for use. The issue, which he outlined in detail, of farmers saving seed from their harvest to grow the following year is clearly a consideration, for some countries more than others. So, too, is the potential benefit of having the means to reduce the spread of novel genes from genetically modified crops. As for the international position, no country can be forced to accept terminator seeds. The Cartagena protocol on biosafety under the UN convention on biological diversity was developed to ensure that all countries that are signatories to the protocol can make their own decisions about whether to authorise a genetically modified organism for import.

Mr. Steen: That is not quite the point. If the major seed companies that control 80 per cent. of the world's seeds produced only terminator crops, it would not be long before there was nothing else to buy, as there would not be a choice. The question whether or not a country signs up to the protocol is a red herring.

Mr. Bradshaw: It is not entirely a red herring. There are no companies, as I said, that are even thinking about commercialising such seeds. The strength of the countries that have come together under the Cartagena protocol make it very unlikely that the scenario about which the hon. Gentleman is concerned will develop. As I was saying, the protocol takes a strong precautionary approach, which means that countries can decide not to allow imports, even if there is lack of certainty about the extent of possible adverse effects. The protocol allows socio-economic considerations to be factored in.

Mr. Horam: Is the Minister saying that a country must agree to the introduction of the seeds before they can be sold commercially there?

Mr. Bradshaw: That is absolutely right. The Cartagena protocol encourages all parties to share information on potential impacts—socio-economic information as well as scientific, technical, environmental and legal information on genetically modified organisms—which will assist in informed decision-making. There has been talk in the media recently of the moratorium on the use of terminator seeds—indeed, the hon. Member for Totnes referred to it. The House may find it helpful if I read out the decision made at the fifth conference of the parties.

Mr. Steen: There is no point in one African country deciding not to go down that road, as the seed will just blow over its border. That is the problem.

Mr. Bradshaw: That is exactly why it is important that those countries have come together in the protocol. As the hon. Gentleman rightly said, developing countries in particular share common concerns. It may be helpful if I read out the decision, because it has been suggested that there is a moratorium, but that is not quite the position. Paragraph 23 of decision V/5 by the convention on biological diversity recommends that "in the current absence of reliable data on genetic use restriction technologies, without which there is an inadequate basis on which to assess their potential risks, and in accordance with the precautionary approach, products incorporating such technologies should not be approved by Parties for field testing until appropriate scientific data can justify such testing, and for commercial use until appropriate, authorized and strictly controlled scientific assessments with regard to, inter alia, their ecological and socio-economic impacts and any adverse effects for biological diversity, food security and human health have been carried out in a transparent manner and the conditions for their safe and beneficial use validated. In order to enhance the capacity of all countries to address these issues, Parties should widely disseminate information on scientific assessments, including through the clearing-house mechanism, and share their expertise in this regard."

[Mr. Bradshaw]

Later this month, the convention will meet, as the hon. Gentleman said, to consider a progress report by its scientific sub-group before deciding whether a further decision should be made. I am grateful for the opportunity to stress that the UK Government's position has not changed, although misleading press reports have given the impression that it has. We would like to continue with the decision reached by the convention in 2000.

As the hon. Member for Totnes knows, EU legislation is the competent legislation on these matters as far as the UK is concerned, and he was right to point out that it ensures that there are very strict controls on the general use of GMOs. No GMOs can be marketed until they have been approved by a rigorous assessment procedure. Decisions on each GMO are considered separately against a list of criteria laid down in the legislation. Like any GMO, one that makes use of terminator technology would be approved only if the evidence showed that it would not pose an unacceptable risk to human health or the environment.

Like the hon. Member for Totnes, the Government recognise the importance of constantly expanding our understanding of GMOs. To keep abreast of possible developments in that and related areas, we have commissioned a study to review the various technologies that might be used to achieve biological containment of GM or non-GM crops. The study will review the current state of play in the development of GURTs and will be published later this year.

Mr. Steen: So can I tell my constituents that the Government support a continuation of the moratorium in terminator technology seeds? Will the Government argue for that position in Brussels tomorrow, so that the EU will adopt it in Brazil later this month?

Mr. Bradshaw: As I have suggested, it would not be quite right to describe what we have as a moratorium. The situation is a bit more nuanced than that, but the hon. Gentleman is welcome to send the quotation from the 2000 agreement that I have just read to the House. The UK Government's position has not changed, as some in the media have tried to suggest. The hon. Gentleman could tell his constituents that we are maintaining our precautionary approach, but it would not be wholly accurate to say that a moratorium, in the sense that the term is generally understood, was in place.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way, and I congratulate the hon. Member for Totnes (Mr. Steen) on securing this debate. In Brazil, will the UK be negotiating in its own right? Alternatively, will Austria, which holds the EU presidency, be the main negotiator? I should not be unhappy about that, as the Austrians have a fairly robust view of GM, but who will negotiate in Brazil?

Mr. Bradshaw: We will arrive at an agreed EU position, but I do not expect that it will be different from the one that I have just outlined. However, my hon. Friend is right to seek clarification. In all areas where the EU has competence, member states reach an agreed position that is used, on our behalf, in negotiations. My hon. Friend will be at the talks, and I am sure that he will play an active part. He is right that the EU presidency has control of the negotiations, and the same was true when we had the presidency.

Mr. Drew: Although there may be agreement at the Brazil talks about terminator technology, does my hon. Friend agree that, as yet, there is no pan-European agreement in respect of GM?

Mr. Bradshaw: Yes, but there is still an EU policy on GM. The Austrian national policy may have slight differences of nuance when compared with ours, but my hon. Friend knows very well that, in Brazil, the Austrian presidency will represent the EU position, not the Austrian view.

I reassure the hon. Member for Totnes that our independent Advisory Committee on Releases to the Environment produced guidance on best practice in the design of genetically modified plants in 2001. That guidance covers the possible use of GURTs, but it does not endorse any particular GURT technology. It includes an examination of environmental implications, including the possible benefits of technologies to produce sterile seed and to minimise transgene expression, although some of that remains at an early experimental stage. The Committee recognised the concern that exists about GURTs, but it did not discuss the socio-economic and ethical issues in its guidance.

In conclusion, I assure the hon. Member for Totnes and the House that the Government will continue to adopt a precautionary approach to GM crop developments, including any related to terminator seeds and gene use restriction technologies in general. Our clear priority will remain the protection of human health and the environment.

The Secretary of State was asked—

Greenhouse Gas Emissions

1. Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): What mechanisms are in place to monitor the accuracy of published figures of greenhouse gas emissions for measuring progress against climate change targets; and if she will make a statement. [57019]

The Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Margaret Beckett): The figures used to monitor progress towards the UK's climate change targets are published annually in the UK's greenhouse gas inventory. The inventory is subject to annual independent scientific peer review by a team of specialists organised by the secretariat of the UN framework convention on climate change. The inventory also contains internal quality assurance and quality control procedures, in line with international guidance prepared by the intergovernmental panel on climate change.

Mr. Mackay: Has the well publicised row between the Secretary of State's Department and the Department of Trade and Industry, which concerned the measurement of baseline greenhouse gas emissions, been satisfactorily resolved yet?

Margaret Beckett: There is no row. I do not row with my colleagues. If I understood him correctly, the right hon. Gentleman was asking about the baseline emissions, which are a matter for technical assessment and scientific advice.

Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): Does my right hon. Friend recall that my private Member's Bill includes a specific requirement in respect of Government reporting on greenhouse gas emissions that would deal with some of the points raised by the right hon. Member for Bracknell (Mr. Mackay)? Does she agree that one of the best things that he or anyone else concerned with this matter could do would be to be here at 9.30 tomorrow morning to support my Bill? I am glad to say that it enjoys support from the Government and across the House.

Margaret Beckett: I congratulate my hon. Friend, on his Bill and on his sales pitch.

Chris Huhne (Eastleigh) (LD): The data show very clearly that carbon dioxide emissions have increased by 2.9 per cent. since the Government came to power. Moreover, the Secretary of State will know that environmental taxes peaked at 3.6 per cent. of gross domestic product in 1999, according to figures from the Office for National Statistics, but that the latest figures show that they have slipped to 3 per cent. Does she think that there may be some connection between falling environmental taxes, which are now lower as a share of GDP even than when the Government came into office, and the record of failure on emissions?

Margaret Beckett: First, I welcome the hon. Gentleman to his new responsibilities. I am sure that he will find the subject fascinating and enjoyable, as we all do. I do not agree with the basic premise of his question—that $CO_2$ levels have risen because of changes in the impact of taxation. In fact, the rise has much more to do with the impact of fuel prices on the choices of fuel made by power generators. We very much regret that impact and, although the most recent figures suggest that it might not have been as severe between 2003 and 2004 as we had anticipated, we completely accept that we have to get the rise under control. However, I remind the hon. Gentleman of one further fact that undermines the point that he made: all five EU countries whose emissions are lower than they were in 1990 recorded an increase in $CO_2$ emissions in the period to which he referred.

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North) (Lab): In respect of emission reductions, is there any reason to doubt the validity of the 2003 Energy White Paper? It argued that energy efficiency was the safest and cleanest way to manage carbon reductions.

Margaret Beckett: No, I do not think that there is any reason to doubt that judgment. Energy efficiency can be a very powerful tool. For historical reasons of under-investment over many decades in this country, it is available to us to a greater degree than is the case with the many other European countries that up to now have been able to deliver higher levels of energy efficiency. However, my hon. Friend will know that the investment put in by this Government, not least through the warm front programme, means that we are beginning to make inroads in that respect.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth (East Surrey) (Con): Some Opposition Members wish that the Secretary of State would have rather more rows with the DTI. Her Department says that, on current trends, we will cut carbon emissions by 13 per cent. by 2010, but the DTI says that the cut will amount to only 10 per cent. Are DEFRA and the DTI working on different sets of data and predictive models, and which figure is right?

Margaret Beckett: The latest figures predict a cut of about 10 per cent., but the two Departments are not working on different models. Figures and assessments are being revised all the time, as information comes in. I understand why the hon. Gentleman wishes that I would have more rows with my colleagues, but I find that that does not help me to get my own way, which is what I like to do.

Mr. Ainsworth: We are very supportive of the right hon. Lady getting her own way, and hope that she is successful. We know that relations with the DTI are difficult, but how is she getting on with monitoring the accuracy of the data used by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and the Chancellor? Is she aware of research that shows that the ODPM's efforts to predict greenhouse gas emissions from new housing are completely flawed because they are based on data that are 25 years out of date? What discussions did she have with the Treasury about the accuracy of published figures on greenhouse gas emissions before the Chancellor aborted the operating and financial review? That decision has wasted millions of pounds, angered responsible business leaders and underlined yet again that, although she may be serious about climate change, the Government as a whole cannot be trusted on the issue.

Margaret Beckett: With respect, that question muddles together several issues. It is true that the operating and financial review is not going ahead, but there remain requirements on companies to report on environmental standards under other legislation, which is partly why it was decided that there was no need to have two different sets of reasons for reporting. As for the validity of data from other Departments, I understand that the hon. Gentleman's party is now saying that it wants us all to be on the same page and move in the same direction on such issues. That is good, and I welcome that. However, the issue is not the data—whether they are as good as they should be or could be improved—but what we actually do about them. That is something on which I would like to see greater agreement.

Warm Front Scheme

2. Ms Diana R. Johnson (Kingston upon Hull, North) (Lab): If she will make a statement on the development of the warm front scheme. [57020]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Jim Knight): The warm front scheme has assisted more than 1 million households since June 2000 and now provides central heating to all eligible households. It was announced in the 2005 pre-Budget report that an additional £250 million would be made available to the scheme.

Ms Johnson: In view of the steep increases in domestic energy bills, does my hon. Friend agree that a further improvement to the scheme, which would help those most likely to be in fuel poverty, would be to replace the warm front scheme's current maximum grant arrangements with a system based on an average grant? Such a system is already in place in Scotland and it ensures that low income households are not required to make any contribution to the cost of the work in their homes.

Jim Knight: I am grateful for the interest that my hon. Friend shows in the scheme and I note that the warm front scheme has assisted more than 2,785 of her constituents in its present form. The extra money that was announced by the Chancellor in the pre-Budget report will obviously go some way towards alleviating some of the effect of increases in fuel prices, and we continue to review the scheme to ensure that it is working well to achieve our aim of ending fuel poverty.

Jeremy Wright (Rugby and Kenilworth) (Con): Does the Minister accept that there are two problems with the warm front scheme, which prevent it from helping more people in more ways? The first is that the warm front grant is often used to pay for insulation, which should be provided free of charge by energy suppliers under the energy efficiency commitment scheme. The second is that warm front contractors often charge substantially more than other local contractors would—in some cases, more than £1,000 more. Will he look into those two problems and resolve them?

Jim Knight: I can certainly look into those problems, but I would like to pay tribute to the Eaga Partnership, a successful social enterprise that carries out that work for us. I certainly welcome the hon. Gentleman's interest in the scheme, especially as his party, when in government, denied that fuel poverty even existed.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): Does my hon. Friend agree that an extension of the warm front campaign that could link energy from waste with district heating could transform our energy supplies? Is it not time that the Liberal Democrats, Greenpeace and Friends of the Earth realised that the scientific arguments for energy from waste are compelling and stopped their knee-jerk reactions to those important questions? Let us have an energy from waste programme that really works.

Jim Knight: My hon. Friend will know that we are looking at energy from waste as part of our waste review. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister for Climate Change and the Environment will bear those comments in mind.

Mr. Graham Stuart (Beverley and Holderness) (Con): Paul McIntyre, the head of the energy strategy unit, has said:

"On current policies we won't eliminate fuel poverty by 2010."

Does the Minister agree?

Jim Knight: We accept that the 2010 target is an ambitious one, but we obviously welcome the additional £250 million that was pledged by the Chancellor for the 2005–08 period. Those resources will be necessary for us to meet our target, to which we remain committed, of ending fuel poverty for vulnerable households by 2010, and eliminating it for all households by 2016.

Climate Change

3. Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): If she will make a statement on the findings of the intergovernmental panel on climate change.

The Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Margaret Beckett): My Department has accepted the assessments of the intergovernmental panel on climate change as providing the most authoritative picture of climate change. The third assessment report of the IPCC was published in 2001 and has made a most valuable contribution to our understanding of the importance of the issue. The IPCC is undertaking its fourth assessment. The draft reports are currently undergoing peer review and will not be published until 2007.

Tony Lloyd: May I endorse my right hon. Friend's remark that the IPCC produces the most authoritative reports? However, its reports have not been uniformly accepted throughout the world, even though the science that they contain is as good as it can get. We surmise from the leaks of the draft report that my right hon. Friend will have in April that it will be even more dire in its predictions than previous reports, because it will say that there is no upper limit to temperature increases owing to carbon dioxide increases. Does the Minister believe that it will galvanise the whole of the international community, including the United States and countries that opted out of Kyoto, to do something serious about climate change?

Margaret Beckett: My hon. Friend is right to say that the number of those who question the science has diminished dramatically. That can only be a good thing. The new draft report is still undergoing peer review, so this is a delicate time to comment, but over the past year, not least as a result of the efforts of this Government through our G8 and European Union presidencies, even those who may retain some lingering traces of scepticism have accepted that the risks are such that it is wise for them to address those risks. That is why we are seeing more emphasis on adaptation, and not just on reducing emissions, although the two have to go together. As my hon. Friend will know, following the Gleneagles summit and the establishment of the Gleneagles dialogue, there is now a much greater degree of international dialogue, exchange, communication and so on, drawing in all the major economies of the world. We hope that that will provide us with a way forward.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) (Con): Does the Secretary of State agree that an important contribution to addressing the findings of the IPCC would be to reduce greenhouse gas emissions from our power stations by the use of biomass? In that context, could the Secretary of State explain to the House why the value of the renewables obligation certificates now makes it less attractive to use biomass as a co-firing fuel medium in power stations at the very time when research shows that as a biofuel it gives the best return per hectare in carbon dioxide reductions?

Margaret Beckett: The right hon. Gentleman is right to say that there is growing awareness of the value and potential of biomass and of biofuels. The value of the renewables obligation certificates and the issues that go with that are part of what the Government are looking at in the energy review. I am sure that, in his capacity as Chairman of the Select Committee on Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, he will know what other Members may not have fully realised, which is that the European Commission has recently published further observations on the role and importance of biomass and biofuels. There is growing recognition of their potential and a growing will to develop the industries in the European Union.

Mr. Bill Olner (Nuneaton) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the UK space industry plays a tremendous role in providing earth-observing platforms? At what level does her Department talk to the UK space industry on global warming and other matters regarding the planet?

Margaret Beckett: I am not sure what direct contacts we have with the industry, but our scientists draw on a wide range of disciplines and information. They are very much in touch with other scientists and have done a huge amount of observational work with them. Not unusually in this field, we have some of the best scientific expertise anywhere in the world. My hon. Friend may know that our climate change scientists are making the fruits of their work more freely available—for example, in the developing world, to aid in adaptation.

Dr. William McCrea (South Antrim) (DUP): Although I acknowledge the serious nature of the problems of climate change that face us all, the Secretary of State will remember that the five Opposition parties wrote to her offering to work with her Department and the Government to find a united way to face that challenge. Has she accepted that offer?

Margaret Beckett: Yes, I did receive such a letter and I welcomed it, as I have indicated before, because it suggested that all the parties represented in the House accept the science and the targets that the Government have set, which is an important step forward. There are two other things, however. I shall not start ringing bells until I can see that we are in greater agreement about what we should actually do, because there has been a pattern whereby all the concrete actions that the Government have proposed have been one by one opposed by other parties in the House. We have not yet had an opportunity to test whether that has changed. It is a slightly different matter for a Government to engage in dialogue about future policy development than it is for other parties, although I very much hope that their policy decisions are fruitful, and greatly welcome the moves that have been made so far.

Avian Influenza

4. Patrick Mercer (Newark) (Con): What recent assessment she has made of the efficacy of vaccinating poultry against avian influenza. [57022]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): The scientific advice is that the vaccines currently available would not provide the most efficacious way of dealing with a bird flu outbreak. Early identification, containment and eradication are considered the best way of dealing with such an outbreak.

Patrick Mercer: I am most grateful to the Minister for his courteous reply, but in Newark and Retford many poultry farmers and breeders have received conflicting advice, from all sorts of different sources, about whether or not they should vaccinate, yet few of them have received any official guidance from DEFRA. As a result there is complete and utter confusion. Can the Government put an end to it, please?

Mr. Bradshaw: I am sorry if some of the hon. Gentleman's poultry keepers and breeders feel confused. Without more detail, I do not know who is giving them conflicting advice, but the advice from the Government—from the chief scientific adviser, Sir David King, downwards—has been absolutely clear, and that is, as I said in my initial reply, that the vaccines currently available are not considered the most efficacious way of dealing with a disease outbreak.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): Will my hon. Friend clarify the situation in the EU, as there seems to have been a breakdown in the pan-EU approach to avian influenza? Are countries that are vaccinating at present intending to cull later, or do they believe that the vaccinated poultry will be protected?

Mr. Bradshaw: The European Commission has granted limited consent to the Netherlands and France to vaccinate on a pilot basis, in extremely limited circumstances. In the case of France, for example, vaccination is happening in only two of the three regions that applied for it, owing to resistance from the industry and the public. In answer to the second part of my hon. Friend's question, I expect that both the Netherlands and France hope that a vaccination programme might avoid the need to cull in the event of an outbreak, but our advice is that that scenario is extremely unlikely.

Mr. Dan Rogerson (North Cornwall) (LD): Local authorities will inevitably have a key role in tackling any outbreak of avian influenza, so what advice are they being given on how they should advise and protect the public, and what resources will be supplied to enable them to carry out that work?

Mr. Bradshaw: Local authority emergency planning departments are intricately involved in all the discussions and preparations across Government, involving not just our Department but the Department of Health, and local authorities will be involved in the forthcoming contingency exercise. They should be well aware of their roles; the information is available and is given to them, but if the hon. Gentleman has evidence that they are not quite sure what they should do in the event of an outbreak, he should let me know, because there is no excuse for that.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Further to the Minister's observations about the limited vaccination of poultry in France and the Netherlands, will he tell the House what conditions and limits we shall impose on the trade in vaccinated birds and their products from those two countries?

Mr. Bradshaw: The advice from the Food Standards Agency is that there is no problem with the consumption of birds that have been vaccinated. Of course there are restrictions on importing birds from areas in the immediate vicinity of the outbreak in south-east France. Trade controls on avian flu are on a regional basis, from which we could benefit, as we did last year when there was a case of Newcastle disease in this country. Exports were restricted from the area concerned, but it would not be sensible, or in accordance with sound veterinary advice, were we to ban exports on a national basis in the case of AI.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): While I much appreciate the limitations of vaccination, particularly in the short term, what education have we received from countries where vaccination has been practised widely? I refer particularly to countries in Asia where vaccination is given to large numbers of birds. Have we anything to learn? Will the Minister put some information in the public domain so that the public may be reassured?

Mr. Bradshaw: The simple answer is that the lessons are mixed. The hon. Gentleman is right to say that some countries—notably China, where there is a serious problem of endemic AI, both in wild birds and in poultry—have gone down the route of vaccination. Scientific opinion is mixed on whether that is a sensible thing to do. Three other countries in Asia which have not received so much publicity—Malaysia, Japan and South Korea—have all had outbreaks of AI in the past few years. They are all in a region where AI is endemic in wild birds. They have dealt with the problem through containment and eradication. They have not vaccinated. The answer to the hon. Gentleman's question is that the evidence is mixed.

Mr. Russell Brown (Dumfries and Galloway) (Lab): When the first case was confirmed across the channel in France there was great anxiety in the industry in the UK, and even more so because the doom-and-gloom merchants said that cases would arrive on these shores within two or three days. How much contact has my hon. Friend had with his counterparts in the Scottish Executive on this matter?

Mr. Bradshaw: We have worked extremely closely with all of the devolved Administrations. My hon. Friend is right to say that although we should not in any circumstances be complacent about AI, the outbreak in Lyon was some weeks ago and there has been no further geographical spread since then. It is still the only outbreak in poultry in the EU. However, there is no room for complacency. We must remain extremely vigilant. We do, as my hon. Friend requests, work closely with our colleagues in the devolved Administrations.

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire) (Con): I am afraid that there is much confusion in the country. Only last week the Prime Minister said that vaccination is not effective in stopping the spread of the disease, but experience in Hong Kong—a properly validated scientific exercise—has shown that vaccinated birds do not transmit the disease. It appears that we have a Government policy of no vaccination, yet the Government expect an imminent delivery of Nobilis vaccine for use in zoos. At the same time there is increasing doubt about whether other outdoor birds could be housed. We do not want a repeat of what happened during the foot and mouth outbreak, when halfway through the disaster the Government began to consider vaccination. Will the Minister now guarantee that the Government's present policy will not change, or must the uncertainty continue?

Mr. Bradshaw: No, that is a ludicrous suggestion; of course we must be flexible. The evidence must be studied and we must take account of changing circumstances. As the hon. Gentleman well knows, the situation in the poultry industry in Hong Kong is completely different from that in this country, as it is across the channel in the Netherlands. As he has raised what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said last week, I remind him that Sir David King was grossly misrepresented on one broadcast last week about his view of vaccination. It may help the House if I read the brief statement that he issued in response to that. It was that his advice to Government remains "that the disadvantage of using currently available vaccine significantly outweighs any potential benefits."

Clean Neighbourhoods

5. Mr. Siôn Simon (Birmingham, Erdington) (Lab): What information she has collected on the use local councils are making of the powers granted to them in the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Act 2005. [57024]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): There is considerable variation in the performance of local authorities in using their powers to improve the local environment. We intend expanding the local environment quality survey to all local authorities in England, and we will publish the results.

Mr. Simon: I thank the Minister for that answer. Birmingham city council is proving very good at levying fines under the new Act, and proving very bad at chasing up their collection. Given the obvious limited deterrent effect of fines that do not have to be paid, and notwithstanding the notable incompetence and dithering of the Tory-led and Liberal-assisted leadership of Birmingham city council, can my hon. Friend suggest any ways in which councils such as Birmingham might put a bit of substance behind their sound and fury and collect fines rather more effectively than purely vigorously?

Mr. Bradshaw: I hope that they will be partly persuaded by my hon. Friend's intervention. He is quite right to point out that there are huge variations in local authority performance. Some local authorities do not levy any fixed penalty notices at all, whereas others issue hundreds. It is important that local authorities such as his own in Birmingham use the extra powers that the Labour Government have given them to tackle environmental crime—powers, I might add, that were opposed by the Conservative party.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby) (Con): Under the Act do local councils have the power to instruct parked vehicles to switch off their engines? If Westminster city council does not have that power, will the Minister instruct all ministerial drivers in the Government car service to switch off their engines, because they are among the worst offenders in Westminster, polluting the local environment while they wait for their bosses with their engines ticking over?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Jim Knight): Not in our Priuses.

Mr. Bradshaw: Not in our Priuses, indeed. I agree with the hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan). As someone who uses the bicycle as his usual form of transport I, too, am annoyed by motorists who leave their vehicles idling for no reason. Obviously, they may have a reason to do so if they are waiting in cold temperatures for a long time for a Minister who is delayed at a meeting, but I join the hon. Gentleman in urging people not to allow their engines to idle unnecessarily.

Andrew Gwynne (Denton and Reddish) (Lab): The Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Act has indeed introduced a number of substantial powers for local authorities to tackle environmental problems in their areas. One of the main complaints that I hear is about antisocial behaviour and criminal activity in passageways. What progress is being made to allow the introduction of gating orders under the Act, as that would greatly improve my constituents' quality of life?

Mr. Bradshaw: The provisions on gating alleyways to which my hon. Friend refers come into force on 6 April. I hope that his local authority in Denton and Reddish will use them to tackle the problems that he has rightly highlighted.

Meat and Poultry Imports

6. Ann Winterton (Congleton) (Con): What recent developments there have been in Government policy on illegal meat and poultry imports to the UK. [57025]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): Since November, Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs has doubled the number of staff who check passengers, freight and post from H5N1-affected countries. We are also launching publicity campaigns on avian influenza on top of existing campaigns on illegal imports.

Ann Winterton: Avian flu receives a great deal of publicity, but will the Minister reflect on the increasing danger of illegally imported meat and meat products into this country? On average, up to 12 tonnes are imported a year, a percentage of which is infected with foot and mouth, so will he improve considerably defences against those illegal imports? Ten sniffer dogs for 110 points of entry and increased baggage X-ray facilities are simply not good enough. Will he give higher priority to this important issue, which may adversely affect both human and animal health?

Mr. Bradshaw: The hon. Lady is right to say that we should not slacken our guard against other threats because of the high level of vigilance against avian flu.

However, we are not slackening our guard—we have provided £25 million of new money over three years to tackle the problem of illegal imports, and we have vastly increased resources for Customs and Excise, which has improved its checking, as there have been more seizures and prosecutions. There is no such thing as 100 per cent. security, but I am satisfied that we are doing as much as we can with the very generous resources that the Chancellor has made available.

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): Recent estimates suggest that 15 million of the 30 million pheasants reared in this country for shooting are imported from France either as eggs or as young poults. Given the outbreak of H5N1 in France, has the Department undertaken any risk assessment of that trade, which will start in earnest in the next couple of months?

Mr. Bradshaw: Yes indeed, we have done so. The assessment is that there is no risk as long as the pheasants do not come from an area where there has been H5N1 infection. Our vets have written to their French counterparts asking for extra reassurance. If we had to curtail those imports, there would be serious repercussions for our shooting industry, which makes a huge contribution to the economy of rural areas.

Bill Wiggin (Leominster) (Con): The European Food Safety Authority's recent report on foot and mouth disease found that between 1 and 5 per cent. of travellers bring into the EU about 5 kg of animal products from foot and mouth disease-infected areas. The promised meat disposal bins and extra staff do not seem to have materialised. There have been only eight prosecutions, of which one was custodial, since the disease was in Britain. As 97 per cent. of the foot and mouth disease risk is in passenger baggage, why have we only 10 meat detector sniffer dogs to cover the whole UK? Between 2,800 and 17,500 tonnes of illegal meat is imported annually into the EU. How hard is it to train more dogs to sniff out that much meat?

Mr. Bradshaw: There have been nine prosecutions, in fact. We have 10 sniffer dogs—10 more than we had under the Conservative Government. We will soon have 14, which will be 14 more than any other EU country.

Recycling

7. Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North) (Lab): What steps she is taking to ensure that the Government target for 25 per cent. of household waste to be recycled will be met this year. [57026]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): We are confident of meeting our 25 per cent. target for household recycling and composting this year. I congratulate local authorities and the public on their tremendous achievements in trebling recycling and composting since Labour came to power in 1997.

Mr. Allen: I congratulate the Minister and the ministerial team on the great progress that has been made. However, our league position in Europe is probably more akin, sadly, to that of Nottingham Forest, or perhaps even Exeter, than to Chelsea's. Will my hon. Friend consider introducing annual increments in household waste recycling so that we can continue that important task?

Mr. Bradshaw: My hon. Friend is right to highlight both our progress and the fact that we are still a long way behind most other EU countries. I invite him and other Members to study the draft consultation document on the review of our waste strategy, which contains new targets for recycling that are considerably more ambitious than our 2000 targets—up to 50 per cent. by 2020. If we can hit that, it will put us in good company with some of the best performers in the rest of Europe.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): The Minister will be aware that Cherwell is the best-performing district council in the south-east of England for recycling household waste and one of the 10 best in the country, at well over 50 per cent. That has not been particularly difficult, however. If we can get the rest to the level of the best, we can meet the target in a straightforward way. Any hon. Member who would like to see how it is done is welcome to come to Banbury, and I will take them on a tour round the various coloured wheelie bins that have been used so effectively by the district council.

Mr. Bradshaw: I am sure hon. Members can hardly wait. The hon. Gentleman is right, though, and I congratulate his local authority on its performance. He is also right to highlight the huge variation in the performance of local authorities, with some up as high as 50 per cent. plus, as his is, and some down in single figures. That shows that it can be done, and we want the poor performers to learn from the good.

Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend consider that the production of energy from waste is compatible with the recycling targets that he mentioned? Is the suggestion in the waste review that energy from municipal waste might rise from 9 per cent. at present to 27 per cent. by 2020 an aspiration or a target? Has he made an estimate of the energy production capacity that that increase might represent? Does he agree that it would represent the capacity of three or four nuclear power stations, and if he does, will he communicate that idea—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. There were a good three questions there.

Mr. Bradshaw: We do think that energy from waste has a role to play, and think, as do all the green non-governmental organisations, that it is preferable to landfill. The figure in our review document is not a target, but an assessment of where we think we are likely to be, which is considerably higher than we thought in our 2000 review—we thought we would be at 33 per cent. by 2020—because we have done so much better on recycling and expect to do better still.

Biofuels

8. Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney) (Lab): What assessment she has made of the economic viability of using crops for biofuels. [57027]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Jim Knight): Bio-energy has an important role to play in supporting the Government's objectives for improving sustainability, reducing the impact of climate change, farm diversification and supporting rural jobs and areas. We have commissioned a report on the economics of energy crops, and it is expected to be published shortly.

Mr. Blizzard: As my hon. Friend knows, farmers have been asking for further duty reductions to make biofuels competitive with petroleum. With the tripling of the oil price, is biofuel now competitive and can we expect the bioethanol industry to take off? If so, do we have the vehicles to use bioethanol? In Brazil, they have so-called flex vehicles, which run on ethanol and petrol in the same tank.

Jim Knight: As my hon. Friend knows, because he takes such an interest in the issue, the renewable transport fuels obligation to achieve the 5 per cent. target by 2010 is causing the market to react positively. It is worth noting that if farmers grow such crops, they can claim on their land under the single payment scheme and energy aid, which is worth €55 a hectare.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): The Minister will be aware of the vital role played by beet growers in the rural economy in Norfolk, Suffolk and Cambridgeshire. What does he think is the ideal level of duty on biofuels?

Jim Knight: European sugar regulations are being changed, which will allow sugar to qualify for the single payment scheme and energy funding, like other crops. I gather that British Sugar is planning a large development at Wissington to use sugar beet, which will no longer be exported. I look forward to the use of sugar in the production of energy and am sure that the level of duty is perfectly satisfactory, on which, if the Chancellor wants to make an announcement, he will do so.

Dr. Ashok Kumar (Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland) (Lab): On Teesside, Tees Valley Biofuels recently announced that it is building a plant that will create 50 new jobs. Will my hon. Friend congratulate it on being so forward looking? What support and help can it expect from the Government, given the far-reaching nature of its achievement?

Jim Knight: I congratulate Tees Valley Biofuels on its achievement. I hope that it has been one of the beneficiaries of the £66 million in grants that we have given to enable the processing of biomass since 2003.

Water

9. Mr. Shailesh Vara (North-West Cambridgeshire) (Con): If she will make a statement on the current level of water supplies. [57028]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Jim Knight): The present general picture is of below-average river flows across England and Wales. Reservoir levels are normal for this time of year outside the south-east. The Environment Agency has produced a report, "Drought prospects 2006", explaining the likely consequences of a continuing rainfall deficit and recommending action by water companies and the public.

Mr. Vara: Although I welcome improvements in reducing the amount of water leaking from pipes, 3,649 million litres continues to leak every day. What measures are the Government taking to encourage water companies to deal with that problem?

Jim Knight: The effort that the hon. Gentleman has described is principally the responsibility of Ofwat. Significant progress has been made in reducing leakage since the peak in 1994. Most water companies are now at their economic level of leakage, which is the level at which further cutting leakage is more expensive than producing water from another source. Thames Water, which has been the subject of some concern, is now meeting the targets on leakage reduction in its three areas of operation.

Mrs. Sharon Hodgson (Gateshead, East and Washington, West) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend explain the thinking behind the policy on abstraction charges with particular regard to the fairness of water rate payers in the north-east subsidising water rate payers in the south-east?

Jim Knight: My hon. Friend will know that the Environment Agency is responsible for that and is looking into it. I am sure that it will note her comments.

Gregory Barker (Bexhill and Battle) (Con): Although 3 million homes are still under water restrictions from last summer, few people realise that nearly half the water extracted in England goes to serve not homes but large, centralised power stations. What assessment have the Government made of the impact that a far more ambitious policy of renewable decentralised energy would have on our water reserves? What input have DEFRA Ministers had into the current energy review as regards reducing the amount of water extracted by the big generators?

Jim Knight: I have noted with interest what the hon. Gentleman and his right hon. and hon. Friends have been saying about the generation of power from smaller units. It is interesting, and we have some sympathy towards it. The Environment Agency continues carefully to monitor demand for water, and the water companies themselves have a responsibility to plan 25 years ahead to ensure that the supply is there to meet demand. That is why four new reservoirs and three extensions are being planned.

Mr. Roger Gale (North Thanet) (Con): Southern Water is constructing an extension to the sewage treatment plant at Weatherlees in Thanet in order to raise the standard of effluent in east Kent in line with the measures required by the European Union. When that is complete, millions of gallons of virtually potable water will still be pumped daily into the sea at a time when there is a severe water shortage in the south-east. I suspect that that is repeated around the country. What measures is the Department taking to ensure that that practice ceases and that usable water is used for good purpose?

Jim Knight: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising the excellent work done under this Government on improving the quality of water pumped into the sea. Bathing water quality has improved significantly over the past nine years. I will ask my hon. Friend the Minister of State to write to the hon. Gentleman on his specific question about the re-use of water.

Single Farm Payments

10. Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): What representations she has received on the payment of single farm payments in North Yorkshire. [57029]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Jim Knight): The Rural Payments Agency responds to all correspondence relating to the single payment scheme. As the scheme is not administered on a regional basis, it does not hold records on representations specific to North Yorkshire.

Miss McIntosh: Is the Minister aware that not a penny piece has been paid to any North Yorkshire farmer although the Minister promised that the bulk—96 per cent.—would be paid before the end of March? Indeed, that figure has now been reduced to a mere 50 per cent. Is he further aware that Scottish and Welsh farmers have been paid in full, with the perverse and distorting effect that they are outbidding North Yorkshire farmers for the cattle sold in our own marts?

Jim Knight: I have to remind the hon. Lady that today is 9 March. We will pay the bulk of payments by the end of March. I also have to inform her that the Welsh and Scottish Administrations are paying farmers in part, whereas in England we are paying them in full.

Mr. John Grogan (Selby) (Lab): Notwithstanding that answer, does my hon. Friend accept that there is real concern among farmers in North Yorkshire and the rural community about the performance of the Rural Payments Agency? Will he encourage it to be as transparent as possible in providing information on how many validations have been made and to treat sympathetically those farmers who face delays in payment because it has been unable to finalise its digital maps?

Jim Knight: We will certainly want to continue to look sympathetically at that. I have noted the comments made by my hon. Friend and other Members from Yorkshire. We gave farmers a year's notice and promised that we would begin payments in February. We have delivered on that promise despite all the noise we heard in this House and elsewhere suggesting that we would not. We are pretty pleased with that great effort, by which we have managed to deliver on our promise.

Avian Influenza

11. Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): What discussions she has had with devolved Administrations on protecting the UK against an outbreak of avian influenza. [57030]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): Avian influenza is regularly discussed with colleagues in the devolved Administrations. The main legislative controls to protect against an AI outbreak apply throughout the UK.

Mr. Dodds: I thank the Minister. What measures has he discussed with officials of the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development in Northern Ireland, given that Northern Ireland shares a land frontier with the Irish Republic, and have any consultations taken place with the Government of that jurisdiction?

Mr. Bradshaw: Yes, and officials in Northern Ireland work very closely with officials across the border in the Republic to co-ordinate any response to avian flu. Northern Ireland officials had input into our contingency plan, which was most recently updated in December, and they will play a full part in the contingency exercise that we plan to hold next month.

Mrs. Madeleine Moon (Bridgend) (Lab): Has the Minister considered holding discussions with the Association of Local Government Ecologists, whose members are in close daily contact with all the local bird recorders and local communities, to make sure that there is a network of local information and contacts, as that would ensure that local authorities were at the forefront of tackling avian flu if it came to local areas?

Mr. Bradshaw: I am not aware that we have had any specific discussions with local government ecologists, but if we have not, I shall suggest that it sounds like a very good idea.

Batteries (Recycling)

12. Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): Whether further steps are planned to encourage the recycling of batteries. [57031]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): The draft EU batteries directive is likely to be finalised later this year. In anticipation of that, the waste and resources action programme will pilot collection schemes for household batteries in England.

Dr. Pugh: I do not want to accuse the Government of having a recycling strategy and package with batteries not included, but with 600 million going into landfill and only one in 100 household batteries being recycled, is not there a phenomenal amount still to do?

Mr. Bradshaw: Yes.

Climate Change

13. James Duddridge (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): If she will make a statement on the Government's progress in meeting its climate change targets. [57033]

14. Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South) (Lab): What progress has been made by the UK on its Kyoto commitments on greenhouse gas emissions. [57034]

The Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Margaret Beckett): The Government expect to exceed by about 7 percentage points our Kyoto protocol commitment to reduce the UK's greenhouse gas emissions by 12.5 per cent. below 1990 levels by 2008–12. We have today published the UK's demonstrable progress report, which has recently been sent to the secretariat of the United Nation's framework convention on climate change, confirming our progress towards our target. A copy is available on my Department's website.

James Duddridge: I thank the Secretary of State for that reply, but given that Sir David King, the chief scientific adviser, has stated that the 2010, not 2012, target will be "a very tough target" and that longer-term targets are perhaps more critical, what assessment has the Secretary of State made of a 60 per cent. reduction by 2050? Is that now more of an aspirational than an achievable target?

Margaret Beckett: I am talking about the Kyoto targets, which are for greenhouse gases as a whole, whereas I think that the hon. Gentleman's reference to Sir David King may have been about our $CO_2$ targets for 2010 and 2050. They are very tough targets. That is why they were set: there is a great deal to do. In the not-too-distant future, we will publish the climate change review, to which we committed ourselves in 2000, to show how we can get closer to those targets; but of course, no one has yet drawn out the path to 2050. Work is continuing on that, and I can assure the hon. Gentleman that we will keep the House informed of that work.

Mr. Cunningham: Can my right hon. Friend say what the British Government are doing to assist other countries in achieving their climatic targets—for example, with projects, technology and so forth?

Margaret Beckett: My hon. Friend is quite right to suggest that not just the Government but the private sector in the UK can do a great deal to help others. Developing countries do not have such targets, but they can certainly make a substantial contribution towards solving or exacerbating the problem, as the case may be, and now that we have the Kyoto protocol enforced, since the earlier part of this year, there is increasing scope for projects to be developed under the clean development mechanism, whereby sometimes Governments but sometimes private companies can invest in technologies in developing countries to help them towards a low-carbon economy. Indeed, I rather take the view that that may be a big spur towards the transfer of technology, which has been sought as a development goal for so long.

John Hemming (Birmingham, Yardley) (LD): The Secretary of State will be aware that the Kyoto targets do not include emissions from international aviation, which is obviously good news for any Minister who wishes to jet off to international conferences on carbon emissions. However, how will the Secretary of State resolve the discrepancies between her Department and the Department of Trade and Industry over aviation? Unless we repeal the second law of thermodynamics, we cannot have the massive increase in aviation specified in the aviation White Paper and reduce carbon emissions? How will she resolve that discrepancy?

Margaret Beckett: Of course I am aware that aviation is not included. At the time, it was thought to be much too difficult and the belief was that, if people tried to include aviation, the project would never get off the ground—sorry for that. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman knows that, during our EU presidency, we got agreement from the European Commission to consider including aviation in the EU emissions trading scheme. There is what one could call a slightly theoretical commitment from the global aviation organisations that emissions trading is the way to tackle the impact of aviation but no concrete steps have been taken towards that. If we can get the matter agreed in the EU, that would be a hugely powerful step towards global action. As for Ministers travelling to discuss climate change, the hon. Gentleman reminds me of a question that I was asked at a meeting for the Gleneagles dialogue in London. One journalist asked why no Minister had arrived by bike. I explained that it was a little difficult to get here by bike from Latin America.

Waste Incineration

16. Angela Watkinson (Upminster) (Con): If she will make a statement on the Government's policy on the incineration of waste. [57036]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): The Government believe that incineration with energy recovery is a better solution than landfill for residual waste that cannot be reused, recycled or composted.

Angela Watkinson: Most waste collection authorities are doing their best to educate people about the virtues of waste reduction. The Under-Secretary knows about the huge amounts of waste required to feed a hungry incinerator and all the associated lorry movements in transporting that waste from collection to disposal points. Does not he understand that incineration is incompatible with waste reduction?

Mr. Bradshaw: No, it is not necessarily. We must be careful during our review of waste policy that we do not introduce incentives into the system that increase incineration at the cost of recycling. We do not intend to do that. However, there will always be residual waste after recycling, reused to the point of minimisation. For the first time, we reduced waste last year. However, all the other European countries that do much more recycling than we do turn more waste to energy. That is why we envisage having more incinerators but not as many as we believed would be necessary in 2000.

Common Agricultural Policy

18. Martin Linton (Battersea) (Lab): If she will require the Rural Payments Agency to publish payments made under the common agricultural policy single payment scheme on a constituency basis. [57038]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Jim Knight): The Rural Payments Agency published common agriculture policy payment information in 2005, disclosing recipients of payments by geographic location. The RPA will publish single payment scheme payments, probably by the end of September 2006, and is currently reviewing the basis of this publication.

Martin Linton: I hope that my hon. Friend will publish the figures by constituency because it is important for Members of Parliament to know how much is being disbursed in their areas. There is no reason why, having done that, he should not go on to include addresses and postcodes, too. After all, £1.6 billion is currently paid into the bank accounts of farmers and growers, apart from those in North Yorkshire apparently, and I see no reason why people who receive public money should not accept—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We have had 30 seconds of explanation but no question. The hon. Gentleman should ask a question quickly.

Martin Linton: Every other public contractor has to accept public accountability, so why should farmers and growers be different?

Jim Knight: We are capable of disclosing information geographically but have yet to decide whether to do that on a constituency or a postcode basis. We must bear in mind our responsibilities to the individual recipients. It is important for my hon. Friend to know that some of our larger farmers, who are the larger recipients, are some of our more efficient farmers who embrace most readily the reforms that we are making to the common agricultural policy. We should not fall into the trap of simply lambasting some of the most efficient producers in this country.

Cattle Testing

19. Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): If she will make a statement on her plans for pre- and post-movement cattle testing. [57039]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): Pre-movement testing of cattle in England will help to reduce the risk of TB spread. Our intention is to introduce pre-movement testing from 27 March, subject to the findings of the independent review that is currently under way.

Paddy Tipping: Bovine tuberculosis is an increasingly serious and costly problem. The focus so far has been on badger culling, but does the Minister accept that better farm biosecurity has an important role to play in reducing the incidence of the disease?

Mr. Bradshaw: Yes, I would accept that. My hon. Friend is right to complain about the level of the focus in the consultation on badger culling. Many people do not realise, for example, that pre-movement and post-movement testing has already been introduced in Scotland, or that it will now be introduced in England and Wales. All vets and scientists advise that pre-movement testing is a complete no-brainer if we want to get a handle on the disease.

Incinerators

20. Mr. Lee Scott (Ilford, North) (Con): How many new incinerators the Government expect to be built in England by 2020. [57041]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): The number of new incinerators built will depend on the technologies and the scale of facilities chosen by local authorities. The Government estimate that waste to energy of all types will account for about 25 per cent. of our municipal waste by 2020, up from 9 per cent. today but considerably less than was envisaged under our 2000 waste strategy because we have done so well on recycling.

Mr. Scott: Has the Minister had any discussions with the Mayor of London on this vital issue?

Mr. Bradshaw: I have not had any such discussions directly, but I believe that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State had discussions with the Mayor of London recently on a range of matters. Furthermore, as part of the review of the powers of the Mayor and the Greater London authority, my officials regularly discuss whether waste should be included in any extension of those powers.

Business of the House

11.30 am

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead) (Con): Will the Leader of the House give us the business for the coming weeks?

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): The business of the House will be as follows:

MONDAY 13 MARCH—Second Reading of the Northern Ireland (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill, followed by consideration of Lords amendments to the Identity Cards Bill.

TUESDAY 14 MARCH—Remaining stages of the Animal Welfare Bill.

WEDNESDAY 15 MARCH—Second Reading of the Education and Inspections Bill.

THURSDAY 16 MARCH—If necessary, consideration of Lords amendments, followed by consideration of Lords amendments to the Terrorism Bill. Followed by consideration of Lords amendments to the Immigration, Asylum and Nationality Bill.

The House may also be asked to consider any Lords messages which may be received.

FRIDAY 17 MARCH—Private Members' Bills.

The provisional business for the following week will be:

MONDAY 20 MARCH—Estimates [2nd Allotted Day]. There will be a debate on the costs of peacekeeping in Iraq and Afghanistan followed by a debate on deficits in the national health service.

Followed by proceedings on the Consolidated Fund (Appropriation) (No. 2) Bill.

At 10pm the House will be asked to agree all outstanding estimates.

Details will be given in the Official Report.

TUESDAY 21 MARCH—Consideration of Lords amendments.

WEDNESDAY 22 MARCH—My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will open his Budget statement.

THURSDAY 23 MARCH—Continuation of the Budget debate.

FRIDAY 24 MARCH—The House will not be sitting.

[The following is the information: Uncorrected oral and written evidence taken by the Health Committee on 1 and 6 December 2005 (HC 736-i,-ii and-iii), on Public Expenditure Health and Social Services 2005.]

I should also like to inform the House that the business in Westminster Hall for 16 and 23 March will be:

THURSDAY 16 MARCH—A debate on the report from the Quadripartite Committee on strategic export controls.

THURSDAY 23 MARCH—A debate on the participation of young people in democracy.

Mrs. May: I thank the Leader of the House for giving us the business for the next two weeks.

The Government inherited a legacy of falling homelessness, yet there are now more than 120,000 homeless people, up 18 per cent. since 1997, and the number of homeless households in temporary accommodation has gone up 145 per cent. since 1997. Can we have a debate on the Government's failure to tackle the problem of homelessness?

Will the Leader of the House tell us when the Independent Police Complaints Commission report on the shooting of Jean Charles de Menezes will be published?

The right hon. Gentleman will have seen reports that three of the Government's nominations for peerages have been blocked by the House of Lords Appointments Commission. When asked yesterday whether Downing street had leaked this information, the Downing street press spokesman said:

"Give me one good reason why it is in our interests to leak this".

Will the Leader of the House arrange for the Prime Minister to make a statement to the House on the circumstances in which Downing street thinks that it is in its interests to leak confidential information?

I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman agrees that Government Ministers should be accurate in statements to the press. Last week, in a broadcast on the investigation into whether the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport had breached the ministerial code, the right hon. Gentleman said:

"It's the Cabinet Secretary, not a politician, the most senior civil servant deciding that Tessa has not breached the ministerial code."

The right hon. Gentleman was wrong. The Cabinet Secretary established the facts, but it was the Prime Minister—who, as far as I know, is a politician and not just an emissary from God—who said that the code had not been breached. Will the right hon. Gentleman now make a statement correcting his mistake?

Today the chairman of the Committee on Standards in Public Life, Sir Alistair Graham, criticised the Prime Minister for refusing to act on the committee's proposal for an independent body to investigate breaches of the ministerial code, saying that the Prime Minister's failure to act was leading to a "loss of public confidence". We support the proposal for an independent body to review the code, and the Prime Minister's refusal to act cannot continue. Is it not time for the Prime Minister to make a statement to the House on his position, and for a full debate on the ministerial code, so that public confidence in Government can be restored?

Public confidence will not be improved by today's report that the Government plan to restrict the right of Members of Parliament to put questions to Ministers. However inconvenient it is for Ministers, surely the right of Members to question them and hold the Government to account lies at the very heart of our democracy. Will the Leader of the House ensure that there is a debate on his plan to gag MPs?

In a written statement issued in the House on 13 December last year, the Secretary of State for Transport said that letting the Greater Western franchise to First Group would deliver

"an improved service for passengers".—[Official Report, 13 December 2005; Vol. 440, c. 143WS.]

[Mrs. May]

Given that it means cuts in services to Berkshire, Wiltshire and elsewhere, will the Leader of the House arrange for the Secretary of State to come to the House to correct that misleading statement?

In the light of all those issues—Downing street leaks, misleading statements by Ministers, loss of public confidence in the ministerial code, and attempts to gag Members of Parliament—has not the time come for a debate in the House on standards of ministerial conduct?

Mr. Hoon: The right hon. Lady's predecessor had an endearing habit of believing all that he read in the newspapers. I rather hoped that she might address some of the stories that her researchers had culled from the pages of newspapers with a little more scepticism. I shall deal with her specific points in due course, but I think that it would improve the standard and quality of debate in the House if she occasionally viewed some of those stories with a slightly more critical edge that she appears to have applied to them this morning.

The Government have put a huge amount of effort into continuing the process of reducing homelessness in our society. It is a terrible problem, which we have addressed with a series of initiatives. I do not recall that the last Government's efforts produced any particular successes.

The right hon. Lady asked about the publication of the IPPC report. I do not have the information to hand, but I am sure that it can be made available in due course. As for the nomination of peers, the Government have established an independent system to ensure scrutiny of such appointments. I would have much more sympathy for what the right hon. Lady says if from time to time she could point to any evidence whatever that the matter had ever been considered by the last Conservative Government. In fact, they were content to bluster through the issues without ever addressing them as the present Government have.

The Prime Minister has made clear that the only person who decides who is and is not in the Government is the Prime Minister. He has said

"You can't subcontract that decision. That is why I didn't agree with the recommendation and still don't"

—the recommendation for an independent body, that is. I think that that is a complete answer to the right hon. Lady's point.

As for the right hon. Lady's believing what she reads in The Guardian, there are no plans to restrict the right of Members to table parliamentary questions. That is, quite properly, a matter for the Procedure Committee. The right hon. Lady will know that the Committee has looked at the issue in the past, and has made strong recommendations for improvement in the system—not least in view of the considerable increase in the number of parliamentary questions. The Committee has, properly, been extremely concerned not only about the number of questions tabled, but about the manner in which they have been tabled. I recognise that that is the responsibility of the Procedure Committee and it is appropriate that it should be.

As for rural rail transport, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport was in the Chamber yesterday and I am sure that he would have been delighted to deal with that matter had he had the opportunity. Clearly, the Government remain committed to supporting rural rail transport and will continue to do so.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): The Leader of the House will be aware that Standing Committee A today concludes its consideration of the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill—colloquially known as the parliamentary scrutiny (abolition) Bill. Will he ensure that we have at least two days on the Floor of the House for the Report stage of that enormously important Bill to provide an opportunity either for the Government to rewrite it entirely to avoid its being shredded in another place, or for Members to find out why the Government wish to take upon themselves powers that are in excess of those afforded to Henry VIII or the national Government in time of war?

May we have a debate on the United States extradition treaty, which is grossly disproportionate and unbalanced? The American Congress has yet to ratify it. It has found time to ratify extradition treaties with Lithuania, the Marshall Islands, Micronesia and Peru, but apparently not with the United Kingdom.

May we have a debate on the continuation or otherwise of the council tax rebate of £200 that was provided last year? Given that council tax bills have certainly not gone down across the country and I am unaware of pensioners' income going up, why was it necessary to provide that rebate last year—a general election year—and not this year?

The Leader of the House's consideration of future business is bound by very few Standing Orders, but it is bound by Standing Order No. 55, which requires that estimates need to be considered by 18 March. Why, then, are we having estimates on 20 March, thus setting aside the one Standing Order that binds the programme of the House? What on earth do people in his office do other than look at Standing Orders?

Mr. Hoon: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman has come to the House in such a bad mood. He is normally a kind, avuncular and friendly figure. I was about to congratulate him on his reappointment, but perhaps, in the light of his mood, I need to commiserate with him. If he had accepted the advice of the House to stand in the election for leader of his party, he might have got a different job, but, nevertheless, we are pleased to see him back.

There has been a programme motion on the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill, as the hon. Gentleman well knows, and the House has already resolved those matters, but I am sure that that can be looked at afresh if there is a strong feeling that it is necessary.

Obviously, the extradition treaty involves significant negotiation with the United States. That reflects the different constitutional arrangements that exist in the United States. It is well known that the United Kingdom's system of dealing with treaties in general is fairly straightforward. That is not always the case for those countries that have the benefit of a rather more complex written constitution. No doubt the Liberal Democrats will reflect on that when they recommend having complex written constitutions.

Council tax rebate is clearly a matter for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and he will deal with that in due course. As for the business of the House, that is obviously a matter for the House, as I report it to the House regularly.

Mrs. Ann Cryer (Keighley) (Lab): My right hon. Friend has already announced that there will be a debate the week after next on the peacekeeping force in Afghanistan. May we also have a debate on peacekeeping in Iraq? That country seems to be moving towards civil war, with Muslims killing Muslims. Could there be a role for a UN peacekeeping force in Iraq eventually, on the removal of the existing coalition force?

Mr. Hoon: The debate will be concerned with the costs, as is proper, of peacekeeping in both Iraq and Afghanistan. It will be an opportunity for hon. Members to discuss those issues and I am confident that the House will believe that the money for peacekeeping is being well spent and assisting the development of democracy in both Iraq and Afghanistan.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): Will the Leader of the House make time available for a debate on distraction burglary, which is an especially pernicious and evil crime that targets elderly people and is difficult to detect? In agreeing to such a debate, will he support the campaign of the Northamptonshire Evening Telegraph to beat these con men?

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman consistently raises important issues that affect his constituents and, I imagine, other constituencies as well. The matter must be taken extraordinarily seriously given its terrible effects, especially on our elderly community. The appalling behaviour has an impact on not only the people who are directly affected by it because it causes fear among many other people, who might be anxious about answering their doors or going out after dark. I entirely support the efforts of the hon. Gentleman and his local paper to raise that important issue.

Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware that next Wednesday the Law Lords will be asked to decide in the Sylvia Barker case, which is a mesothelioma case, on whether compensation should be denied if a person has spent any period as self-employed and whether it should be reduced if all those who exposed the employee cannot be claimed against? It is likely to cause great indignation if the case is decided against Sylvia Barker. Will my right hon. Friend thus call an immediate debate if the decision goes against her so that the House can decide how to address the indignation that will be caused?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend makes his point very clearly. I have learned from standing at this Box over many years that I should not comment on cases that are still before the courts. However, if he chooses to raise the matter with me after we know the result of the case in the House of Lords, I will be able to respond more fully to him.

Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): Is the Leader of the House aware that even by his patronising standards, his response to my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) about Sir Alistair Graham's report, which was published today, was awful? When the chairman of the Committee on Standards in Public Life makes serious observations to the Prime Minister, he deserves a proper response. He deserves a response from the Dispatch Box next week—will it happen?

Mr. Hoon: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is here every week to answer questions on any subject that hon. and right hon. Members may raise. Of course, he was here yesterday, and if the matter had been a burning issue for Opposition Members, they would have raised it in the way in which the right hon. Member for Bracknell (Mr. Mackay) has done today. The views of the chairman of the Committee on Standards in Public Life on the issue are well known, so the matter is not new and has been before the House on many occasions. If I have misquoted the Prime Minister, clearly I apologise to the House, but I do not believe that I have. This Prime Minister and previous Prime Ministers have made it clear that it is ultimately for them to decide whom to appoint to ministerial office.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): Given what might appear to be a case of someone who has been nominated for a peerage putting pressure on the House of Lords Appointments Commission, would it not be useful for us to have a statement so that we can debate the matter and praise—I would have no hesitation in doing so—the work that we have done to make political donations far more transparent than they were when the Tories were in office, when they absolutely refused to make any change to the law that would have allowed donations to political parties to be made known? At the same time, we could build on the progress that we have made so that the possible link between political donations and getting a peerage or knighthood would become weaker, not stronger. Some of us are rather worried about the current position.

Mr. Hoon: I certainly agree with my hon. Friend's substantive point. The Government have taken clear steps to improve the process of appointment, to make it transparent and to ensure that there is proper supervision of what happens. I do not entirely share his criticism of the discussion that is taking place in one particular case, although I have no detailed information about the case—nor should I. It does not appear to me that an individual is trying to put pressure on the Appointments Commission, but that there is the situation with which we frequently have to deal when such information seeps into the public domain, which cannot be in the interest of the process or the individual in question.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) (Con): The departure from the national health service of Sir Nigel Crisp has raised fresh doubts about the future management of the NHS. It is causing problems to hospital trusts such as the Blackpool, Fylde and Wyre trust, which is faced with ward closures and service cuts. In light of the uncertain situation, will the Leader of the House look to have an early debate on the whole conduct and management of the NHS, so that we might probe with some clarity just how the Government will get out of the mess that they have got themselves into?

Mr. Hoon: The right hon. Gentleman is usually a fair-minded person when it comes to establishing the facts, and I am sure that in the interests of his reputation he would want to add that in Fylde there are 5,400 more nurses, 543 more doctors and 142 more consultants. That is a remarkable record, and one on which I know, if he had a little more opportunity, he would want to congratulate the Government. Having a debate about the astonishing improvement in the health service under this Government is not something that the Government fear at all. We have had a number of debates on the question.

On health service deficits, I have set out the figures before; a tiny number of NHS organisations are responsible for an overwhelming proportion of those deficits. [Interruption.] Right hon. and hon. Members are shaking their heads and groaning, but these are the facts. The truth is that a small number of organisations are involved. I thought that the Conservative party was concerned with financial propriety and with ensuring that organisations balance their books. That is precisely what the Government are trying to do in the health service.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) (Lab): Now that the question of standards in public life is being discussed again by the media, would it not be an idea, if we are to have a debate, to turn our attention to the Register of Members' Interests as well? Now that this has become a great public issue, it is high time that we returned to the idea put forward many times by myself and others: Members of Parliament paid £60,000 a year, which is enough to live on—no one can starve on it—should be stopped from making money on the side. This book has page after page of people with directorships, most of them Tory MPs. If we want a legacy, let it be "One Member of Parliament, one job only". Moonlighting should stop for everybody, especially them.

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend has expressed his point of view very well with his characteristic style, and I enjoyed the way he put it. No doubt, we will have some comments from Opposition Members about their views on this issue.

Nick Harvey (North Devon) (LD): Will the Leader of the House find time for a debate on the draft statutory instrument on the parliamentary pension regulations, on which he has announced a very short timetable for consultation? Does he understand the concern of the trustees that Members of the House should have the same pension options in the new era that begins in April as other members of the public, and in particular our concerns that older Members will not have as much of an option on their right to commute their pension into a lump sum; that the death in service benefit on which, sadly, any Member's family could depend at any moment, will be restricted; and that divorced Members will not get the opportunity to rebuild their benefits that other members of the public will have? In view of that short consultation, could we have a debate so that Members can make their views known?

Mr. Hoon: I certainly appreciate that this is an important issue not only for Members of Parliament but for all pension funds facing the significant changes that the new financial legislation brings into force on 6 April. It is a matter of concern to people up and down the country. The Government have made changes that will encourage people to save for their pension right through their working life, and I recognise the importance of that for Members of Parliament and others. I am certainly willing to discuss the matter with the hon. Gentleman in detail.

Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): I know that my right hon. Friend is aware that there will be a debate in Westminster Hall this afternoon on violence against women to mark international women's day. Can we have a debate on the Floor of the House about equal pay—one of the other major issues facing women in this country today—particularly in the civil service because that is something over which the Government have more control?

Mr. Hoon: I acknowledge the important material about equal pay that was recently published and the fact that there is still some way to go in ensuring equality of remuneration in both the public and the private sector. It is something to which the Government are absolutely committed, which is why we continue to bear down on these discrepancies and will continue to do so.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): May I urge the Leader of the House to have an early debate on the development of so-called head shops, which are selling dangerous but legal alternatives to cannabis and other drugs? Meridian Television has put together a terrific dossier about that. At a time when we have a ban, a shameful ban, on many traditional herbal medicines, many of these substances, some of them newly developed, are legally available and are being openly sold. They provide highs like those associated with cannabis and harder drugs but are still technically within the law.

Mr. Hoon: I know that this is something that the Home Office monitors and regularly reviews. It is vital that the law is upheld. If the hon. Gentleman has examples of specific instances or areas where the law needs to be updated to reflect threats to the health of the public, I hope that he will make them known.

Mr. George Mudie (Leeds, East) (Lab): Yesterday it emerged that the Home Office had agreed a contract with the somewhat controversial property company Mapeley to open 69 high street offices to issue passports. This is work that the Post Office looked to for a future. A fortnight ago the Speaker intervened and forced the Department for Work and Pensions to reveal the contents of its contract on Post Office accounts, which demonstrated that after 2010 pensioners would be forced to use banks. Both those matters threaten the future of 8,500 out of 12,500 post offices. Does the Leader of the House agree that this is a shabby way to treat 4.5 million pensioners, 8,500 sub-postmasters and even Members of this House? Will he use his persuasive powers to bring a Government spokesman here to make a statement on the present policy on the future of the Post Office, or is this—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. The hon. Gentleman has had a generous allocation.

Mr. Hoon: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I think that I have got the drift.

This is a serious issue, and one that the House has addressed not only during business questions in recent weeks but on other occasions. To deal with at least one aspect of what my hon. Friend said, no one is suggesting that people should be forced to use the banks. Indeed, I have been at great pains to emphasise that there is a range of accounts available at the post office, many of them simple and straightforward to use, which bring real benefits to pensioners; for example, interest payments. They should be encouraged to use those accounts, preserving the Post Office and its business. I see no reason to be quite so alarmist about the future of the Post Office. The Government strongly support it, and we continue financially to support the post office network, not least in rural areas. It is something to which the Government are committed.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch) (Con): Does the Leader of the House deny that proposals to curtail the right of hon. Members to ask ordinary written questions have been circulating in Government circles?

Mr. Hoon: I am not going to comment on leaked documents. [HON. MEMBERS: "Ah."] I have made it absolutely clear that this is a matter for the Procedure Committee and, ultimately, for the House. These issues have been debated in the past; for example, by the Procedure Committee and the Modernisation Committee. Serious concern has been expressed by Members of the House about the numbers of questions tabled and, crucially, about the circumstances in which they are tabled. It would be inappropriate not to consider those concerns; otherwise the House will simply allow ever more questions about matters of an ever more routine nature. Indeed, when the matter was last looked at, it seemed clear that many of the questions tabled were of a routine research kind, asking for information that was already in the public domain, and I know that right hon. and hon. Members have expressed concern about that before.

Gwyn Prosser (Dover) (Lab): Yesterday's announcement that the beef ban is to be lifted might have been good news for some farmers, but it was bad news for veal calves and the animal welfare groups that have campaigned to ban live animal exports from Dover? Will my right hon. Friend find time for a debate on the Floor of the House to explore what progress Ministers have made towards ensuring that meat is exported on the hook rather than on the hoof, which is declared Government policy?

Mr. Hoon: I know that that is a long-term ambition of those who rightly campaign to protect animal welfare. The subject has arisen over many years both here and, obviously, in the European Union. The Government take it seriously. I cannot offer my hon. Friend the prospect of an early debate on it, but my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, who has just answered questions, takes a keen interest in such matters.

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East) (DUP): On Monday, we are due to debate the Northern Ireland (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill. It had been the intention of the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland to amend it to add important proposals for the governance of Northern Ireland. Is that still the Government's intention? If it is, can the Leader of the House take it from me that it is not considered an appropriate vehicle to introduce important constitutional proposals? That should be done in primary legislation on the Floor of the House.

Mr. Hoon: I will not get into the detail of that. I urge the hon. Gentleman, his colleagues and others who represent Northern Ireland constituencies to ensure that progress is made and that there are discussions about improving the governance of Northern Ireland. That is what is important. I know that that is vital to the people of Northern Ireland and those whom he represents. I urge him to use his best endeavours to bring that about.

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe) (Lab): May I support the request by the hon. Member for North Devon (Nick Harvey) to discuss the impact of pensions legislation on the parliamentary pension fund in April? I am aware of the correspondence between the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Sir John Butterfill), as chair of the fund's trustees, and the Leader of the House, which goes through a number of the options for changing the rules to the scheme and the complications, which are considerable. May I suggest that it would be appropriate to debate those matters before hon. Members are finally asked to vote on them, so that the trustees and my right hon. Friend get the views of hon. Members on things that could have a serious impact on their future pensions?

Mr. Hoon: I appreciate the concern. I have made it clear that I am willing to discuss that in depth and in detail. As my hon. Friend rightly indicates, and as I have found to my cost, the issues are not simple and straightforward. The complexity of the regulations and the legislation makes me wonder whether it would be entirely appropriate to have a detailed debate. I realise that that is not the best argument, but nevertheless I think that it would be better if we discussed the matter seriously and calmly. I am certainly willing to see him to do that.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): May I warmly support the request by the hon. Member for North Devon (Nick Harvey) relating to parliamentary pensions? It is a critical issue. May I also—this supports the Leader of the House—commend the Procedure Committee's report on parliamentary questions, which sought to remove the abuse of the Order Paper, not to restrict hon. Members from asking genuine and important questions?

[Sir Nicholas Winterton]

However, as the right hon. Gentleman seeks to be a radical, reforming Leader of the House, will he find time to debate critical issues, such as police authority mergers and the restructuring of the health service, in Government time, with substantive motions before the House to be decided on free votes? That would enable hon. Members legitimately and properly to express their views without any influence from Government Whips.

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman was doing so well with his first two observations that I was hoping to be able to say how much I agreed with him, but snatching defeat from the jaws of victory, I recognise that he needed to return to a number of issues that we have debated. I am sure that there will be plenty of opportunity for right hon. and hon. Members to discuss specific proposals for police authority mergers if they are not agreed to by local communities. I know that we will come back to that on a regular basis.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): May we have a debate next week on the guidelines for the provision of stairlifts for elderly people by local authorities? My constituent Vera Cheshire is 78 years of age. She has a colostomy bag, an artificial leg and has lost the use of one of her arms. She has been waiting for 18 months for a stairlift from Liberal-led Leicester city council. Does my right hon. Friend agree that when local authorities fail to discharge their duties, especially to the vulnerable in society, it is important that Ministers intervene and that, at the very least, we should debate such important matters?

Mr. Hoon: As ever, my hon. Friend makes his point, and he does so with considerable force. It is outrageous that anyone should have to wait so long for assistance from their local authority. I am sure that the Liberal Democrat leadership in the House of Commons will look at that as a matter of some urgency.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): Does the Leader of the House not detect the groundswell of support for a debate on the marketplace for honours established by the Government? Is not it the case that 80p out of every £1 of individual donations to the Labour party comes from people who are subsequently ennobled or knighted by the Government? What about the queue of people, like Dr. Patel, at the House of Lords Appointments Commission who are demanding to know where their peerage is? Having given the money, it is a case of cash for no peerage. Do not we need a debate on the debasing of the political process by the Government in a manner that would make Lloyd George blush?

Mr. Hoon: Clearly, my political antennae are not as well attuned as the hon. Gentleman's. I have not detected a great groundswell. He delivered his press release effectively, and we take account of that matter. Again, I am surprised that he has not given credit to the Government for their efforts to ensure that there is a new and independent system of appointment. I commend him to look at the procedure so that he understands it more thoroughly.

Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): May I refer the Leader of the House to early-day motion 1706, about trade union recognition and the attempts by Asda Wal-Mart to break the trade unions in that company?

[That this House notes that Asda Wal-Mart has been fined £850,000 in the United Kingdom for offering employees a pay rise to give up union rights at their depot in Washington Tyne and Wear; congratulates the GMB union on its successful campaign on the legal right to maintain union recognition which is fundamental to society; expresses concern over the role of the Portland public relations company in its attempts to discredit the GMB; and further notes that trade unions play a constructive role in the United Kingdom for employees and employers.]

Will my right hon. Friend advise me how we can use the mechanisms of the House to best get across the message that although American investors are welcome, those who come here with union-busting tactics will be resisted both by the trade unions and by society more generally?

Mr. Hoon: I accept the importance of the rules relating to recognition. The Government have improved those for trade unions. It is right that those who want to join them and achieve appropriate thresholds should be recognised in negotiations with their employer. It is equally important that all employers recognise the law and the relevant rules.

Mr. Graham Stuart (Beverley and Holderness) (Con): Last week, a farmer constituent of mine received a letter from the Rural Payments Agency detailing his single farm payment entitlement. It was accompanied by a 12-page booklet, which explained the terms of the entitlement. He was told that it may or may not be correct, but that contacting the RPA would be a waste of time because it was too busy. Meanwhile, he continues to wait for his entitlement, but has no idea when it will arrive. It has been three years since agriculture was debated in the House in Government time. It is a scandal how farmers are treated in this country. Will the Leader of the House hold a debate on agriculture as soon as possible?

Mr. Hoon: I do not accept the description that the hon. Gentleman uses of the process, not least because for 10 years I represented farmers in Derbyshire. I had regular meetings with them and know how complex the payment system was in those days. I also know how much they complained about the complexity of the arrangements. The purpose of the single farm payment system is to simplify the arrangements. It obviously faced some difficulties in its introduction, but I am confident that the system is better than the one that it replaced.

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North) (Lab): May we find time for a debate on the future of maternity services? The Leader of the House might be aware of the plans by the Greater Manchester strategic health authority to rationalise the number of maternity units. He will not yet be aware of the petition of 30,000 signatures that I have received, objecting to any proposal to close the maternity unit at Fairfield hospital in my constituency. Given the high priority given to patient choice in last year's election manifesto, does he agree that it would be utterly illogical to deny to thousands of women in my constituency the right to attend the hospital of their choice to give birth to their children? Fairfield hospital is that choice. May we debate that?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend has made his point and he is right to the extent that I am not familiar with the particular circumstances of the situation that he describes. I am not going to argue with him about it, but I will ensure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health writes to him setting out in some detail what is happening.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): Yesterday, the Prime Minister stated that nobody has to wait more than six months for their NHS operation, yet at the same time, the Department of Health website showed that many people are still waiting more than six months. Will the Leader of the House grant a debate on the huge difference between the Prime Minister's statements on the NHS and the reality? And by the way, will—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We can do without the "by the way".

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman has made precisely this point already; indeed, I happened to be in the Chamber yesterday when he made it during a point of order. I recognise that he is entitled to repeat it, but I would have appreciated his observations more if he had recognised at the same time that there are 1,500 more nurses, 670 more doctors and 250 more consultants serving his constituents. That is the result of the remarkable extra investment in his constituency and right across the country.

Andrew Gwynne (Denton and Reddish) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will probably not be aware that Liberal Democrat-controlled Stockport council is increasing its council tax by almost 5 per cent., at the same time as making £10 million-worth of cuts in local services, despite having had a year-on-year increase in Government grant. Given that Stockport council has failed to collect more than £7 million in tax since the Liberal Democrats took control, does my right hon. Friend not think it perhaps time to find an opportunity to debate in the House the poor record of some councils in collecting council tax?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend has made his point very well and I am sure that there will be opportunities on the Adjournment or in Westminster Hall for a debate on the difference between what the Liberal Democrats say in the House and what they do in the country.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): Is the Leader of the House aware that in many of our constituencies, shopping centres are being decimated by very high rent inflation, precipitated by upward-only rent agreements enforced by commercial landlords? Will he approach the Government Departments concerned and ask them to produce a statement on the various policy options available to alleviate this problem?

Mr. Hoon: This is an issue of great concern to high streets throughout the country and I am aware of its impact—I see it for myself in my constituency. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer is looking at it carefully, but equally, the hon. Gentleman should recognise that such locations are subject to market forces. If he makes some submissions on how the Liberal Democrats would deal with this issue, I am sure that they will be looked at with great interest.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We must move on.

Royal Irish Regiment (Home Service)

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): Mr. Deputy Speaker, I want today to announce the settlement package for the Royal Irish (Home Service) personnel being discharged as a result of the Northern Ireland normalisation process. I want also to mention that we have completed work on a related issue—the reduction in the number of Royal Armoured Corps and infantry bands within the Army, as part of the overall work on the future Army structure. As a further part of that work, the band of the Royal Irish Regiment will be disbanded by 31 March 2008, and the Territorial Army band in Northern Ireland will be renamed the Royal Irish Regiment Band (TA). Full details have been provided to the House in a written ministerial statement today.

The House will recall that on 1 August 2005, the start of the security normalisation process in Northern Ireland was declared. We said then that, should the security situation remain satisfactory, Operation Banner, under which the military provide support to the Police Service of Northern Ireland, will end on 1 August 2007, and that after that there will be no requirement for the three Royal Irish (Home Service) battalions. However, they will be required to support the police in the 2006 marching season.

I want to take this opportunity to pay tribute to these dedicated and brave men and women, who have contributed so much in bringing us to where we are today. We will never forget that more than 200 Royal Irish (Home Service) and Ulster Defence Regiment personnel made the ultimate sacrifice while serving in Northern Ireland. I know that the day of disbandment will be a sad one for the battalions and for each and every member of the Home Service, but we should take the opportunity to look at how far we have come. They should all be rightly proud of the crucial role that they have played in creating the environment for normalisation to begin, and I offer my thanks for their sacrifice and fortitude.

My Department has been working hard to draw up a settlement package for the military personnel in question, and I am now in a position to provide details of it. In addition to the normal armed forces occupational redundancy and resettlement package, full-time personnel will receive a tax-free, flat-rate ex gratia payment of £28,000. Part-time military personnel will receive a tax-free, flat-rate ex gratia payment of £14,000. These payments are in recognition of the impact that disbandment will have on those serving in the Home Service, and are an acknowledgement of the pressures that they will face on re-integrating into the community.

All full-time soldiers will be offered normal redundancy terms, which include a lump sum, tax-free compensation payment and, for many, early payment of pension. They will also have access to a full resettlement service, including training and a job-finding service. Part-time Home Service personnel will benefit from a job-finding resettlement service. There will be a bespoke Royal Irish after-care service to provide continuing support; it will be accessible by all former members of the Ulster Defence Regiment and of the Royal Irish (Home Service), as well as their dependants. Exact details of the after-care service are, however, still being worked on.

I cannot over-emphasise how eager we are for as many Home Service personnel as possible to take the opportunity to continue their career in the armed forces, where they can carry on making a valuable contribution to defence. Consequently, we are offering an alternative taxable engagement bounty of £10,000 to eligible Royal Irish (Home Service) personnel who wish to transfer into, and are accepted into, the general service Army.

The settlement package will be offered to all Royal Irish (Home Service) officers and soldiers still in service on 31 August 2006. The package has been designed to take into account three factors collectively: first, the pressures and restrictions that members of the Royal Irish (Home Service) faced while serving in their local community, and which are likely to continue to affect them in the immediate aftermath of the regiment's disbandment; secondly, the importance of assisting more than 3,000 of our people as they return to civilian life; and finally, the socio-economic difficulties that they may experience as a result of the regiment's disbandment and their former membership of it.

Resettlement will commence from 1 January 2007. Full-time soldiers will finish their service in tranches spread over a longer period. The majority will leave between 1 January and 31 July 2007, although a very small number of personnel will be required until 31 March 2008, by which time the process will be complete.

The package, which goes well beyond statutory entitlements, is well deserved and we hope that it will be well received by Home Service personnel. To put it in context, I give three typical examples. A 22-year-old full-time Home Service private with four years' service would receive a tax-free lump sum payment of about £38,000. A 34-year-old full-time Home Service corporal with 16 years' service would receive a tax-free lump sum payment of about £85,500 and an immediate pension for life. A 43-year-old full-time major with 22 years' service would receive £152,000 and an immediate pension. Overall, the cost of this package to the Ministry of Defence is in the region of £250 million. Everyone will regard this as a very generous package for a unique set of individuals who have made a substantial contribution to the achievement of normalisation in Northern Ireland. Regimental traditions will be preserved by the 1st Battalion the Royal Irish Regiment and by the Territorial Army element, the Royal Irish Rangers, which will remain an integral part of our defence capability.

The normalisation process will also impact on civilian personnel, and a process of consultation will take place with the trade unions on the civilian redundancies, in accordance with our duties under section 188 of the Trades Unions and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act 1992. Affected civilian staff will be kept informed of progress, but we will not be in a position to make an announcement until later this year.

Consideration is also being given to the formal recognition that should be given to mark the unique circumstances faced by the Royal Irish (Home Service) and its antecedents in providing continuous support to the police in Northern Ireland throughout the counter-terrorism campaign. The regiment has been consulted on that, and its views will be given due weight. I hope to be in a position to make an announcement on the matter later in the year.

I hope that the House will welcome the resettlement package outlined in this statement, and agree with me that it treats the men and women of the Royal Irish (Home Service) fairly and with the dignity and respect that they deserve.

Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): I join the Minister in praising the contribution of the Royal Irish regiment down the years, and especially those components that form the Ulster Defence Regiment. The Opposition recognise the immense sacrifices that they made during their lengthy period of active operations when Northern Ireland was a focus of terrorist violence. Indeed, they have been on operational duty as long as I have been alive.

I am sure that I speak for everyone on both sides of the House when I say how pleased we are with the progress being made towards a just and lasting settlement in Northern Ireland. We hope that the talks succeed, but the ninth report of the Independent Monitoring Commission makes it clear that it is very difficult to predict the nature of the threat to public order. Events in the summer and autumn of 2005 confirm that, and show that the police can be placed in a position where they need reinforcements. They also show the potential for extreme violence, including sectarian violence, to erupt suddenly in the course of rioting, and for that violence to include potentially lethal attacks on the security forces. Therefore, what specific measures does the Minister intend to put in place to ensure that the Army will retain the capacity to react adequately, should the security situation deteriorate? We may hope for the best, but we must plan for the worst.

Given that the Minister has effectively acknowledged that the Army is overstretched, will he reassure the House that the proposed financial arrangements will not act as a disincentive to those wishing to transfer to another regiment? As for the details of the package, we welcome the generous compensation that will be available for our soldiers. They deserve no less.

Finally, I have a question about Army bands. Given the reduction in the number of bands outlined in written statements, is the Minister able to give a commitment on the future of the Corps of Army Music's headquarters at Kneller hall in Twickenham?

Mr. Ingram: On the final question, I shall write to the hon. Gentleman and place my reply in the Library of the House. I thank him for his comments on the role of the Royal Irish (Home Service), and am sure that they are shared across the House.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the potential for ongoing disturbances in Northern Ireland. He will know that overall responsibility for security matters rests with the Chief Constable of Northern Ireland, obviously with the support of other agencies, including the British armed forces. There is no question but that the Chief Constable is entirely happy with the proposals, but his expert judgment also plays a role. If the conditions and flavour of the times were different, we would not have begun the progressive normalisation process that is welcomed by everyone. Army resources will of course be available, if required, and that is also part of the understanding with the Chief Constable.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the disincentive to transfer to other regiments. We have put up the £10,000 bounty to encourage those who wish to transfer to do so, as we are eager for that to happen. Those who do transfer will forgo the other part of the settlement, but I do not believe that to be a disincentive. We are keen for people to transfer, and the bounty on offer is substantial. I met members of the Home Service on deployment in Iraq, and some of them were already beginning to think about their future career in the Army. That is to be welcomed, and I thank the hon. Gentleman for his support for the overall package presented today.

Nick Harvey (North Devon) (LD): I thank the Minister for his statement, and for the notice of it that I was given. I echo the words of tribute that have been paid to the very dedicated and decent people who have done such a demanding job in very difficult circumstances. It is right that they should have a generous package, and I welcome the measures that the Minister has announced today.

I took over the role as my party's spokesman on defence only a relatively small number of hours ago, since when just about every piece of briefing that I have read has referred to staff shortages, recruitment and retention difficulties, and overstretch, especially in the light of forthcoming engagements in Afghanistan. I am therefore sure that the Minister will understand my surprise at waking up on my first morning in my new post to find that we were due to discuss redundancy packages for armed forces personnel.

I especially welcome the £10,000 bounty that the Minister has announced to encourage people to stay in the armed services. I am sure that that is the best option. I would welcome an explanation of the practical measures being taken to encourage a positive response, but I applaud that aspect of the package.

Finally, will the Minister remind the House of the military support that will remain in place for the police in Northern Ireland? As has been noted, there were eruptions of violence last summer and autumn. We hope that they will become things of the past, but it would be complacent to assume that they will.

Mr. Ingram: I welcome the hon. Gentleman to his new role as the Liberal Democrat defence spokesperson, and no doubt we will cross swords over some of the issues to which he referred tangentially in his remarks.

I appreciate that this is the first day in the job for the hon. Gentleman and I assure him that my statement was not deliberately timed to coincide with that. However, given what he said about the way that we use the Army elsewhere, I think that he may have misunderstood the role of the Home Service. It is able to perform its duties only in Northern Ireland. It was established for that purpose, which has of course come to an end as we make progress towards normalisation.

Many of the people in the Home Service have grown up in a military environment, and have a good understanding of what is required. They are well trained, and many of the skills that they have could be used. They would, of course, need to be retrained to become fully functioning members of the regular Army, but we are offering the £10,000 inducement because we want them to join.

We recognise that those in full-time service face a particular problem, and a sizeable number of them may want to take this career opportunity. However, we will define more closely the eventual long-term Army strength in Northern Ireland, and at present expect it to be in the region of 5,000 personnel. That would mean that those who transfer to the regular Army could still have their homes close to the regimental base, even though they would also serve on deployment like any other soldiers.

The package is based on the normalisation process. The hon. Gentleman may wish to make an early visit to Northern Ireland and avail himself of the briefings about what is going on over there. I am sure that he would benefit greatly from doing so, and we will facilitate that as best we can.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): I apologise to my right hon. Friend the Minister for not hearing the beginning of his statement, but I welcome what he has announced. I visited the Royal Irish with the armed forces parliamentary scheme only seven weeks ago, when we were all immensely impressed by the regiment's long history and tradition and by the perceptions of the future that some of the men revealed in conversation with us. They were aware that the decision that has been taken was necessary, and were proud of the fact that they had a role to play in the change that is taking place in Northern Ireland.

Will my right hon. Friend comment on the fact that, although the Army still flies police officers into Crossmaglen, some Army officers think that that may no longer be necessary? When does he hope that it might be possible for a further normalisation of police activities to mean that the intervention of the armed forces is no longer required?

Mr. Ingram: I thank my hon. Friend for his welcome for the announcement, and he makes some very valid points. He asked about the transportation of key personnel into what could be deemed to be some of the more sensitive areas of Northern Ireland. It rests with the Chief Constable to come to a conclusion about when that might be changed, but at all times we must make careful judgments. That is how we have handled matters, quite properly, over the years. We are unquestionably moving forward rapidly, but we have a duty of care to our personnel at all times. We will ensure that it is properly done, on the best advice available, and it will come, ultimately, from the Chief Constable.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): Can the Minister assure the House that everyone who wishes to take the £10,000 will be able to do so?

Mr. Ingram: Well, we could have an embarrassment of riches if that happened. I would like to see that happen, but realistically it will not be the case. Given the shortages in the Army, there will be sufficient vacancies, but it is not only a case of people wishing to take the £10,000. We have to ask whether they are suitable or appropriate for transfer. Age and other factors will come into consideration.

Lady Hermon (North Down) (UUP): While I welcome the financial settlements that will enable the courageous men and women of the home battalions of the RIR to leave with dignity, I was bitterly disappointed that the statement made no mention of a fund equivalent to the police fund, which rightly supports the widows and families of police officers who were murdered or maimed by terrorist activity. The Minister knows perfectly well that members of the UDR and, latterly, the RIR have been murdered and maimed alongside RUC personnel in the same terrorist attacks. Will he give me a commitment today, without any hesitation, that the MOD will set up a fund equivalent to the police fund?

Mr. Ingram: I well understand the hon. Lady's concern. I mentioned the after-care package in the statement and I am considering the precise elements of the various funds that exist to support those who served in the RUC and the Police Service of Northern Ireland. As the hon. Lady knows better than I, there are several funds, and she mentioned one in particular. I wish to ensure that our after-care package matches that. It may take a different form, because of the different circumstances, but the principles will be the same. That is why I said that the after-care package will be carefully analysed: I do not want to find that we have a discord between two equivalent groups of people who stood together shoulder to shoulder. In many ways, it will best be achieved through the regimental process and letting the Army look after its own. It is the Army family, after all. I take on board the hon. Lady's point, and if the provision does not meet her requirements, I am sure that she will make her views very strongly known.

Rev. Ian Paisley (North Antrim) (DUP): I apologise for being a few minutes late due to circumstances over which I had no control.

This is a day of shadows for Northern Ireland, because any lessening of the link with the United Kingdom is always looked on with suspicion by Unionists, who are as determined as ever to remain part of the Union. Moreover, the majority of the people of Northern Ireland for whom I speak do not believe that this is a time at which any of our defences against the terrorists should be removed. However, a decision has been made to do away with the Home Service of the Royal Irish. Does the Minister agree that the sacrifices of the Home Service can never be adequately compensated, especially taking into consideration that the members who lived at home had those homes and their families targeted as a result? The price of their life's blood, which many of them sacrificed, cannot be valued. Therefore, does he agree that the enhancement payments are not an attempt to put a price on the sacrifices made by those gallant men and should not be regarded in that way?

I am sure that the Minister will agree with my colleagues and me that we put to him, the Secretary of State for Defence and the Prime Minister as strong a case as we could, based on comparative equality with payments made to the RUC and to prison officers. I must put on the record our thanks to him, the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister for all their help on the matter, for the way that they listened to the tough talking from the Ulster Members and for doing their best to help us. I am personally glad that the social and economic difficulties that those men have to face in gaining employment in Northern Ireland are recognised by the Government, and we will of course have ongoing talks on those matters.

I thank the Minister especially for his tribute to the sacrifice and fortitude of those men. They deserve all our gratitude. We salute today the memory of the gallant dead of the regiment and the bravery of all who fought the good fight, and we wish their families God's richest blessing.

Mr. Ingram: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his thanks for the way in which we have approached this issue. He is right to say that he and his colleagues made representations, as did the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon). The views that were expressed helped us to reach a greater appreciation, if that were necessary, of the need to do the correct and proper thing to mark the contributions and sacrifices made by those who served in the regiment and its battalions, and their antecedents.

The right hon. Gentleman is correct to say that the proposals are not about putting a price on sacrifice. We have had to consider a resettlement, knowing that there will be significant difficulties for those who are trying to get back into normal civilian life. We have to set a level, and we now have a substantial package, which is why I gave some examples. I hope that people realise that we are treating the issue seriously. It is a measure of the recognition of the difficulties that some of those brave men and women may face in settling back into civilian life. I hope that the normalisation process will continue apace—we are seeing good progress—because that will help everyone in Northern Ireland get back to normal. That is what the Government want and I know that the right hon. Gentleman and his colleagues want it too.

Mr. Jeffrey M. Donaldson (Lagan Valley) (DUP): I echo the words of my right hon. Friend the Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley). Having served in the UDR alongside some of my hon. Friends, it is with great pride that I reflect on the contribution that it has made to securing progress in Northern Ireland and protecting all of the community. We salute the sacrifices that have been made to help us to move towards what we hope will be a lasting peace.

Will the Minister look carefully at the nature and timing of the redundancies? In particular, will he make every effort to ensure that the members, both part-time and full-time, are accommodated when it comes to the timing of their redundancies? Where possible, that should be done on a voluntary basis, and I know that many of the soldiers will be willing to co-operate. I hope that no soldier will be put in the position of being forced to leave if he wishes to remain until the very end. Many of those soldiers, especially the part-time ones, have served in the regiment for more than 35 years. They were there at the beginning, and it is only fair to their honour and dignity that they should be there at the end if that is their wish. I hope that the Minister will find a way to accommodate those part-time and full-time soldiers who wish to remain to end, as well as those who wish to leave earlier on a voluntary basis.

Mr. Ingram: I thank the hon. Gentleman for the service he gave as a member of the UDR. He made strong and trenchant points about the role of the UDR and the Royal Irish (Home Service); there is no one better placed to do that. The hon. Gentleman raised issues about the phasing and tranching of the redundancies. Clearly, we have to have some structure. The bulk of the full-timers will go by the earlier date that I indicated in my statement. This has to be managed in a progressive way. We will try to be sensitive to the wishes of individuals at all times, but we have to meet the commitments to try to reduce the numbers as we go forward. In addition, there are operational needs because the 2006 marching season is still to be faced.

The part-timers have made representations to me on this, and the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) has highlighted the sensitivity of this issue. The difficulty is that if everyone wishes to remain in until the very end, that will not be until 2008 and it is not practicable. I do not think that any other date would make it easier. I will take this matter away and reflect on it, as we have done throughout the process, but I am setting out the difficulties. One of the ways in which we are seeking to address the desire of people to be there when, effectively, the flag comes down, is to have a ceremony, which we are planning for later this year so that the bulk of those affected will still be in service. The final arrangements have not been made and a number of processes remain to be gone through, but we are planning something later in the year. I mentioned this in my statement and will make an announcement in due course. We are trying to be as sensitive as possible and I will take on board the point that has been made.

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): I echo other Members in paying tribute to the Home Service battalions and to the Ulster Defence Regiment. They did a difficult job very bravely in tough circumstances. I shall ask the Defence Minister a defence-related question. Given the pressure on the regular and Territorial Army and the problems of overstretch, particularly in the infantry, did Ministers consider attempting to re-role these three battalions either as regular soldiers or as Territorial Army battalions, which have traditionally never been involved in the security situation in Northern Ireland? That would have allowed them to continue as formed units and make an active contribution to the defence of the realm. At a time when we have lost far too many infantry battalions, why are we now prepared to stand by and lose three more? It seems to make no sense.

Mr. Ingram: It does make sense, but before I retort in my usual way to some of the issues to which the hon. Gentleman pointedly referred, I thank him for his earlier comments. There was a request and issues were raised about the possibility of retaining incremental companies. The Army looked at that possibility and rejected it. It was not rejected as a result of some political overlay. The Army did not believe it to be the appropriate way forward. We have taken best military advice on this.

[Mr. Ingram]

I point to the £10,000 bounty, which is very considerable. For many of these soldiers, the transition from what they are currently doing to the regular Army would not be difficult. There would have to be retraining, there would be issues associated with full evac and the future Army lay-down in Northern Ireland—a garrison 5,000-strong is planned—would have to be borne in mind. Therefore, there could be many of the elements for which the hon. Gentleman is asking.

The hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack) asked whether everyone who applies will get their wish. That will depend on the factors at the time, but we could effectively have what the hon. Gentleman is asking for if those people make that choice. There is nothing to stop them doing so, and, if they wish, many hundreds could do what the hon. Gentleman wants to see happen.

Mr. Ben Wallace (Lancaster and Wyre) (Con): I wish to place on record my salute to members of the Royal Irish Regiment, formerly the Ulster Defence Regiment, whom I served alongside in Northern Ireland for a number of years. They were some of the bravest members of the security forces and, unlike many regulars, they went home at the end of their patrols and lived in the community, often in danger. What measures will be put in place to protect individuals who live in very republican communities, often in rural areas, for whom danger will go on after their regiment has been disbanded?

Will any of these people remain in the reserve? The ninth Independent Monitoring Commission report stated that although the situation is heading towards normalisation, it is volatile. If these people remain in the reserve, there would be an asset to take advantage of in the future.

There is also the element of cost. We know that the MOD is strapped for cash and is facing many commitments. What discussions has the Minister had with the Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, his hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Woodward)? What assistance has he had from that Department, or other Government Departments, to pay the £25 million so that we do not see reductions in armed services elsewhere as a result of this generous offer?

Mr. Ingram: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his service in the armed forces and the role that he played as an individual soldier in getting us to this position of normalisation.

We are not strapped for cash. We have had a very significant settlement. The demands are unquestionably great and can grow exponentially at times, but we have to balance resources. We have laid down a considerable package. The Northern Ireland Office went through this process with the conversion of the RUC to the Police Service of Northern Ireland. I cannot remember the total sum involved in that, but it was another considerable package. However, this is a debt of honour to our people and cannot be seen as compensation. To squabble about money would be unseemly. We have done what we believe to be right. It has been well received across Northern Ireland and, if not, I will hear about it from those who currently serve. We have had a flavour of how well it has been received, although there are still some concerns to be addressed.

The protection of those who have gone back to civilian life is a matter for security assessment within Northern Ireland and rests with the Chief Constable. We have always shown our willingness to look after people in that part of the United Kingdom. I do not see that changing.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. We must now move on to the next business.

BILL PRESENTED

Criminal Justice Act 1988 (Amendment)

Keith Vaz presented a Bill to amend the Criminal Justice Act 1988 to establish a right of appeal in relation to the amount of compensation payable under section 133 of that Act and to make provision about the procedure for the assessment of such amounts: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 17 March, and to be printed. [Bill 143].

New Clause 1

POWER OF CONSTABLE TO ASSIST IN EXERCISE OF POWERS OF ENTRY

'(1) A person authorised for the purpose of subsection (1) or (2) of section 77 may apply to a court for a warrant under this section.

(2) If it appears to the court that the authorised person—

(a) has attempted to exercise a power conferred on him by section 77 but has been prevented from doing so, or

(b) is likely to be prevented from exercising any such power, the court may issue a warrant authorising any constable to assist that person in the exercise of the power, using reasonable force if necessary.

(3) A warrant issued under this section must be addressed to, and executed by, a constable.

(4) Schedule 11 to the Children Act 1989 (c. 41) (jurisdiction of courts) applies in relation to proceedings under this section as if they were proceedings under that Act.

(5) In this section, "court" means the High Court, a county court or a magistrates' court but this is subject to any provision which may be made (by virtue of subsection (4)) by or under Schedule 11 to the Children Act 1989 (c. 41).'.—[Maria Eagle.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

12.47 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Maria Eagle): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendment No. 18.

Maria Eagle: It is a pleasure to resume our deliberations on the Bill. I hope that we shall be able to deal with the outstanding issues succinctly; I shall certainly attempt to do so.

New clause 1 allows persons authorised under clause 77 to apply to the court for a warrant for a constable to support them. It is purely a technical, tidying amendment—which means that we forgot to deal with it earlier—to ensure that the power under section 102 of the Children Act 1989 of a constable to assist is carried forward appropriately to the legislation. It would enable the court to issue a warrant in cases where it appeared that Ofsted had been prevented, or was likely to be prevented, from exercising powers under clause 77. Fortunately for all concerned, such applications have been extremely rare so we do not expect the provision to be needed frequently; none the less, it makes sense to include it.

Amendment No. 18 simply tidies up the impact of the new clause by adding a power for a constable to assist in respect of family proceedings. On that basis, I commend the provisions to the House.

Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): I shall not detain the House on these technical amendments, which the Minister was gracious enough to admit might have been dealt with earlier.

On a general note, however, the Government recently tabled a number of amendments for discussion today, several of which are completely new provisions, yet no accompanying explanatory notes or letters from the Minister have been forthcoming. That is not helpful. Usually when the Government table amendments on new matters, one would expect an explanation, as a courtesy at least.

Furthermore, I notice from the Order Paper that the Secretary of State is making a written statement on "Safeguarding in early years and childcare", which I presume is germane to the Bill, yet neither I nor my hon. Friends—nor, I suspect, the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke), who speaks for the Liberal Democrats—received notice of that statement. My office rang the Minister's office this morning and we were promised that a copy would be e-mailed straightaway, but that has not appeared. That is regrettable, especially in the light of what happened last week with the Children and Adoption Bill, when Opposition Members were not notified about the imminent publication of a report that was absolutely germane to the business, and was referred to during that business by the Minister of State. That is a shame, because it diminishes the detail of our debate at a late but crucial stage.

I am thus not in a position to take issue with the points that the Under-Secretary of State has just made, although based on a scant reading of the provisions, we do not want to raise any objections to them. However, it would have been nice to receive an explanation of them sooner.

Maria Eagle: I apologise to the hon. Gentleman for the fact that we do not appear to have managed to do what we said we would do, and get those details and the written statement over to Opposition spokesmen. It was certainly our intention to do so, and I undertake to find out why that did not happen. I am the first to admit that the situation is not satisfactory; I can but apologise.

It seems, however, that the Opposition do not take exception to the new clause and the amendment—[Interruption.] I have just received some late information. The detail that we hoped to pass to the Opposition was placed on the letter board—I assume, this morning—so we attempted to inform them. I shall try to find out what went wrong and when, and I will talk to the hon. Gentleman about it outside the Chamber.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 2

PROVISION OF INFORMATION ABOUT YOUNG CHILDREN: ENGLAND

'(1) Regulations may make provision, in relation to England, requiring—

(a) a person registered as an early years provider under Chapter 2 of Part 3, and

(b) a person who provides early years provision in respect of which, but for section 34(2) (exemption for provision for children aged 3 or over at certain schools), he would be required to be registered under that Chapter, to provide to the relevant person such individual child information as may be prescribed.

(2) In subsection (1), "the relevant person" means one or more of the following—

(a) the Secretary of State, and

(b) any prescribed person.

(3) Where any person within paragraph (b) of subsection (2) receives information by virtue of subsection (1), the Secretary of State may require that person to provide any such information—

(a) to the Secretary of State, or

(b) to any prescribed person.

(4) The Secretary of State may provide any individual child information—

(a) to any information collator,

(b) to any prescribed person, or

(c) to any person falling within a prescribed category.

(5) Any information collator—

(a) may provide any individual child information—

(i) to the Secretary of State, or

(ii) to any other information collator, and

(b) may at such times as the Secretary of State may determine or in prescribed circumstances provide such individual child information as may be prescribed—

(i) to any prescribed person, or

(ii) to any person falling within a prescribed category.

(6) Any person holding any individual child information (other than the Secretary of State or an information collator) may provide that information to—

(a) the Secretary of State,

(b) any information collator, or

(c) any prescribed person.

(7) No information received under or by virtue of this section shall be published in any form which includes the name of the child or children to whom it relates.

(8) Regulations under this section may provide that, in such circumstances as may be prescribed, the provision of information to a person other than the Secretary of State is to be treated, for the purposes of any provision of such regulations or this section, as compliance with any requirement imposed by or by virtue of any such provision and relating to the provision of information to the Secretary of State.

(9) In this section—

"early years provision" has the meaning given by section 20;

"individual child information" means information relating to and identifying individual children for whom early years provision is being or has been provided by a person mentioned in subsection (1)(a) or (b), whether obtained under subsection (1) or otherwise;

"information collator" means any body which, for the purposes of or in connection with the functions of the Secretary of State relating to early years provision, is responsible for collating or checking information relating to children for whom such provision is made;

"prescribed" means prescribed by regulations;

"regulations" means regulations made by the Secretary of State.'.—[Beverley Hughes.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

The Minister for Children and Families (Beverley Hughes): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following: Government new clause 3—Provision of information about young children: transitory provision.

Government new clause 4—Provision of information about children: Wales.

Government amendments Nos. 26 and 27.

Beverley Hughes: The purpose of the new clauses and amendments is to allow for a significant improvement in the quality and accuracy of the information we collect about early years provision—that is, integrated child care and early education for children under school age. It will enable more accurate funding to follow the delivery of nursery entitlement for three and four-year-olds and provide essential support to local authorities in the fulfilment of those duties under the Bill.

The provisions will enable the Secretary of State and other prescribed persons, such as local authorities, to collect individual child-level information from all registered providers of early years provision in England, in line with the reformed regulatory and inspection framework in the Bill. In Wales, the powers will apply under relevant legislation, consistent with the regulatory framework in Wales. The powers are not to demand information from parents but for local authorities to collect information that providers will hold already.

A key purpose of the power is to manage better the funding of free nursery education provision. At present, the information collected by the Government from local government about free entitlement is aggregated information on all the children enrolled with each private, voluntary or independent provider, rather than individual child-level information. Holding such child-level information will reduce the risk of double counting, which we think is happening to some extent at present, where parents use more than one provider for their free nursery entitlement.

We are building on the success of that entitlement, progressively increasing the number of hours and weeks, so an increasing amount of public funding is being used to support it. It is thus important that providers receive money for what they actually provide for each child.

There are some other reasons for the provisions. The duty for local authorities to improve outcomes for all children and reduce inequalities is one of the cornerstones of the Bill. Local authorities need a full range of information about children in early years provision, to ensure that they are fulfilling that duty.

It is also important for central Government to have that information to evaluate effectively the success of the policy. This enabling power to collect information from all early years providers will show how much provision each child receives, and where, and will supply outcome measurements, such as the foundation stage profile.

We shall hold full consultations on draft regulations carrying the detail of the proposals. We shall also take careful account of the views of stakeholders, providers and local authorities on how the power is implemented. The ability to collect accurate and robust individual child-level information is essential to ensure the proper allocation of funding and to support local authorities in delivering better outcomes for all children. Amendments Nos. 26 and 27 are consequential, to ensure that the provisions on data collection can be commenced by the appropriate authority at the appropriate time.

I commend the new clause to the House.

Tim Loughton: The new clauses are quite chunky, and again I make the point that we had no inkling about them in Committee. It is not clear whether these provisions are connected to the child safeguarding provisions in the next group and which in turn have connections to the forthcoming Safeguarding Vulnerable Groups Bill. From what the Minister said, it would appear that they are more to do with a numbers exercise, to ensure that the correct figures are analysed. If that is the case, the Opposition certainly have some concerns about the wide-reaching nature of new clause 2.

New clause 2, as I understand it, places obligations, through regulation, on various people involved in child care to provide information, not about children in general, but individual child information, the nature of which we do not know. According to subsection (3), the information can be provided to the Secretary of State or "any prescribed person". Who will those prescribed persons be? Will it be you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, or will it be me? Who will be involved?

Subsection (4) is even more wide-ranging. It states that the Secretary of State

"may provide any individual child information".

That is, it appears, without any exemptions. The subsection continues

"to any information collator".

Who will those information collators be? Who will be licensed or allowed to collect, analyse, view and disseminate this information "to any prescribed person", as mentioned in paragraph (b), or "to any person falling within a prescribed category"?

Not many members of the population are left out.

1 pm

There is then the provision that "any information collator" may pass on information to any other information collator. All the way through, the new clause appears to give enormous powers to the Secretary of State to decide who he thinks should handle, interpret, collate and act on this information. We do not have an inkling about these people, not least because we have had no explanation of this quite powerful new clause. It appears that the only safeguard is in subsection (7), which reads:

"No information received under or by virtue of this section shall be published in any form which includes the name of the child."

That may be unavoidable in some circumstances—when child care is provided on a one-to-one basis, for example, or in small groups.

I fear that the new clause has been put together belatedly and perhaps rather hurriedly. I have serious concerns about whether it conflicts with the Children Act 2004. This matter was handled by the Minister's predecessor, but she may recall—the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke) certainly will—that we had lengthy debates about the nature of the information databases. The Opposition continue to have serious concerns about them—and those databases are now beginning to be put into operation.

One of the safeguards that we were given—specifically written into the Act—appears in section 12(4)(h). It is that information of "such other description" may be put on to these databases. Specifically, medical records are not included, or such other personal records as the Secretary of State may by regulation specify. In that measure, the sharing of information was specifically curtailed for medical records. For very good reasons, we supported that. There were other categories involved as well. We do not appear to have such safeguards in the new clause.

Individual child information—not numbers—can be produced and must be produced as requested, and passed on to an indeterminate group or groups of people to do indeterminate things with it. Medical records, among other things, are not specifically exempted. Does the Minister agree that there is a potential conflict with that section of the 2004 Act? Can she give me some assurances that that was not intended, and say whether some further detail will be added to ensure that such a conflict cannot happen?

Will the Minister identify who the information collators are likely to be, and what they are expected to do with the information? I want a definition of what individual child information is likely to amount to. That is important. Much in the 2004 Act was essential to promote the sharing of information among professionals in dealing with vulnerable children who might be at risk of harm. We agreed with that, and that was the thrust of what became the 2004 Act. There were also some perfectly good provisions that protected the confidentiality of children and their parents. Those provisions seem to have been ignored in the framing of new clause 2. I would be grateful if the Minister gave us some more detail—which was, alas, not forthcoming before today's deliberations.

Annette Brooke (Mid-Dorset and North Poole) (LD): I concur 100 per cent. with the hon. Gentleman. At the top of my copy of the amendment paper I wrote "Child Protection". I assumed that the provision was an extension of what we were talking about with the Children Act 2004 in the context of databases. There were some words of reassurance that we were considering numbers relating to payments, but that was not how I understood it. That might be blamed on my interpretation. However, other people might have made the same error. If I had had a red pen in my hand, the amendment paper would have been covered in comments about ambiguity and non-understanding of terms.

[Annette Brooke]

Subsection (1) reads

"such individual child information as may be prescribed."

That means nothing to me. We then have the "prescribed person". I turn over, as it were, to the regulations and the notes and I read that "prescribed" means "prescribed by regulations". I do not think that I have ever seen such accompanying notes—if they can be called that—which actually say nothing.

Then we have the "information collator". I had no idea how wide that definition was. I did not know whether it went beyond local authority employees. We then have the phrase:

"to any other information collator".

I have made some notes along subsection (7) that there was a slight saving grace in that there will be no publication of "the name of the child or children to whom it relates."

I have the greatest concern about accepting the new clause without either a clear statement from the Minister today or an undertaking that there will be a clear statement as the Bill progresses through its stages of consideration. I am concerned about the whole.

The Minister's predecessor was extremely helpful to one of my constituents who was refused funding as a provider. It appears that my local authority had been misinterpreting regulations about how funding could be used and where. That shows that we must be absolutely clear about the regulations on the allocation of funding. The problem arose in the context of someone who was being denied funding for a nursery place, and I am grateful to the Minister's Department for sorting that out for me.

Justine Greening (Putney) (Con): I concur with my hon. Friend the Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton). The new clause is far too broad. The Government need to be far clearer about what they are trying to achieve with a measure that they seek to introduce at such a late stage in the consideration of the Bill. There is a real danger that parents throughout the country will be concerned about the level of information being collected on their children. It would be ironic if parents were dissuaded from using child-minding services because of concern about the collecting of information that would then be permitted about their child.

We must examine closely what the clause seeks to achieve and whether the information powers that it contains are excessive to achieve the Government's objectives. I hope that the Minister can confirm what the Government are seeking to achieve and why they need particular information. Perhaps it will be possible to be more specific about what information will be collected, by whom, by what powers, when, how regularly, where it will be stored, who will have access to the database, and perhaps the central control of the information. If so, the House would be able to say much more confidently whether the proposal before us is good or bad.

I am worried that the reference to "any information collator" could include the Child Support Agency, and could apply to cases in which non-contact orders have been made. The new clauses do not make any reference to the Data Protection Act 1998, which may conflict with them. I find it difficult to believe that there is any information about the child care industry that it not made available to the Government. Can the Minister clarify the nature of the information that she lacks? The Opposition are struggling to understand why the new clauses are necessary.

Beverley Hughes: I sympathise with hon. Members who are anxious about new clauses that have been tabled late in the proceedings, and I shall try to deal with their concerns. Government new clause 2 reflects provisions in the Education and Inspections Bill on individual child data in schools. Those are based on provisions in section 537A of the Education Act 1996, which was passed under the previous Administration. The powers in the new clause are almost identical to those provisions because, as I have tried to outline, we have made a big push on early-years provision, so they need to apply to that sector too.

The power is an enabling one, based on the long-standing provisions in the 1996 Act. Hon. Members are understandably anxious to probe the nature of the information that will be provided. That will be dealt with in detailed regulations, which will define the nature of the data collected and identify those who can collect it. Information collators may be local authority officers, civil service statisticians or anyone who has the right to collate information on behalf of Government. There is therefore a circumscribed group of people who can collect that information.

Tim Loughton: Will all the people who are given powers as information collators be subject to scrutiny under the Bichard proposals in the Safeguarding Vulnerable Groups Bill? Can the Minister guarantee that anyone who is nominated as a collator who has access to that information will be vetted accordingly?

Beverley Hughes: The Safeguarding Vulnerable Groups Bill proposes that specific groups of people will be subject to the highest level checks in the barring and vetting scheme if they collect or collate information. Those groups include people who are responsible for the updating and upkeep of data and procedures on the information-sharing index to which the hon. Gentleman has referred. I will go away and ask if those people, and the data provision under the new clause, will be caught. My understanding is that they will not, because that data and information is not of the same order, but I shall certainly ask about that.

Tim Loughton: I am rather alarmed by that reply, as I thought that the Minister was going to say, "Yes, obviously." Those people will be in receipt of a great deal of information about where children are, what they do there, how many children there are, what their hours of attendance are, what sort of services they receive and which staff deal with them. It is essential to vet such people because if they had bad intentions they could use that information themselves or pass it on to others who might use it for purposes for which it was not intended. I therefore hope that the Minister will do a little more than go away and check. I hope that she will go away and make sure that the provision is watertight.

Beverley Hughes: As I told the hon. Gentleman, a compulsory check at the highest level will be made on the people administering the information-sharing index, but we have yet to finalise which groups of people are affected and which level of check will be imposed on those working in local authorities. That is an issue to which we will return during proceedings on the Safeguarding Vulnerable Groups Bill.

Hon. Members may be reassured to learn that current arrangements involve the transfer of individual child information from providers to local authorities. In the new clause we are seeking to standardise that practice. A survey that we conducted in December among a large number of local authorities demonstrated that the majority already collect information about early years settings on an individual child basis. The Department for Education and Skills requires that information to be sent to it in an aggregated form.

Many local authorities welcome the proposal to mirror the way in which school data is provided so that individual child information can be passed on to the Department, because—to answer the hon. Gentleman's question—that will reduce their workload and make their task much simpler. I accept that that does not take into account concerns about the kind of information collected, but we envisage that the amount of that information will be limited. It could include identifying information on children such as gender and ethnicity, whether they receive special educational needs provision, and, of course, the number of hours that they spend in the setting, including the number of funded hours. That is essential because, as I said at the beginning of our debate, some providers lose out if parents take up the free nursery education offer with a number of different providers. Because the information that the Department receives is aggregated, we cannot ensure that funding flows to the providers who are caring for the child for a certain number of hours a week. Providers are particularly concerned about that, as hon. Members will appreciate.

Annette Brooke: When the regulations are published, will the Minister include a requirement that the local authority must not keep information on certain things? I am sure that we all accept the examples that she has given, but much more detail could be requested, and the new clause would permit a considerable amount of information to be held.

Beverley Hughes: It will not be necessary to include things on which the local authority must not hold information, because local authorities and providers can only hold and pass on information if the regulations empower them to do so. Indeed, that information is already circumscribed. For example, it is legally not possible for information on medical records to be held and passed on. We are simply talking about identifying information and the number of hours and weeks that the child spends in the setting. Such information can help us to assess whether child outcomes are achieved by local authorities.

Tim Loughton: I hope that the Minister understands why we are trying to establish the detail of the proposal. She said that medical records were exempt, and would not be kept on the database—a point that I made in relation to section 12 of the Children Act 2004. Does one provision override the other? The new clause does not refer to the 2004 Act or to the exemptions in it, so is there a measure that makes it explicit that the new clause is subject to those exemptions? The exemptions apply to national and local databases, and will not necessarily apply to the database that will be collated. I am not sure that there is an interconnection.

Beverley Hughes: Existing legislation is not swept away, as the hon. Gentleman will know from his careful reading of the clauses. The provisions that prevent the holding and passing on of medical records at present will take precedence.

For both reasons—for the flow of funding, and in order to assess whether local authorities are meeting their duty on outcomes for children in the round—we need the information. It is routinely held and passed on by providers and local authorities. It is important that we standardise that. Our survey of local authorities showed that some were collecting some information and others were collecting other information. The regulations will standardise the collection of information.

Justine Greening: I understand how the information might be used by central Government, but it seems slightly contradictory that the Bill gives powers and duties to local authorities to make sure that child care provision is available locally. I have many young parents living in my constituency, Putney, and I question whether the level of detail is appropriate. Local authorities are being given powers and duties to provide child minding and child care facilities, but the Secretary of State is seeking such a level of detail that the Department could interfere in individual nurseries. Surely it is for local authorities to take decisions. Why does the Department need such detail? Why can it not accept the summary detail that it gets in other areas of education?

Beverley Hughes: The hon. Lady is wrong about that. The level of detail that relates to children of other ages is not aggregate. Local authorities must increasingly provide individual level data, because the funding flows from Government to local authorities. Local authorities may allocate it, but the level of provision is based on numbers of children, and in this instance, where those children are accessing the free nursery entitlement that the Government have provided. We want the money to flow more effectively to the providers. In order to give parents more flexibility, so that they have a range of options for that nursery offer, we need to make sure that we can disaggregate in the case of children for whom the offer is spread over a number of different providers. That is happening now and providers are losing out, because only one provider is getting the total amount of money, whereas there might be another one, two or three providers who have the child for part of the week but are not getting the money that flows from that.

The other important issue is the outcomes duty. Local authorities will want to test themselves as to how far, for the population as a whole, they are improving outcomes for children and reducing inequality. We as a

[Beverley Hughes]

Department want to assure ourselves that local authorities are fulfilling the terms of that duty. There will, of course, be further opportunity to discuss the matter in the other place, and I can assure hon. Members that further details of how we envisage the measure working, short of the regulations, will be available for that debate.

Tim Loughton: Before the Minister finishes, can she explain what subsection (1) of new clause 3 means? It states:

"Section (Provision of information about young children: England) has effect with the modifications specified in subsections (2) and (3) until section 7 comes into force."

Which section 7 and which Act does that refer to? I cannot work it out.

Beverley Hughes: The hon. Gentleman has a smile on his face, as if he thinks he has caught me out, but I think he will find that I have a sound and accurate explanation for him. New clause 3 makes transitional arrangements to enable data to be collected from funded nursery education before the provisions in new clause 2 come into force. New clause 2 will come into force as a whole in September 2008 for all providers, but for providers who are already getting funding for nursery education, we can legitimately get that information, which will of course be partial, earlier because it is already being collected. The new clause gives the legal power for a transitional arrangement to enable that to be done for a year, before the full force of new clause 2 takes effect. Section 7, therefore, is the present clause 7 of the Bill.

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): As I understand the Minister's comments, new clause 3 covers the period before new clause 2 comes into force. What will happen in Wales? New clause 4 mirrors new clause 2, but there is no mirror of new clause 3.

Beverley Hughes: The hon. Gentleman might have got me there. As he says, new clause 4 enables the regulations to take effect, allowing the Welsh Assembly to collect individual child level data. It may well be for the Assembly to decide on any transitional arrangements. I shall make sure that the hon. Gentleman gets an accurate answer to that question.

There will be opportunity to discuss the new clauses in another place, and before those discussions take place, there will be further information about what we envisage.

New Clause 3

PROVISION OF INFORMATION ABOUT YOUNG CHILDREN: TRANSITORY PROVISION

'(1) Section (Provision of information about young children: England) has effect with the modifications specified in subsections (2) and (3) until section 7 comes into force.

(2) In subsection (1)—

(a) after "requiring" insert "a person who provides funded nursery education", and

(b) omit paragraphs (a) and (b).

(3) In subsection (9)—

(a) for the definition of "early years provision" substitute—

""funded nursery education" means nursery education, within the meaning of Part 5 of the School Standards and Framework Act 1998 (c. 31), which is provided by any person—

(a) under arrangements made with that person by a local education authority in England in pursuance of the duty imposed on the authority by section 118 of that Act (duty of LEA to secure sufficient nursery education), and

(b) in consideration of financial assistance provided by the authority under those arrangements, other than such education provided by a school for its pupils;",

(b) for the definition of "individual child information" substitute—

"individual child information" means information relating to and identifying individual children for whom funded nursery education is being or has been provided, whether obtained under subsection (1) or otherwise;", and

(c) in the definition of "information collator" for "early years provision" substitute "funded nursery education".'. —[Beverley Hughes.]

New Clause 4

PROVISION OF INFORMATION ABOUT CHILDREN: WALES

'(1) Regulations may make provision, in relation to Wales, requiring—

(a) a person who is registered under Part 10A of the Children Act 1989 (c. 41) to provide child minding or day care, and

(b) a person who provides funded nursery education, to provide to the relevant person such individual child information as may be prescribed.

(2) In subsection (1), "the relevant person" means one or more of the following—

(a) the Assembly, and

(b) any prescribed person.

(3) Where any person within paragraph (b) of subsection (2) receives information by virtue of subsection (1), the Assembly may require that person to provide any such information—

(a) to the Assembly, or

(b) to any prescribed person.

(4) The Assembly may provide any individual child information—

(a) to any information collator,

(b) to any prescribed person, or

(c) to any person falling within a prescribed category.

(5) Any information collator—

(a) may provide any individual child information—

(i) to the Assembly, or

(ii) to any other information collator, and

(b) may at such times as the Assembly may determine or in prescribed circumstances provide such individual child information as may be prescribed—

(i) to any prescribed person, or

(ii) to any person falling within a prescribed category.

(6) Any person holding any individual child information (other than the Assembly or an information collator) may provide that information to—

(a) the Assembly,

(b) any information collator, or

(c) any prescribed person.

(7) No information received under or by virtue of this section shall be published in any form which includes the name of the child or children to whom it relates.

(8) Regulations under this section may provide that, in such circumstances as may be prescribed, the provision of information to a person other than the Assembly is to be treated, for the purposes of any provision of such regulations or this section, as compliance with any requirement imposed by or by virtue of any such provision and relating to the provision of information to the Assembly.

(9) In this section—

"child minding" and "day care" have the same meaning as in Part 10A of the Children Act 1989 (c.41);

"funded nursery education" means nursery education, within the meaning of Part 5 of the School Standards and Framework Act 1998 (c. 31), which is provided by any person—

(a) under arrangements made with that person by a local education authority in Wales in pursuance of the duty imposed on the authority by section 118 of that Act (duty of LEA to secure sufficient nursery education), and

(b) in consideration of financial assistance provided by the authority under those arrangements,

other than such education provided by a school for its pupils;

"individual child information" means information relating to and identifying individual children for whom child minding, day care or funded nursery education is being or has been provided, whether obtained under subsection (1) or otherwise;

"information collator" means any body which, for the purposes of or in connection with the functions of the Assembly relating to child minding, day care or funded nursery education (as the case may be), is responsible for collating or checking information relating to children for whom such provision is made;

"prescribed" means prescribed by regulations;

"regulations" means regulations made by the Assembly.'.—[Beverley Hughes.]

New Clause 5

Disqualification for Registration Under Children Act 1989

'(1) Paragraph 4 of Schedule 9A to the Children Act 1989 (c.41) (disqualification for registration) is amended as follows.

(2) In sub-paragraph (2)—

(a) in paragraph (b) after "children" insert "or on grounds relating to his health", and

(b) after paragraph (g) insert—

"(ga) he has been given a caution in respect of any offence of a prescribed kind;".

(3) For sub-paragraph (6) substitute—

"(6) In this paragraph—

"caution" includes a reprimand or warning within the meaning of section 65 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998;

"enactment" means any enactment having effect, at any time, in any part of the United Kingdom.".'.—[Maria Eagle.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Maria Eagle: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following: Amendment No. 49, in page 7, line 2, clause 12, at end insert

':

Government amendments Nos. 19 to 25.

Government amendments Nos. 28 and 29.

Before we discuss this group of amendments, I must tell the House that an error was made in printing Government new clause 5. A corrected version has been placed in the Vote Office, which I understand has been available to Members. I am given an assurance that the corrections are not of any great import.

Maria Eagle: The amendments fall into two groups. I shall leave amendment No. 49 until the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) has spoken to it.

New clause 5 and Government amendments Nos. 22, 23, 24, 25, 28 and 29 enable the Secretary of State to make regulations disqualifying from registration persons who are barred from working in schools on the grounds of ill health and those who have been cautioned by the police for an offence. Amendments Nos. 19, 20 and 21 add to the Bill specific mention that regulations which govern the activities of providers registered under part 3 may deal with arrangements for safeguarding the children concerned. That arises from my consideration following our deliberations in Committee, so I hope that that small group of amendments, at least, will please Opposition Members and that we may get some kind words about them. We will wait and see.

Paragraph 4 of schedule 9A to the Children Act 1989 sets out certain grounds on which an individual can be disqualified from providing day care or child minding. Individuals can already be disqualified from providing child care on the grounds of convictions for sexual and violent offences, or orders that show that such a person is unsuitable to work with children, or because his name is included on the Protection of Children Act list, or because the person is subject to a direction under section 142 of the Education Act 2002—in other words, the person is on List 99, on the grounds that he is unsuitable to work with children.

In light of the statement from the Secretary of State on 19 January following an urgent review of barring procedures in schools, two small additions have been identified that are necessary to ensure that disqualification from providing child care works on a similar basis to disqualification in schools. The additions are those whose names are recorded on List 99 on the grounds of ill health. Such directions are made when, for example, a person has a medical condition such as alcohol or substance misuse which means that they are considered to pose a threat to the safety or welfare of children. We also want to include those who have received a caution from the police for particular offences, and we intend to use that power in relation to cautions received for serious sexual or violent offences.

1.30 pm

As a caution involves an admission of guilt, we want to include disqualification on the grounds of cautions in respect of any of the offences currently listed in the disqualification regulations that might otherwise result in a conviction. That change to the current legislation will ensure that we can provide additional safeguards at the earliest possible opportunity. Hon. Members have already referred to the new Safeguarding Vulnerable Groups Bill, and when the new system comes into force, the Secretary of State will require the same powers, which is why we have introduced amendments Nos. 22 to 25.

On amendments Nos. 19 to 21, we have made it clear throughout that children should be safeguarded and protected from harm and neglect when they are in the care of a child care provider. Hon. Members will recall that during the last day in Committee I made a commitment to look further into whether the Bill should be amended explicitly to address the issue of safeguarding. That commitment was in response to amendments that sought to place a duty on early and later years providers to consider the need to safeguard and promote the welfare of children.

We have considered the matter further and have concluded that that point was well made and that such a provision should be included in the Bill. When children are in the care of a child care provider, it is crucial that they are safeguarded and protected from harm. We propose to strengthen and make explicit the position of safeguarding in the Bill. Rather than introducing an overarching duty with a power to make statutory guidance, we have decided to make it clear in the Bill that matters which may be dealt with by regulations include "arrangements for safeguarding" as well as "the welfare of the children concerned".

Amendments Nos. 19 to 21 will send a clear signal to providers that they are responsible for safeguarding children in their care, which will hopefully contribute to the creation of a culture and ethos that reflects that responsibility. The requirements will be set out in secondary legislation, and they will be checked as part of the registration and inspection arrangements. They will be mandatory, and a breach by a provider may result in registration being removed. Such requirements may include the implementation of the appropriate child protection procedures based on current national standards. In addition, providers must meet certain registration requirements in order to be registered in the first place, including that they are not unsuitable to work with young children. They will not be granted registration if, for example, there is information on enhanced criminal records disclosures that suggests that they are unsuitable to work with children.

Tim Loughton: The amendments deal with child protection, which we have raised before. A lot of water has flowed under the bridge in the three months in which we have been waiting patiently for the final stages of this Bill. I am delighted that we have been joined by a Childcare Bill veteran, my hon. Friend the Member for Putney (Justine Greening)—it seems so long ago when the Bill was in Committee. I have also been joined by two new recruits who will beef up our whole approach to children and child care: my hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman), who is shadow spokesman for child care, and my hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke (Mrs. Miller), who is a member of our education team and who speaks on children's issues, young people and families. That shows that we take our cross-departmental responsibilities on children very seriously.

Annette Brooke: I applaud that breadth of experience, but we frequently refer to Wales in our work on children's issues.

Tim Loughton: We could create even more of an imbalance between the Front Bench and the Back Benches by drafting in some of our hon. Friends from the shadow Wales team, who take child protection seriously. We have discussed the matter with them and our colleagues in the Welsh Assembly, because the issue of child protection extends beyond Offa's dyke.

Government new clause 5 amends schedule 9A to the Children Act 1989. It is frustrating when Acts are amended by subsequent legislation and when we are provided only with the original legislation. My copy of the Children Act 1989 provided by the Table Office does not include schedule 9A, which was added later. As a general point, it would be useful if the Table Office were to keep supplies of updated legislation, because I have been unable to obtain the exact wording of schedule 9A. Perhaps the Minister will be kind enough to provide hon. Members with the original wording.

On amendments Nos. 19 and 20, we are waiting for the final details on the arrangements for safeguarding children, and it would be interesting to know when they will be published. In the past few days, the Government have published the Safeguarding Vulnerable Groups Bill, and a lot of detail is required on barring, vetting and appeal mechanisms, so we are being asked to accept the amendments on trust.

Government amendment No. 22 states that someone can be disqualified from registration

"on grounds relating to his health".

The Minister has provided a couple of examples—of people suffering from alcohol or substance misuse. If people have ongoing medical conditions that mean that they may not be up to the job, they will be disqualified, presumably on a temporary basis, until they are—hopefully—treated successfully. What about other conditions? What about people who have HIV? What about people who are suffering from minor mental health conditions? Can the legislation be used to exclude or disqualify people from working in child care if they are suffering from one of those two conditions, which may not be deemed by many people as sufficiently serious or germane to the subject to merit their being disqualified completely from working with children? That is particularly true of people who have minor mental health problems or who have their HIV condition under control and who take all precautions on contamination. I fear that those conditions could be used to discriminate against people who are already stigmatised because they are suffering from a mental illness or have an HIV condition. I would be grateful if the Minister can confirm that the clause could not be used for the purposes for which I am sure she does not intend it to be used.

Government amendment No. 24 says that disqualification can happen if "he has been given a caution in respect of an offence of a prescribed kind".

Government amendment No. 25 refers to section 65 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998. That part of the Act, which gives the definitions of cautions and reprimands, can catch a lot of people. The definitions of when it is appropriate to give reprimands or warnings include when "an offence is not so serious as to require a charge to be brought."

Will the Minister indicate the sorts of warnings or reprimands that she thinks were not sufficiently serious to merit a full charge under that Act, but are deemed sufficiently serious that those people should not then come into child care contact with children? In effect, it is possible that a teenager who in a moment of high spirits did something that was not serious enough for them to be charged and given a criminal record, but to which they admitted guilt by accepting a reprimand or a warning, could find when they tried to embark on a career in child care or some other form of contact with children, that they are exempted. It seems draconian to exempt a whole group of people who are not on the face of it a danger to children as most of us might term it.

There is another issue that I hope that the Minister will deal with when we come to discuss the Safeguarding Vulnerable Groups Bill, if she is handling it. We need to be able to distinguish between the severity of offences. If a 17-year-old boy or girl has sexual relations with a 15-year-old boy or girl minor, that is against the law. When set against a convicted paedophile who downloads child pornographic images on the internet and engages in molestation of children, I think that most of us would agree that those two offences are on an altogether different scale. There should be some balance in the Bill. Otherwise, people who end up accepting a reprimand or a warning under that wide-ranging section of the Crime and Disorder Act, on the basis that that was the most sensible thing for them to do at the time so that they could move on, may find that it has undermined their entire potential career in the child care work force.

I heard about an example of that recently. A mother had intervened to stop her son being beaten up by a school colleague who was something of a bully. Without going into the detail of the whole episode, it ended up with her being taken to the police station and being advised to accept a caution for her supposed aggression in separating those children. Given her telling of the story, with other witnesses corroborating it, I have no doubt that what she did was anything more than trying to drag a bully off her son. She thought nothing of it and took the caution. A few years later she applied for a job to work with children in the local youth service. The caution came up and, lo and behold, counted against her so that she could not get the job. That is a high price to pay for somebody who was protecting her son.

It is right to seek to disqualify people who are a serious threat to children from working with children, because that needs to be tightened up. Conservative Members have been critical of the loopholes and laxness in the system that have allowed serious sex offenders to carry on teaching, in particular, and working in the health service. That is why we will, at the appropriate time, welcome many of the measures in the Safeguarding Vulnerable Groups Bill. However, we are in danger of throwing the baby out with the bathwater. I ask the Minister to give us some assurances on the subject.

1.45 pm

Government amendment No. 28 is a technical amendment on which we have no comment. Government amendment No. 29 amends the long title of the Bill. It is usually my job to try to change the long titles of Bills that are to do with children. I applaud the Minister for following my example, as many of them are a disaster.

I turn to amendment No. 49, which stands in my name and those of my hon. Friends. Our amendment gives a slightly different angle on the whole subject of protecting children. It would add the words, "child protection arrangements", to clause 12, which deals with the duty to provide information, advice and assistance. It would be appropriate, particularly given the furore in recent months over sex offenders working in environments where they will be involved with children, to do everything that we can to reassure parents that local authorities and child care providers have gone that extra mile to ensure that their children can go to the nursery with every reasonable measure having been taken to ensure that the people with whom they will come into contact have been properly vetted.

It would enhance the thrust of clause 12 if an additional piece of information were provided to parents and prospective parents to give an indication of what child protection arrangements have been established by the local authority and are demanded of child care providers, and whether they are being put in place, adhered to, maintained and updated where appropriate by those child care providers. That would be a sensible enhancement of the Bill to give parents a degree of assurance that they are giving their children into the charge of people in whom they can have the greatest confidence, so that they can be sure that such people are there in the interests of the children, not because they harbour some other, less desirable intentions towards those children.

I hope that the amendment is constructive. If the Minister is unable to incorporate it into the Bill now, I hope that it might be considered later, or at least put into regulations for local authorities to follow so that this important issue is taken into account.

Helen Goodman (Bishop Auckland) (Lab): The Minister will recall that in Committee I was concerned that there appeared to be a loophole on the safeguarding provisions for child care operators in chapter 4—that is, those with voluntary registration. I therefore welcome her statement on safeguarding and the read-across to the Safeguarding Vulnerable Groups Bill. I want to emphasise on the record that that Bill now stipulates the following:

[Helen Goodman]

"Under the new scheme, where work, whether paid or unpaid, involves frequent teaching, caring for or otherwise working closely with children, the employer will be required to check that their employees are not barred from working with children, and they will be committing an offence and will face penalties if they employ a person so barred. This will include those working in childcare not registered by Ofsted."

I am most grateful for that tightening up of the situation.

Annette Brooke: I, too, was generally pleased with the amendments. Again, there were no accompanying notes. I picked up the word "health" and I was not sure what it covered, but I believe that the same expression is used in the Protection of Children Act 1999—POCA—list. There may be additional information that I have not had time to find. It would therefore have been helpful to have the information. I have asked a series of parliamentary questions about checks on child care and I imagine that the written statement, which I have not seen, will add to the information that I have gleaned.

I, too, am pleased that the Safeguarding Vulnerable Groups Bill will apply to child care and that the list or lists—however it ultimately works out—will have to be checked. However, it prompts the question why criminal record checks are not required in unregulated settings, such as in a crèche that provides under two hours of child care, which I keep mentioning. I had hoped that amendment No. 49 would pick up that point, but its approach is from a slightly different angle. I am still worried that parents do not know that criminal record checks are not carried out on those in unregulated settings. However, I agree that it is helpful to know that the lists will have to be checked before anybody can work with young people.

I am pleased with the safeguarding amendments—Nos. 19, 20 and 21. They tie in with other parts of the Bill. However, in Committee, we discussed at great length whether the measure should include the word "may" or "must". The amendments, which refer to apply to subsections of clauses that state:

"the arrangements for safeguarding the children concerned"

"The regulations may provide" for the following matters. On safeguarding, the word should be "must", as we argued in Committee. The safeguarding amendments make it even more important to revisit the "may" and "must" argument, which I will not discuss at great length because we spent much time on it in Committee. However, it is worth raising it again because we have changed the measure and our awareness is heightened about the necessity of safeguarding and protecting. I therefore ask the Under-Secretary to reconsider the matter.

Maria Eagle: I thank hon. Members for being positive about the changes that amendments Nos. 19, 20 and 21 would make to include safeguarding in the Bill. I am glad that the proposals have been generally welcomed.

Let me deal with the comments of the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) on amendment No. 49. Towards the end of his remarks, he suggested that, although we might not be able to incorporate it in the Bill, we might take a great deal of interest in its substance. I am happy to give him that assurance. It is important that parents have full information about child protection and safeguarding. Information services clearly play a key role in ensuring that parents can make informed decisions on the suitability of various child care providers for their children. We will publish regulations and guidance to try to ensure that that is clear to parents.

The hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke) stressed the importance of parents understanding the difference between regulated and unregulated settings. I agree. It is our intention that information services can and must tell parents about the registration status of providers and the implications of that, the difference between a registered and a non-registered setting and the checks that registered providers and their staff undergo as opposed to those that staff in unregulated settings may—or may not—undergo.

Information services will need to inform parents about the questions that they should ask when they choose provision. In regulations, we intend to require information services to provide information about keeping children safe in the community. The information might include what parents should do if they have concerns, for example, about child protection or children's welfare. It might also include initiatives or publications from the local safeguarding children boards. Their role in the community is to keep children safe in all sorts of settings in many different places.

We hope that hon. Members agree that the obligations are comprehensive. The guidance and regulations will include holding such information centrally. I therefore hope that the hon. Gentleman will feel able not to press amendment No. 49, with the understanding that we have fully taken on board the points that Opposition Members made about the importance of information for parents and its centrality to what parents require when they choose provision.

Let me deal with some of the points made by the hon. Member for Worthing—

Tim Loughton: East Worthing and Shoreham.

Maria Eagle: All the easts, norths and wests can be confusing. [Interruption.] Not to mention highs, souths and so on. I am having one of those days. I shall simply refer to the "hon. Gentleman"—that is easier.

The hon. Gentleman made some points about the ill health provisions, which relate to List 99, to try to tease out precisely what was intended. He gave a couple of examples, including HIV infection and minor mental health problems. The provisions will mirror List 99. There will not be a separate list so that a minor health problem could suddenly be taken into account to ban somebody from a child care setting. Ill health will be taken into account only when it is already sufficient to prompt questions about an individual's suitability for teaching children. The provisions will apply to individuals who could already go on List 99 if they are in an education setting. That does not therefore include HIV infection or minor mental health problems. We are considering examples, such as those that I gave earlier, of serious debility arising from ill health that could make somebody completely unsuitable for looking after children in a child care setting.

Tim Loughton: I am grateful for that elaboration but does the Under-Secretary accept that, because the provisions refer simply to "health", an authority, or an individual in it who was so minded, could exclude people in the two categories that I mentioned? That would be neither fair nor appropriate. The provisions give a broad licence to authorities. Will the guidance notes to local authorities state that they were not intended to apply to the examples that I gave?

Maria Eagle: We can make that clear. The provisions apply only to those in an education setting who end up on List 99. They are not intended to be any wider.

The hon. Gentleman raised a constituency case to show the potential dangers of barring on the basis of cautions. He made legitimate points about the Safeguarding Vulnerable Groups Bill, the way in which we intend to make the new barring and vetting process work and the impact that it will have. He gave the example of a mother who intervened to save a child from being pushed around and ended up with soft information on a Criminal Records Bureau record that caused her problems in working in child care. Those issues are central to the Safeguarding Vulnerable Groups Bill and establishing the new barring and vetting scheme. We have given the matter considerable thought. We do not intend to provide that any caution would lead to being barred from the children's work force. We would not have such a work force, which could deal with all the jobs and roles in it, if we cast the net too wide. Obviously, it is important to cast it in the appropriate place, however, and that is certainly our intention. It would be our intention to bar on the basis of cautions only for serious sexual or violent offences. We would not want to see people being barred from the child care work force if they had, perhaps sensibly, received a caution for a very minor matter that would not make them a risk to children.

The hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham is right to draw the comparison, which is sometimes age-related, between circumstances that might relate to a similar offence. He used the example of a 17-year-old and a 15-year-old having a relationship, and compared it to the case of a paedophile downloading child porn then wanting to work in the child care work force. Common sense would suggest to most hon. Members that there is a huge difference between those examples.

When the hon. Gentleman sees the Safeguarding Vulnerable Groups Bill in all its glory, he will understand that we are dealing with precisely where the lines should be drawn in what are sometimes grey areas. However, I do not think, from what he says, that he disagrees too strongly with where we have tried to draw the line. The provisions that we are putting into this Bill try to make consistent the place at which the bar will fall between the education work force and the child care work force. We are trying to tidy up and make consistent the places where the line is drawn in that regard.

I regret that we cannot give the hon. Gentleman the full details of all the relevant measures, but some of them are in another piece of legislation, which we shall consider in the not-too-distant future. I can assure him, however, that we have in mind the issues that he has raised in regard to proportionality. There will also be provision for appeals and for people to make representations in appropriate cases. It is perhaps regrettable that those measures are in a Bill that has yet to come before the House. I am asking hon. Members to take on trust some of those issues in relation to the Childcare Bill. I can assure them, however, that its provisions will be consistent with those of the Safeguarding Vulnerable Groups Bill in regard to the new barring and vetting scheme, which the House will have plenty of opportunity to consider in great detail in the not-too-distant future.

Best Value: Code of Practice

'The Secretary of State shall publish by 1 January 2007 a code of practice ensuring that local authorities operating a best value regime, in accordance with Part 1 of the Local Government Act 1999 (c. 27), act in a fair and transparent way in delivering best value obligations with regard to childcare provision.'.—[Mr. Paul Goodman.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Paul Goodman (Wycombe) (Con): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following: New clause 8—Best Value Provision Of Childcare—

'Any local authority operating a best value regime, in accordance with Part 1 of the Local Government Act 1999 (c. 27), must act in a fair and transparent way in delivering best value obligations with regard to childcare provision, having due regard to any relevant statutory code of practice.'.

Amendment No. 60, in page 4, line 10, clause 6, after 'sufficient', insert

', and is likely to remain sufficient,'.

Amendment No. 5, in page 4, line 15, at end insert

', or

(c) to receive appropriate assistance with children with disabilities or other special needs.'.

Amendment No. 13, in page 4, line 15, at end insert

'or

(c) to sustain caring responsibilities.'.

Amendment No. 35, in page 4, line 15, at end insert—

'(1A) In assessing the requirements referred to in subsection (1) a local authority should have regard to any disabilities of the parents themselves, as defined by the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 (c. 50).'.

Amendment No. 10, in page 4, line 24, at end insert

', and

(c) must consider the quality of local childcare provision with reference to the Ofsted inspection process.'.

Amendment No. 7, in page 5, line 24, clause 8, at end insert—

'(3A) A local authority must establish a complaints procedure for existing or potential childcare providers who have been disadvantaged by local authorities who choose to provide childcare and related services themselves.'.

Amendment No. 31, in page 5, line 26, at end insert—

[Mr. Deputy Speaker]

'(4A) Where childcare is provided by the governing body of a maintained school it must be both fully co-ordinated with other local provision and with the local Children and Young People's Plan, published under section 17 of the Children Act 2004 (c. 31).'.

Amendment No. 32, in page 5, line 34, clause 9, leave out 'other than' and insert 'including'.

Amendment No. 38, in page 6, line 13, clause 11, at end insert—

'(1A) Assessments of sufficiency under subsection (1) must have regard to any Local Area Agreement relating to the local authority.'.

Amendment No. 59, in page 6, line 28, leave out paragraph (a) and insert—

'(a) consult—
(i) parents and prospective parents in their area,
(ii) early years providers in their area, including those in private and voluntary sectors,
(iii) other persons engaged in activities which may improve the well-being of young children in their area, and
(iv) young children in their area.'.

Amendment No. 39, in page 12, line 33, clause 26, at end insert

', having regard to the Local Area Agreement process'.

Mr. Goodman: As my hon. Friend the Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) has pointed out, three months have passed since Second Reading, which was the last opportunity that I had to speak on the Bill, as I did not serve on the Committee. However, today, along with my hon. Friends the Members for East Worthing and Shoreham and for Basingstoke (Mrs. Miller), I have been placed on the Front Bench to speak on child care issues. It is a pleasure to see the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills, the hon. Member for Liverpool, Garston (Maria Eagle), whom I last saw when we discussed the Disability Discrimination Bill, although at that time, I did not have the chance to have the kind of detailed exchanges with her in Committee and on Report that we might be about to have now.

The new clauses and amendments are about sufficiency, but they are also, no less importantly, about sustainability, contestability and fairness in child care provision. These matters were explored to some degree in the Committee proceedings that I have read, but there is yet more action to be taken on them. The Government are formally signed up to work in partnership with PVI—private, voluntary and independent—providers, and they are very proud of that. When the Minister for Children and Families replied to the Second Reading debate, she gave the House statistics on the child care provision that is made by the private and voluntary sector. She will be aware, however, as the issue was raised in Committee, that some PVI providers and others are concerned that the playing field is not as level as it might be, and that the mixed economy in child care is, to some extent, under threat.

In some ways, local authorities have an advantage over PVI providers. My hon. Friends gave some examples of that in Committee—including that in regard to capital spending—and I shall not repeat them here. However, when these matters were raised in Committee, the Minister for Children and Families responded to a point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) about a National Day Nurseries Association survey by saying

"for his information, the closure rate of all child care businesses, as recorded by Ofsted, has fallen recently . . . Ofsted's statistics suggest that, since the publication of the 10-year strategy, closure rates for these small businesses have fallen dramatically."—[Official Report, Standing Committee D, 8 December 2005; c. 120–21]

Before I turn to the new clauses and amendments dealing with contestability and fairness, I must tell the Minister that the figures that she gave us do not square with information in written answers that my hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke and I have recently received. According to calculations made by my hon. Friend, some 200,000 places closed in 2004–05, up from 59,500 the previous year. That seems to be an extraordinary increase. I tabled a written question on this matter recently and, according to the answer that I received this week, the latest figures reveal that, in the six months to last September, roughly 114,000 places opened, but some 73,000 closed. In other words, the closure rate appears to be increasing. We used to say that, for every two places that opened, one would close. According to the latest figures—which might not be sustained; we shall have to see—it now appears that, for every five places that open, roughly three are closing.

In short, there is a suspicion that the overall growth in the child care market—which we have certainly seen; there is no doubt about that—could be unsustainable, and that we might be entering a dangerous process of growth and contraction. First comes the growth in the number of places; second comes the closure among the PVI providers as local authority-favoured providers exploit the unevenness of the playing field to expand places; finally, there could be a contraction in local authority places as the flow of Government money into child care places continues to increase but slows down.

If that were to happen, such an outcome would obviously be immensely destabilising for parents, who want certainty, and for children, who need stability. The new clauses and amendments aim to provide more stability and certainty by increasing contestability. They would put into effect some of the recommendations from the excellent CBI report entitled "Children First", which I am sure the Ministers have read.

New clause 6 proposes that an obligation be placed on the Secretary of State, and written into the Bill, to publish a code of practice by the beginning of next year that would ensure that local authorities operating a best practice regime—in practice, that is nearly all of them—act in a fair and transparent way with regard to child care. New clause 8 underpins new clause 6 by directly placing a duty on local authorities to act in such a fair and transparent manner.

Amendment No. 60 would help to write sustainability into the Bill. As drafted, the Bill places a duty on English local authorities—the Liberal Democrats need not worry; I am going to deal with Wales in a minute—to "secure, so far as is reasonably practicable, that the provision of childcare, (whether or not by them) is sufficient to meet the requirements of parents in their area".

I understand that there was some dispute in Committee about the words

"so far as is reasonably practicable".

Inserting the words

"and is likely to remain sufficient"

would place a duty on local authorities to ensure that that sufficiency is sustainable. It is evident from the calculations of my hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke, and from the written answers that we have both received, that there is at the very least a question mark over that sustainability.

Clause 6(1) already obliges local authorities to ensure that "the provision of childcare ... is sufficient to meet the requirements of parents ... who require childcare"

so that they can take up work, education or training, which is admirable. Amendment No. 5 adds a new category of parents who require child care to help them "to receive appropriate assistance with children with disabilities or other special needs".

I am sure that we have all encountered that group of parents and children in our constituencies. I recently visited a club in my constituency that provides care for children with disabilities and special needs on Saturdays, in order to give parents respite that is desperately needed. The Minister nods: she knows a great deal about these matters from her previous experience as Minister for disabled people.

Amendment No. 35 obliges local authorities to "have regard to any disabilities of the parents themselves".

Access to child care may be crucially affected if parents have difficulty gaining access to transport. Amendment No. 7 protects the position of "existing or potential childcare providers who have been disadvantaged by local authorities who ... provide childcare and related services themselves" by placing on them an obligation to establish a complaints procedure. Amendment No. 38 proposes use of the local area agreement process, whereby central Government pay bonuses to local authorities that enter into agreed action, to include the creation of a diverse range of providers of children's services or a sustainable local market for child care in England. Amendment No. 39 makes the same provision for Wales.

I have a feeling, based on my experience of previous Bills, that for one reason or another the Government may not accept all the amendments. The Minister may tell us the reason. [Interruption.] My hon. Friend the Member for East Worthing and Shoreham accuses me of pessimism, but it is simply the triumph of experience over hope.

If the Minister has difficulties with our amendments, we shall be keen to hear how the Government will deal with the issues of contestability and transparency. It is clear from the latest child care statistics, which show an increase in the rate of closures, that something very curious is happening in the child care market. Either it is simply a problem of oversupply, or—as the CBI has complained, along with others who aired their complaints in Committee—Government provision is driving some PVI providers out of the market. The question is, as the flow of money slows, what will happen to places that have disappeared and may not be able to return to the market? I look forward to the Minister's reply.

Annette Brooke: I have no great disagreement with the hon. Member for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman). I certainly share his concerns about sustainability. We should, however, also be mindful of the problem of affordability. I am sure that there is a desire for child care, but it may not translate itself into demand for reasons connected with funding. That is an enormous problem for the Government. Large sums are needed to make child care affordable, and I cannot offer an easy solution.

2.15 pm

I want to concentrate on amendments Nos. 5, 13 and 35, all of which deal with the same issue. The Bill does not cover the provision of child care when parents are workless. In Committee, we pointed out that parents might be workless because they were caring, or because they had disabilities themselves. In such circumstances, access to child care might be even more important. I tabled an amendment suggesting that a local authority "may" rather than "must" have regard to providing child care for workless parents. We could be storing up greater costs in the long run by not providing child care, because of the prioritisation of a hard-pressed local authority, when it is deeply needed by both parents and children.

I remember saying that two deaf parents might have hearing children. The children would really need child care, and the ability to socialise more generally. I am still concerned that the Bill does not even use the word "may" to indicate that in some circumstances local authorities throughout the country—not just the best-funded authorities—may need to provide child care.

It could be said that amendment No. 10 is slightly in disguise. Let me explain. I spent a good deal of time in Committee, and indeed on Second Reading, speaking about quality, because I think that it is crucial. However, humbled and crushed into the ground by all the Ministers' answers, I tabled this minimalist amendment. I listened carefully to Ministers who kept telling me that I need not worry about local authorities' monitoring quality, because there were Ofsted inspections. I therefore suggested the additional instruction that local authorities

"must consider the quality of local child care provision with reference to the Ofsted inspection process".

I merely suggest that local authorities should look at Ofsted reports across the board. I hope the Minister will accept that modest, basic requirement in the spirit in which it is proposed by me and by my hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams). We recognised that we must define what we meant by "quality"; defining a baseline in Ofsted terms could do the job.

In February the Government issued "A Code of Practice on the Provision of Free Nursery Education Places for Three-and Four-Year-Olds". Its emphasis on quality is welcome. It states:

"Local authorities may also require other providers of nursery education to participate in a quality assurance scheme".

[Annette Brooke]

In Committee, I pressed the Minister for answers on the Investors in Children kitemark scheme. Although the answers that I received were reassuring, at a meeting of the all-party parliamentary group for children it was clear that early-years providers were again concerned about the future of Investors in Children. It would be helpful if the Minister could update us on the progress of consultation, and tell us whether there is a commitment to maintaining a generally recognised kitemark, or something similar, for quality assurance.

I stress that such monitoring by Ofsted would be minimalist. The problem would be that monitoring might happen only once every three years. However, Ofsted reports can bring strands together. For example, one report observed that there was a high proportion of child care settings in which not all staff were in place at the time of their opening. There is a need for local authorities to keep an eye on such nurseries.

Amendment No. 31, which we tabled, picks up on the idea that we must have a level playing field. The hon. Member for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman) said that there is a worry that it does not exist. The amendment is fairly modest. I favour neither state nor private provision. I have no agenda on that because I come from an authority that relies on the private and voluntary sector for the bulk of its provision, which is good. However, there are reports from all over the country that some of our important private providers are not satisfied that there is a level playing field, so it is critical that that problem is taken on board.

I tabled amendment No. 59 so that we could return to a matter on which we touched in Committee: consultation with all partners and participants, including young children. I have tabled the amendment to a different clause than I did in Committee because the Minister explained to me that it would not be appropriate for young children to participate in making overall strategy. Amendment No. 59 is a probing amendment that tries to encapsulate the importance of listening to all children. Would it not be groundbreaking to include in the Bill a reference to listening to young children? The Government have funded exciting work on listening to young children, so why not have some recognition of that in the Bill? I think that the amendment could be incorporated in clause 11, but I wait to hear otherwise.

Justine Greening: I support the amendments tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman). As hon. Members have already said, the market is mixed. That is one of the values of the market because it ensures that the provision of child care is diverse. An especially diverse group of people lives in my constituency, so the more diverse our provision, the better the choice for my local parents. It is incumbent on the Government to ensure that the Bill facilitates and helps to develop that mixed market, rather than stifles it. It is thus especially important that we have a level playing field for both private child care providers—there are many excellent ones in my constituency—and provision provided by a local authority.

We have heard that for every five child care places that come into being, three are lost, which suggests that there is a huge amount of churn in the market. The Bill places a duty on authorities to assess the local provision of child care, but the churn will make that difficult. It is in everyone's interests to ensure that decisions taken by not only local authorities, but private child care providers, are informed, fair and sustainable so that local authorities do not constantly have to try to assess a situation that is evolving so rapidly that they cannot tell whether the local need for child care provision is being acceptably met.

When we discuss the mixed market, we often forget about the individuals whom we need the market to serve: children. Nurseries may shut down in response to a changing market. However, if the closure is unsustainable, children often find changing their nursery difficult to take. Parents can find it stressful if they suddenly have to find a new child care provider because their existing one was forced out of the market. The more that we can avoid that situation happening unnecessarily, the better.

I especially support amendments Nos. 5 and 35, which would ensure that local authorities would assess parents with disabilities themselves. As my constituency is a London seat, we have perhaps more than our fair share of Victorian buildings, which are not the most accessible in the world. We also have problems with public transport because although the buses are accessible, our local underground is not. It is important that the Bill urges local authorities to consider the accessibility needs and disabilities of parents when determining child care provision so that some people are not disfranchised from a measure that is meant to help absolutely everyone.

Beverley Hughes: I welcome the hon. Member for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman) on his debut to the Front Bench. As he implied, I am well aware of his responsibilities because of the dozens of parliamentary questions that he has assiduously put my way, the answers to which he used to good effect today. It is good to see him on the Front Bench. We are considering a large group of new clauses and amendments, which cover a range of slightly different issues relating to the general matter of sufficiency, so I will try to deal with them in a way that makes coherent sense.

The hon. Gentleman talked about the role of local authorities at the start of his speech. We have stressed the importance of that role throughout the Bill's passage. A local authority is the strategic holder of the ring when making sure that there is a sufficiency of child care places for parents in their area. I appreciate that he wants to utilise all the levers that are already in the system to ensure that there is good local authority practice, sustainability and the level playing field about which he spoke. Several of the amendments represent proposals on best value and local area agreements. Although I appreciate the intention behind them, there is perhaps a misunderstanding about the way in which best value and local area agreements work at present.

There is no need for a separate statutory code such as that in new clause 6 because all the functions carried out by a local authority are automatically covered by the best value regime and the guidance that has already been produced. The new clause would lead to a piecemeal change whereby a different duty of best value operated solely in relation to child care provision. Such a change would be not only confusing for local authorities, but unnecessary.

I can make a similar point about new clause 8 because fairness is an intrinsic part of the best value regime that has already been legislated for. Local authorities must have regard to the combination of economy, effectiveness and efficiency. In doing so, they must also have regard to a range of considerations that include fairness and transparency. New clauses 8 and 6 together imply that special arrangements would be needed for the child care duty, and that is not the case.

Amendment No. 60 relates to future sustainability. Again, I understand what hon. Members desire, and I support that, but the Bill already imposes a duty on local authorities to secure a sufficiency of child care. The word "secure" implies a duty for continuing effect. As long as the duty remains in place and is phrased in that way, the requirement is for the local authority to ensure sustainability in the future. Local authorities have to consider and plan for future changes that may have an implication on the requirements.

Mrs. Maria Miller (Basingstoke) (Con): Will the Minister pick up on the issue that most concerns us? We have teased out in parliamentary questions the sheer volume of places lost in the nursery sector. The figures that she kindly supplied to me only this week show that more than 200,000 places are being lost. We are most concerned about that trend and I would value her specific comments on it.

2.30 pm

Beverley Hughes: I do not think that there is a conflict in the way in which Conservative Members have selected part of the data that is available to us and to Ofsted on the total picture in relation to closure and opening rates of child care places. When referring to lower closure rates, until recently I have referred to total closures as a share of the total stock in places, including full day care, child minders and out-of-school clubs. The Ofsted data show that that rate has fallen quarter by quarter right across the board since the launch of the child care strategy.

I take it that Opposition Members are referring only to private sector places—

Mrs. Maria Miller: They cover the majority of such provision.

Beverley Hughes: Certainly, but there was an implication that the Ofsted data that I quoted were incorrect. The data go right across the board and show that there is much more stability in the sector as whole, although there are changes in the private sector market, as there are in any private sector market.

Mr. Paul Goodman: For the sake of clarity, the Minister is saying that her contention in Committee—that is consistent with the figures that she has given, whereby approximately 128,000 places closed between 2003 and 2004 and approximately 187,000 places closed from April 2004 to March 2005. That is an increase. I do not understand how it is consistent with a 10 per cent. fall.

"closure rates for these small businesses ... have fallen dramatically."—[Official Report, Standing Committee D, 8 December 2005; c. 121.]—

Beverley Hughes: I do not have those figures, but I agree that there is churn in the private sector part of the child care market. It is not significantly greater than the general figures that I have seen on churn in other parts of the private sector market not related to child care. Private businesses stop trading and operating. The level of that in the child care market is not significantly greater than it is in other private businesses. If we look across the sector as a whole, in terms of the number of places that are being opened and the number that are closing, across the piece Ofsted data show that the rate of closure has fallen quarter by quarter since the child care strategy started and that, on balance, the net rate of places is increasing, because the rate of increase is greater than the rate of closure.

Mrs. Maria Miller: It is worth teasing out the information a little further. The figures are clear. We have seen a seismic difference in closure of nursery places over the past two years. The year before last, 59,000 places closed; last year, 200,000 places closed. The feeling we get is that that is reducing the take-up of nursery places. At the moment, the figures show that nurseries are running at 79 per cent. capacity, which is well below the level that is financially viable. That came out in the Public Accounts Committee debate on the subject two years ago.

I want the Minister to focus on that. The difference between 59,000 and 200,000 closures is enormous. As my hon. Friend the Member for Putney (Justine Greening) said, it results in uncertainty for children and working parents, which we are not happy about.

Beverley Hughes: I think the hon. Lady will agree that she is using figures up to the end of December 2004. It is the case that, as the strategy was developing, there was turbulence in the system as private providers came into being. Perhaps they did not have the sustainability and went out of business, and some child care places were lost in that sector. I have not got the relevant figures with me, but I shall ensure that the hon. Lady gets them if she does not have them; however, I suspect that the hon. Member for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman) has them. On reading those figures, she will see that since December 2004 there has been much greater stability, even in that part of the child care market catered for by private-sector providers. So there has been much greater stability not only across the board, but in that particular part of the market, in the past 15 to 18 months. The market is settling down and we are not seeing the degree of churn that existed 18 months to two years ago, to which the hon. Lady referred. That said, I am concerned about this issue. Like the hon. Lady and the hon. Member for Wycombe, we want a diverse and varied market that includes the private sector. As with the voluntary sector, where the private sector achieves good quality provision, we want local authorities to work with it to develop and grow such provision.

I turn to amendments Nos. 38 and 39 and local area agreements. I appreciate the attempt to use existing levers to ensure that local authorities are working in real partnership, but there are several difficulties with citing local area agreements. First, they apply to England only; secondly, they are voluntary agreements and have no statutory basis, so we could not include them Bill. As I have hinted, because the local area agreement process does not exist in Wales, amendment No. 39 is not appropriate.

[Beverley Hughes]

A number of amendments—Nos. 5, 35, 13 and 59—deal with the ways in which local authorities relate to various groups of people who might want to use child care in their areas. On amendments Nos. 5 and 13, the child care needs of many of the carers cited is already covered by the duty on local authorities. They will be in—or be seeking to be in—employment, education or training, so they will be part of the population to whom the duty on local authorities will apply. There are also other initiatives to support carers of children or adults—regardless of whether they are in employment, education or training—through the social care and social security system: the carer's allowance, the carer's grant and council tax discounts.

I do acknowledge that parents and carers of disabled children need breaks, and such children also benefit from new experiences and opportunities to interact with other children, away from their families. However, the point is that we do not need new legislation to achieve that. Section 17 of the Children Act 1989, and standard 8, on disabled children, of the national service framework for children, young people and maternity services, already make such provision. We must look to such measures, rather than expanding the duty on local authorities to ensure such provision for disabled families.

Annette Brooke: I want to repeat my concern that in the light of scarce funds, local authorities will prioritise. Although I appreciate that in some local authorities there may be considerable funding from social services for places, in others there is not, and no increased funding will be coming on board. Unless the Bill deals with this issue to some extent, the focus will be on working parents and some workless parents could be completely left out, simply because all local authorities have to prioritise. The child poverty target has not been met because just one method is being used to get people back into work; other methods need also to be used. If we focus on a single group, others might be totally overlooked. I am genuinely concerned about this issue.

Beverley Hughes: I appreciate the hon. Lady's concern and I know that it is genuine; she raises these issues because of her regard for such people. We are trying to frame a duty on local authorities to provide sufficient child care, and it is important that in doing so, we strike a balance. It is not that the groups whom the hon. Lady mentions are not important; they are, but we are talking about requiring, in law, local authorities to ensure that sufficient child care is available for certain groups. They will be judged accountable according to where we draw the line for that duty, and the Bill proposes that it should be drawn for working parents and the parents of disabled children.

In fulfilling that duty, local authorities will generally make good-quality child care more available across the board, and I have no doubt that it will be available for people outside the groups to which I have referred. We have to decide what we should require local authorities to guarantee, as far as they reasonably can, and the criteria against which we should judge them. The Bill strikes a reasonable balance in that respect, ensuring that there is more child care for other groups, but not imposing a very high threshold of duty on local authorities.

Amendment No. 35 would place an explicit duty on local authorities to have regard also for the requirements of disabled parents when securing sufficient child care. I agree that the needs of disabled parents must be taken into account and accommodated, although not necessarily by this Bill. A new disability equality duty will come into effect in December this year, requiring all public bodies to ensure that disabled people are treated equally. Obviously, that duty will play a part in what local authorities must provide in connection with this Bill, and that is why the amendment is not necessary.

Amendment No. 59 would include on the face of the Bill the groups that local authorities should consult when carrying out their assessment duty. During the Committee stage, we published a paper outlining our intentions in that regard, and that is still available in the Library of the House. It states clearly that local authorities should consult with parents, carers, providers, employers and local organisations to ensure that the provision meets their needs. As I said in Committee, we will require local authorities by means of regulation to take account of the views of children. I hope that the hon. Lady will be happy with that, as it will give us a quality system for assessing sufficiency.

Other amendments deal with the relationship between the private voluntary sector and schools, the two parts of the sector that will provide child care. As part of the level playing field argument, amendment No. 7 would require local authorities to set up an appeals process to handle the concerns of child care providers. We discussed the matter very thoroughly in Committee, and the arrangements in the Bill will safeguard the very valuable role that the private and voluntary sectors play in maintaining the diverse market that we want to exist. However, as I said in Committee, if local providers still feel that they have been treated unfairly, processes are in place to ensure that they can complain to the local authority.

Secondly, we have said that any complaints received by the local authority must be referred to Ofsted for consideration as part of the joint area review. Thirdly, guidance will make it clear that the authority must inform Ofsted about issues raised in complaints in respect of its analysis of sufficiency and other matters.

Amendments Nos. 31 and 32 deal with the role of maintained schools, and once again are similar to amendments tabled in Committee. I still believe that amendment No. 31 is not necessary, as clause 35 of the Education and Inspections Bill will introduce a new duty for maintained schools to have regard to the children and young persons plan. That will take care of the objective contained in amendment No. 31.

Amendment No. 32 is similarly unnecessary. Maintained providers are already subject to quite stringent requirements in respect of the quality of the services that they provide and of the management of their delegated budgets. Local authorities already have to have in place detailed and well established monitoring and accountability arrangements for budgets in schools and other maintained settings. It follows that financial assistance for child care in schools will be closely monitored in that way. Therefore, the amendments are not necessary.

2.45 pm

The hon. Lady rightly pursues the issue of the quality of child care. I hope that she did not feel crushed in Committee, because that was not my intention. I would never seek to do that, especially to the hon. Lady because I know that her sentiments are generally benign, if sometimes a little misguided in terms of how we get where we want to be. I tried to stress in Committee that a substantial part of the Bill—part 3—is about quality, because we are instituting a new regulation and inspection regime, and a new framework for the early years foundation stage as a basis for that regime. That Ofsted framework is the appropriate way to achieve a national consistent standard of achievement. In addition, clause 6 requires local authorities to have particular regard to the need to secure sufficient child care that is eligible for the child care element of the working tax credit. Child care will be eligible for tax credits only if it satisfies the standards set by Ofsted. It does not make sense to require local authorities to duplicate 150 times what we have already established, which is a national organisation that parents trust and that works to consistent standards across the country. That is the way to proceed.

Clause 11 requires local authorities to carry out an assessment of parents' needs for child care. That will not be just an assessment of parents' needs regarding the quantity of child care but of the quality and flexibility of that child care. Our regulations and guidance underpinning that duty will make it clear that local authorities must consider the types and features of child care that parents require.

We have to allow local authorities to exercise leadership in the way that they think best for their area. They are doing so in significant numbers, but that is different from placing them under a requirement that would potentially conflict with or duplicate Ofsted's role. I am the first to agree with the hon. Lady that the quality of child care is crucial, but I do not agree that the amendment is the way to achieve it.

I am afraid that I cannot give hon. Members much comfort in terms of accepting their amendments, but I hope that the reassurances that I have tried to give show that what they seek to achieve is either encompassed in the Bill or in other legislation or regulations. I ask the Opposition to withdraw the new clause and not to press the amendments.

Mr. Paul Goodman: The Minister said a moment ago that she had not given us much comfort. I agree, and I shall explain why by returning to the figures. The key word that she used was "churn" and she said that there is a churning of places. She also said that matters had improved since December 2004. From 2003–04 to 2004–05, according to the parliamentary answer that the Minister kindly provided, 16,000 new places were provided, but some 60,000 were closed. We find it hard to see how that can be a churn. Either there is over-supply or there is not a level playing field in the way that the CBI and the National Daycare Nurseries Association have suggested. It must be one or the other.

In her reply, the Minister essentially said that these amendments are a duplication. That was a lawyer's answer. Saying something is a lawyer's answer is not necessarily an uncomplimentary remark; after all, my party was led by a lawyer until recently, and the right hon. Lady's party still is. I was not for a moment claiming that the right hon. Lady is a lawyer, simply that her answer was a good lawyer's answer, and I am sure that she was assisted by her Department in that. However, it seems to us that although the Bill may contain the measures necessary to ensure that a level playing field is established, it is hard to see them. We do not intend to press these amendments to the vote, but our colleagues in another place will require more reassurance about how the Minister's Department is going to provide a level playing field once the Bill comes into effect. At the moment, there is a very strong suggestion that the playing field is not level.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 1

GENERAL DUTIES OF LOCAL AUTHORITY IN RELATION TO WELL-BEING OF YOUNG CHILDREN

Mrs. Maria Miller: I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 1, line 7, leave out 'reduce inequalities between' and insert

'show how it is raising the quality of outcomes of the most disadvantaged'.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 34, in page 1, line 8, at end insert—

'(c) show how it is raising the quality of outcomes of the most disadvantaged young children.'.

No. 40, in page 1, line 11, after 'health', insert 'development'.

No. 52, in page 2, line 1, at end insert—

'(f) their relationship with their parents or carers.'.

No. 41, in page 2, line 2, leave out 'set targets for' and insert 'establish procedures for assessing'.

No. 2, in page 2, line 5, leave out 'reduction of inequalities between' and insert 'improvement in the quality of outcomes of the most disadvantaged'.

No. 36, in page 2, line 7, at end insert—

'(3A) Procedures for assessing the improvements set out in subsection (3) should be based on quality of outcomes, in accordance with the regulations referred to in that subsection.'.

No. 42, in page 2, line 9, leave out 'targets' and insert 'procedures'.

No. 61, in page 2, line 10, leave out 'met' and insert 'adhered to'.

No. 43, in page 2, line 41, clause 3, after 'facilitate', insert 'and maximise'.

No. 56, in page 3, line 1, leave out 'identify' and insert 'target'.

No. 55, in page 3, line 32, clause 4, leave out 'may' and insert 'shall'.

No. 47, in page 4, line 1, leave out clause 5.

[Madam Deputy Speaker]

No. 11, in page 6, line 37, clause 12, after 'assistance', insert 'for families'.

No. 48, in page 6, line 40, after 'provision', insert ', funding and sustainability'.

Mrs. Miller: I was due to serve on the Committee on this Bill, but because of a double booking with Standing Committee on the Equality Bill, I was unable to do so. Equality won out, which is as it should be. I eventually got here, and the hand of fate means that I am involved at the end of the day. I reiterate the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) earlier about the cross-departmental child care team on the Opposition Benches. My hon. Friends the Members for East Worthing and Shoreham and for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman) are part of the official Opposition's strong child care team, and I am pleased to be part of it too.

In Committee there was vigorous debate, particularly on issues that I shall cover in this group of amendments. It is a diverse group—something of a shopping list—but these are important amendments and are worthy of further consideration. This group focuses on the duties of local authorities to ensure the well-being of children and I shall subdivide it further so that the debate makes sense.

I shall first look at amendments Nos. 1 and 2, which relate to clause 1, about improving the well-being of children. On Second Reading, the Secretary of State stressed the idea of children having the best start in life, and the Opposition wholeheartedly endorse that. We believe that amendments Nos. 1 and 2 would instil that ideal more into the Bill. Our concern is that "the reduction of inequalities"—the wording currently in the Bill—could be interpreted in a number of ways and lacks the clarity that legislation should provide. Clarity of direction is vital. We believe that the Bill needs to focus on raising standards—an objective that we all share. We have heard today that the Government have failed to meet their target for reducing child poverty, and we share their obvious concern about that. Many hundreds of thousands of children who should have been out of poverty remain in it.

We have to focus on what we can do to close the gap between rich and poor, because it must be addressed in terms not merely of targets, which can sometimes create perverse outcomes, but of raising standards for all, especially the quality of experience for the most disadvantaged groups. We believe that the Bill should, and will, set the tone and ethos for what we want from child care. The Bill is important because every child deserves the opportunity to maximise his or her potential.

In Committee, some philosophical differences were expressed about the reduction of inequalities versus improvement in the quality of outcomes. I hope that we can agree that we should continue to work on those points, but we may be closer together than the Committee debate suggested. I refer to an interview given by the Prime Minister on "Newsnight" in 2001, when he clearly stated that the Government's objective was to level things up. He said:

"Surely the important thing is to level up those people that don't have opportunity in our society."

We wholeheartedly endorse that view, which our amendments would make much clearer in the Bill. Our philosophy is simple: to maximise the potential of children so that no child is held back or left behind. The amendments would help to make that clearer to the people who implement the legislation.

It will be useful to deal with amendments Nos. 34, 43 and 56 together. They all refer to improving children's well-being, which relates to the Government's objective of ensuring that we help the people who need it most, which the Secretary of State stressed on Second Reading. The objective of the amendments is to focus the Bill on doing exactly that. As child poverty remains of great concern, I hope that the Government find the amendments useful in ensuring that our objectives in the legislation are clear.

I am sure that the House agrees that we have much to learn from other experience of child care provision. The US head start programme is interesting. It puts tremendous focus on the most disadvantaged families and has resulted in significant, measurable improvements in language, social development and parental interaction with their children, in terms of reading and discipline. In the UK, Sure Start is a welcome help for the most disadvantaged, although it covers only 40 per cent. of disadvantaged children. Indeed, my constituency, which has areas of significant disadvantage, receives no such help, although I am pleased that the situation will change in the future with the establishment of children's centres.

As the Minister of State has stressed, when I have put questions about the results of Sure Start, these are early days, but is the programme targeted enough on the most disadvantaged? In the light of the national evaluation of Sure Start, will the Minister consider whether more can be done directly to underpin and support the most disadvantaged groups, especially those important groups that the research showed were as yet unsupported by the programme—lone parents, teenage mothers and workless households. We all feel that they deserve more support.

We all want to improve the well-being of children in the broadest sense, but it is vital that support for the most disadvantaged is at the heart of our discussions. All three amendments would focus resources more actively on those most in need, which we hope will do most to help children in poverty. The proposals would not merely facilitate but maximise access to the services on offer and not merely identify but target the parents most in need, making the Bill much more active and its support more directed.

We are concerned about the structure of the Sure Start programme, which needs some attention. It is rather loose and variable in execution, so it can be difficult to measure outcomes. Our key concern is that we are ensuring help for those who need it, and perhaps that is not ingrained in the implementation of Sure Start to date, as evidenced by the Birkbeck study, which was published in November 2005. I am, of course, aware of the supplementary pamphlets and notes that have been issued as a result of that research. I ask the Minister to comment on whether she feels that that background is sufficient to cause the change that we probably need to see in Sure Start to underpin those important groups.

3 pm

The Government clearly have continuing problems with poverty levels. We have been targeting to reduce poverty, but hundreds of thousands of children whom the Government were hoping to lift out of poverty have not been removed from it. The Institute for Fiscal Studies has estimated that an additional £1.4 billion will be needed to hit the Government's targets by 2010. Obviously that is down to the Chancellor, who must ponder and think about it. We accept on both sides of the House that work is an important way out of poverty. Indeed, that was reiterated this morning by a Minister speaking on behalf of the Department for Work and Pensions during an interview. The Bill is an important way to support parents with the aim of getting back to work in mind. If we are to ensure that the proposed legislation reaches its maximum potential, there may be room to consider the amendments to ensure that we are focusing our activities in the right direction.

Amendments Nos. 40 and 52 were tabled to offer some support and help in improving the well-being checklist. What is on the checklist will dictate the approach that the local authority takes. As we all know, what happens to us as children influences us for the rest of our lives. The way in which we assess the progress of children is of paramount importance.

Amendment No. 40 is about the physical and emotional health of children. I am sure that we all realise that mental health is a long-term issue that develops over time. It is not static, and cannot be considered at only one point in time. We need to consider the mental health development of children, and that is a continuing process.

As for amendment No. 52, there is the recognition that children's relationships with their parents are important in their long-term well-being. I was somewhat surprised to see that that was not recognised in the Bill, particularly after some of the debates that we have had recently on the Children and Adoption Bill, during which we all agreed on the importance of the relationship with parents. This should be a pivotal element of the well-being checklist, and I ask the Minister to consider that carefully. The amendment would lead to a constructive improvement.

With amendment No. 36, we try to draw attention to the importance of the quality of outcomes. As part of improving the well-being of children, we are improving access. We are also improving the quality of child care on offer. We have already discussed our disappointment that so many private and voluntary nursery places have come to an end, although there has been a net gain. We see that as a positive move, but we are concerned that 200,000 places have been closed.

We need to ensure that when, or rather if, the Bill is enacted, local authorities focus on quality, not quantity alone. We feel strongly about that, and the issue was debated thoroughly in Committee. It is worthy of being set out in the Bill, and the amendment would do that. It would put into the Bill the importance of quality and the importance of raising the quality of outcomes, which should be at the heart of the legislation.

Amendments Nos. 41, 42 and 46 have been tabled to encourage better acknowledgement of the importance of giving local authorities some room to manoeuvre in their local approach to putting child care in place in their areas. We all know that our constituencies are diverse—Basingstoke is a mixture of suburban and rural communities—and even within a single constituency and local authority area the Bill will have to deal with a great deal of diversity. The amendments would give the local authorities the ability to adapt to local needs, and more autonomy, making sure that they were not just driven by centrally dictated targets but could take into account what was happening in their own communities.

Amendment No. 55 has a specific aim, and echoes the debate about "may" and "must" in Committee. Clause 4 deals with the duty of local authorities to work with relevant partners such as the national health service in the delivery of integrated child care. Members on both sides of the House will agree that collaborative working is vital if the Bill is to succeed. The Bill makes it clear that local authorities must work with their relevant partner agencies, and clause 4(4) says that they "may . . . provide staff, goods, services, accommodation . . . and maintain a pooled fund."

That wording suggests that there is a choice. The Government may have overlooked that usage, but we need to be certain that that is the case.

We know from debates on the health service that there is enormous pressure on finances in this area, and that one in four primary care trusts are in financial deficit. When we talk to Ministers about the provision of services in other areas we are told that that is the responsibility of local management. I have asked Health Ministers on a number of occasions about the provision of local health services in north Hampshire, but they tell me that that is dictated by local management. We need to take that into consideration when we assess this part of the Bill. Can the Minister explain where the well-being of children will fall in local NHS priorities? The amendments recognise the need for a statutory directive in the Bill to ensure that it can achieve what it sets out to achieve.

Finally, after that rather long shopping list of amendments, amendment No. 47 would remove clause 5. Under that clause, the Minister could redefine the nature of early childhood services, thus giving her unlimited powers to change the group of people whom the Bill is intended to help. How would those services be redefined? Will she explain why that provision was included by telling us when and why it would be used? I commend the amendments to the House, and I look forward to the Minister's response.

Mr. Michael Wills (North Swindon) (Lab): Briefly, in the light of the comments by the hon. Member for Basingstoke (Mrs. Miller) about local autonomy, I would welcome reassurance from my right hon. Friend the Minister that levers will be in place in future so that her Department can ensure that the money given to local authorities will not be diverted from the poorest children in the poorest areas of each local authority. I would also welcome an assurance that the Department will continue to monitor local authority spending so that it remains focused on the children who need it most.

Annette Brooke: I listened with great interest to the hon. Member for Basingstoke (Mrs. Miller) because, as many of us recall, the subject matter of amendment No. 1 generated a great deal of debate in Committee. I explained at the time that I had intended to support it—until I heard the arguments for it. Despite the fine words that we have just heard, amendment No. 1 would rip the heart out of the Bill. It is essential that "reduce inequalities" be left in.

I was interested in the Conservative amendment because it had been pointed out to me that inequalities could be reduced by pulling the more advantaged down. Despite clause 1(1)(a), I still have a concern that that could happen, so I tabled amendment No. 34, with which I tried to achieve the best of all worlds. I stole the Conservatives' words, left in "inequalities" and added paragraph (c) to make the same point.

As a belt and braces measure I tabled another amendment, which was not selected but might be even better. If paragraph (a) read that sounds like quite an undertaking, but the phrase "every young child" is used elsewhere, so there is a precedent. I could not support amendment No. 1 which, by removing "reduce inequalities", would undermine everything in the Bill.

"improve the well-being of every young child in their area"

Several amendments refer to targets. We discussed that in Committee and we are all concerned about targets being centrally set and possibly having unintended consequences. There is an argument for requiring the monitoring of performance, rather than the setting of targets.

Our amendment No. 11 relates to the duty to provide information, advice and assistance. My hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams) proposes that clause 12(1) should state:

"An English local authority must establish and maintain a service providing information, advice and assistance for families in accordance with this section."

I have previously expressed great concern about the fact that in the entire Bill there is no mention of families. This, if anywhere, is where such a reference should be. We want advice for parents and support for children, but the relationships and dynamics within the family are greater than the sum of its parts, whatever form the family unit takes. If clause 12(1) included a reference to families, we would ensure that information about a raft of family support measures was available. That small amendment would greatly enhance the Bill.

We have had a useful debate on this large group of amendments and tackled the underlying philosophy of the Bill. The wording of clause 1(1) and (3) could be improved to make doubly sure that we do not reduce inequalities by pulling the more advantaged down.

Ann Coffey (Stockport) (Lab): I shall speak briefly on amendment No. 1, which seeks to remove the general duty on a local authority to "reduce inequalities between young children in their area" and replace that with

"show how it is raising the quality of outcomes of the most disadvantaged".

After we debated the matter in Committee, it was still unclear why the Conservative Opposition want to remove the provision, and their position remains unclear.

In Committee, Conservative Members argued that each child should be treated individually and not in relation to another child. The Bill includes a general duty to improve the well-being of young children in an area, and the hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) suggested in Committee that there could be a perceived duty in some areas to make it more difficult for the best nurseries, because by allowing them to flourish inequalities are somehow increased, although I am not sure how that would happen.

3.15 pm

Mr. Paul Goodman: My hon. Friend the Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) was making this point: when one attempts to reduce inequalities, one first attempts to bring up the standard of those who have fallen behind, but if one cannot do that, there is only one other option—bringing down the standard of those who are ahead.

Ann Coffey: I am not sure how that could possibly happen. The hon. Gentleman's comment reflects the Conservative party's general paranoia about levelling down. Conservative Members seem to think that there will be a huge move up and down the country to lower outcomes for the better-off in order to achieve a reduction in inequalities. I do not know how they think that will happen or the mechanism that they think we will use.

Mr. Goodman: It is simple: the law depends on the words in the Bill, which are "reduce inequalities". If it proves impossible to bring up the standard of those who are being left behind to those who have gone ahead, there is only one option, which is to bring down the standard of those who have gone ahead to those who have been left behind.

Ann Coffey: The hon. Gentleman has demonstrated the paranoia to which I have referred. I do not understand what mechanism will be used to achieve that levelling down.

Edward Miliband (Doncaster, North) (Lab): Since the Bill was in Committee, the right hon. Member for West Dorset (Oliver Letwin), who is policy chief of the Conservative party, has given an interview to The Daily Telegraph, in which he said that it is a priority to reduce the gap between rich and poor—in other words, to reduce inequalities. Conservative Front Benchers may be out of step with their party on this issue.

Ann Coffey: I thank my hon. Friend for sharing that policy development with Conservative Front Benchers, who are clearly unaware of it. A concentrated effort would be required from all public agencies on levelling down, because all the evidence suggests that better educated and better informed people are, for example, changing their diets, taking more exercise and attending preventive health checks, with the result that their life chances and those of their children are improving at a better rate than those of less well informed people. I imagine that the only way to lower outcomes for the more advantaged would be to stop them getting information in the hope that they will stop doing the things that are improving their health.

All the evidence suggests that more effort is required to find ways to improve outcomes for the most disadvantaged. The hon. Member for Basingstoke (Mrs. Miller) has argued that outcomes will improve for the most disadvantaged if effort is concentrated on them, so it does not matter that outcomes for the advantaged are rising. However, if the gap widens and less advantaged people perceive that their life opportunities are much less than those of more privileged people, then they will think that the situation is unjust, and it will become more difficult to sustain a multicultural, diverse community.

Mrs. Maria Miller: My argument is focused on raising standards for the most disadvantaged, and I have tabled amendments to focus more of our resources on that group. I feel that we are running the risk of not focusing enough of our energy on those who need help most, and perhaps by inference we are focusing some of our energy on those who do not need help as much.

Ann Coffey: But focusing on inequalities means that resources are focused on those who have least. That is what a target to reduce inequality does. I do not understand the problem that Conservative Front Benchers have with this.

Returning to relativities and the importance of ensuring that the gap between rich and poor does not increase, I do not want to hark back to the past, but there is a generation of young people in my community who are difficult to help, to train and to employ. They grew up under a Government who believed that relativities did not matter and therefore ignored widening inequalities. I am glad that Conservative Front Benchers are addressing that offending behaviour, but I feel that they still have not quite got it.

Justine Greening: Action is more important than rhetoric. Under this Government, social mobility has dropped rather than increased. I am pleased that I am in my mid-30s, not my mid-teens, because the prospects for me now would be far bleaker than they were when I was 16.

Ann Coffey: That is the most unutterable rubbish that I have ever heard in this Chamber. The investment in children's centres is a recognition that we have to do something about disadvantage from an early age. Providing a general duty to address inequalities will lead to the development at a local level of policies that take particular account of helping the most disadvantaged because of the way in which that service provision will then be developed.

For example, extra cash for improving school meals may make a local authority consider giving a subsidy to parents who are just above the level for qualification for free school meals. That would encourage parents to let their children have school meals instead of lunchboxes. As part of that initiative, parents might be encouraged to come in and talk about diet. That might help to reduce inequalities in outcomes in the long term. Without a duty to address inequalities, there will not be the same kind of pressure for innovative thinking at a local level to ensure that in every policy area thought is given to ensuring that outcomes for the most disadvantaged are improved.

Tim Loughton: That is what the amendment says.

Ann Coffey: Of course that is what it says—that is why I do not understand the hon. Gentleman's problem with the clause on inequality.

I have come to the conclusion that addressing inequalities, beyond warm words, is a step too far for the Conservatives. I believe that this duty, with a huge investment in early years, will mean that from an early age, when it matters most, parents will be supported and extra help will be given to those children, who without it will grow into another disaffected generation excluded from any real opportunity to change their lives.

Dr. Roberta Blackman-Woods (City of Durham) (Lab): Before I begin my remarks on amendment No. 1, I want to say what a great privilege it was to serve on the Standing Committee that scrutinised the Bill. Of course, all Standing Committees are riveting, but this one was in a league of its own, as Members from all parties vociferously debated their case. Several divisions arose, particularly on clause 1.

On Second Reading, some of my hon. Friends may not have given enough attention to the importance of clause 1, which does two remarkable things. First, it places a duty on local authorities to improve the well-being of all young children in their area. Secondly, local authorities must reduce inequalities between young children in their area—but not, as the hon. Member for Basingstoke (Mrs. Miller) suggested, by dumbing down. As subsection 1(a) and (b) make clear, inequalities can be reduced only by improving outcomes for the least well-off more quickly and to a greater extent than for others, so that they catch up and the gap is reduced. We debated that at length in Committee. I am sorry that the hon. Lady was not there to hear that debate.

We had many vibrant exchanges in Committee. In the end, the Conservatives did not like the idea of reducing inequalities; instead, they wanted to raise the quality of outcomes of the most disadvantaged, and tabled a similar amendment to that end. The problem is that, if the outcomes for all children continue to improve, those at the bottom could be left even further behind. We know that inequality matters, especially in societies such as ours, where we deal largely with relativities—relative poverty and relative disadvantage—and where parents want to provide more than the basics for their children. At least the Tories made their stance on the issue clear in Committee; the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke) was less clear.

Annette Brooke: If the hon. Lady would like to look back at the speech that I made on Second Reading, she would see that I welcomed the mention of the reduction of inequalities. As I have explained, my reason for being concerned about the expression used is the fact that inequality could be reduced simply by bringing the top down, and if subsection (1)(a) relates simply to an average, that is still quite compatible. Even now, an amendment to that subsection is needed—it is not foolproof. However, hon. Members will recall that I was horrified by the comments of the hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb). No one could dispute the fact that I certainly believe in the reduction of inequalities, and we must talk about less-advantaged children gaining ground more rapidly than others.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I think that the hon. Member for City of Durham (Dr. Blackman-Woods) wanted to continue.

Dr. Blackman-Woods: I was referring, of course, to the fact that the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole abstained in the vote on a similar amendment in Committee, and we all concluded that the Liberal Democrats were ambivalent about whether to reduce inequality.

To return to the importance of clause 1, the Child Poverty Action Group reminds us:

"Inequality is damaging because access to goods and services of those on the lowest incomes is intimately connected and affected by the spending power of the richest. Unless the gap between incomes of the richest and poorest is reduced we will continue to be divided by differential, income-related access to the opportunities in society".

So it is terribly important—if we want to reduce inequalities, which Labour Members certainly do—that clause 1 stays exactly how it is, and we celebrate it.

I was not going to make this point, but I am so incensed by the remarks of the hon. Member for Putney (Justine Greening) that I have decided that I need to say something about child poverty. Under the last Conservative Administration, childhood poverty in this country increased massively. At least this Government have started to take enormous numbers of children out of poverty. If you want, I will send you the figures, so that you know exactly how many children were put into poverty by the previous Government.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind hon. Members that when they use the word "you" they are referring to the occupant of the Chair, not to the hon. Member whom they have in mind.

Justine Greening: I hesitate to engage in such a debate again—the one in Committee was particularly heated—but I want to take this opportunity to reassure Labour Members of my own genuinely good intentions in supporting the amendment. All I want is the outcomes of the most disadvantaged children to improve, and stating that explicitly in the Bill would make it absolutely clear to local authorities. I fully understand the concerns, but there is a need to include that explicitly in the Bill, which is why I support the amendment.

3.30 pm

Edward Miliband: I shall make a brief contribution because Conservative Front Benchers have unwittingly revealed the problem with today's Conservative party. On the one hand, Conservative Members use rhetoric that makes it sound as though they are caring, sharing, modern and interested in a fairer society, but when it comes to reality, they oppose the concept. Since my earlier intervention, I have done further research and I have a copy of the interview with the new policy chief of the Conservative party, the right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin), in The Daily Telegraph on 23 December 2005. He said:

"Of course, inequality matters. Of course, it should be the aim to narrow the gap between rich and poor."

I do not know whether the Conservative party's policy chief scrutinises Front-Bench amendments but, on the basis of the interview, I cannot believe that he would approve of an amendment that would remove the aim of reducing the gap between the rich and the poor.

Mrs. Maria Miller: Of course we are talking about the gap between rich and poor and we take that seriously. Surely the hon. Gentleman should take seriously the Prime Minister's statement on the matter. In a "Newsnight" interview in 2001, he said:

"Surely the important thing is to level up those people that don't have opportunity in our society."

Perhaps the problem that we are revealing today is the gap between the hon. Gentleman and the Prime Minister.

Edward Miliband: I think not. It is clear from the Bill that we both want to improve the well-being of young children and reduce inequalities between them. However, amendment No. 1 would remove the notion that the gap should be reduced. There is a simple explanation for that: in its heart, the Conservative party and its Front Benchers do not want to reduce the gap between rich and poor—they do not believe in that. That is a valid position, but it would be better to admit it. They are at odds with the remarks of the Conservative party's policy chief. Conservative Front Benchers may shake their heads but there is a blatant contradiction between the amendment and the words of the Conservative policy chief.

Tim Loughton: I have sat silently listening to that complete twaddle, although it is reassuring to find that a few subjects remain on which the old class war mentality of the Labour party leaps to the fore. If we suggested that we should favour the best off, the hon. Gentleman would have a good case. If we suggested that the gap should remain, he would have a good case. However, the wording of the amendment would replace "reduce inequalities" with "show how it is raising the quality of outcomes".

That does not mean doing nothing; it means actively raising the quality of outcomes of the least advantaged. That is our intention.

Edward Miliband: If class war is being waged, it is being waged, rather uncharacteristically, by the right hon. Member for West Dorset, who appears to have converted to what the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) describes as "class war"—reducing the gap between rich and poor. However much the hon. Gentleman wriggles or squirms, the policy chief of the Conservative party said that he wants to reduce the gap between rich and poor but the amendment would remove that wording from the Bill. Increasing the outcomes of the most disadvantaged is perfectly consistent with widening the gap between rich and poor. That is at odds with what the Conservative party claims to be its policy.

Annette Brooke: It is almost as if crumbs were enough for one group and a feast for another.

Edward Miliband: I agree with the hon. Lady. The Bill should be passed as it stands. Conservative Members need to do some more homework, and especially to read what their policy chief said.

Beverley Hughes: Many of my hon. Friends have stolen my thunder in terms of replying to the debate, but I am grateful to them for doing so. Perhaps I can be briefer as a result.

We have had a short rehearsal today of the debate that we had on this matter in Committee. It is clear that the Conservatives still have not fundamentally understood what we are trying to do. Either they do not understand our intentions or they still feel uncomfortable with them, as they are again trying to take the words "reduce inequalities" out of the Bill. As hon. Members have pointed out, the two paragraphs of clause 1(1) have to be read together. The first provides that an English local authority must "improve the well-being of young children in their area", and I am advised by parliamentary counsel that that means all young children in their area. The second paragraph provides that the local authorities must "reduce inequalities". It is clear, if the two provisions are read together, that it is possible to achieve those outcomes only by taking all children upwards in terms of achievements, and by doing so at a faster rate for disadvantaged children. That is how we will close the gap.

The Conservatives are talking the talk, but they cannot yet walk the walk. They have not yet internalised a genuine commitment to the protestations of the right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) and of their own leader, who has said that the test of Conservative policies will be to show

"how they help the most disadvantaged . . . not the rich".

The Conservatives' amendment is inconsistent with the policies that their own leaders are putting forward. To echo the points made by my hon. Friends the Members for Doncaster, North (Edward Miliband), for City of Durham (Dr. Blackman-Woods) and for Stockport (Ann Coffey), I just wonder whether the Conservative leadership is aware of the amendments that have been tabled. We hear their protestations in the media, but their default position, which we have seen in Committee and again today, is to be against reducing inequalities and not to be prepared to see our provision written into the Bill.

I am glad that the hon. Member for Basingstoke (Mrs. Miller) and her party now think that child poverty is something that we should be reducing, rather than increasing, as happened under the previous Conservative Government to a massive extent. If we had continued in the direction in which they were going, the number of children in poverty would have increased by more than 800,000. This Government are going in the right direction.

Amendments Nos. 40, 36 and 52 deal with the definition of well-being. There is considerable misunderstanding about the intention of these amendments, because they attempt to rewrite the Children Act 2004, the "Every Child Matters" policies, and the five outcomes enshrined in those provisions. The Childcare Bill is using those five outcomes as the basis for the outcomes duty and other provisions, which is why we have incorporated them as they are. They are the outcomes that children and families identified, and they were endorsed in the 2004 Act. We are really not in the business of rewriting them now. I agree that relationships with parents are important, certainly in helping to achieve those outcomes, but local authorities should not be responsible for the quality of relationships between children and their parents. However, we want to help parents to support their children. We are sticking with the five outcomes, and that is why I am unable to accept those three amendments.

I am quite puzzled by amendments Nos. 41, 42 and 61, which deal with target setting. We have just had a big debate about the importance of improving outcomes for children and the duty on local authorities to achieve that. The amendments would replace the targets for local authorities to achieve those outcomes with "procedures for assessing". I am at a loss to understand how the Conservatives feel that criteria for judging whether a local authority has achieved those outcomes for children can instead be defined as "procedures for assessing". They seem to want to replace an outcome criterion with a process criterion. That is not what we are about. We are interested in outcomes. That is the bottom line, and that is the basis on which the targets for local authorities will have to be decided. They will be decided in conjunction with local authorities, but they will relate to outcomes, not to how well authorities are dealing with the process.

Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West) (Con): Will the Minister give way?

Beverley Hughes: I beg the hon. Gentleman's pardon, but I will not. He has only recently come into the Chamber, which I think is discourteous.

Tim Loughton: He's very good.

Beverley Hughes: He may be very good, but he has not listened to the debate, and on that basis I will not give way to him. Had he listened more, I should have been happy to do so.

Amendment No. 47 proposes to remove the ability to amend the definition of early childhood services. Had the hon. Member for Basingstoke either been in the Committee or read the report of this part of its proceedings, she would know that I granted what she is asking at that stage. I said that I envisaged the power being used only in the event of, say, structural changes in individual Departments such as the Department of

[Beverley Hughes]

Health or the Department for Work and Pensions that necessitated technical amendments, or if the experience of practitioners and local authorities made clear that young children would benefit from the inclusion of other services or other relevant partners. I have now put on record twice the circumstances in which we envisage the possibility of that power being used.

Amendments Nos. 43 and 56 concern access to services. I believe that amendment No. 43 risks creating a perverse incentive. If authorities need to "maximise access" to early childhood services, there may be a danger of their encouraging groups of parents to take up services that they do not need. That would prevent resources from being devoted to the most disadvantaged, which is what the hon. Member for Basingstoke said she wanted. Changing "identify" to "target", which is proposed in amendment No. 56, is unnecessary, because clause 3(3)(b) requires local authorities to encourage parents who have been identified to take up services. I hope that the hon. Lady will accept my assurance that the amendment is not necessary.

Amendment No. 55 would remove any local authority flexibility in the sharing of resources with relevant partners. I think that we should leave the position as it is. Local flexibility is important. Resources are already being pooled, and I think that the judgment on when that is beneficial should also be made at local level.

Amendment No. 11 deals with information for families. I have some sympathy with it. Our intention is to focus resources on information for parents and carers, because they will be the most responsible and will have the most influence. I appreciate that in many cases other family members will act on behalf of parents. I shall make clear in guidance that, in the right circumstances—obviously not when it is against parents' wishes—they too will be able to have relevant information.

As for amendment No. 48, we know that funding and sustainability are key issues for local authorities planning child care. In Committee, the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) confirmed that he did not expect authorities to look into the future to determine whether a provider was likely to last. Regulations under clause 12 will require local authorities to provide detailed information about providers, including their registration status, how many places they have, and how many funded places they offer. Authorities will also be required to tell parents how to gain access to Ofsted inspection reports that may include information. It is not clear to me what further information authorities would be expected to give other than their own assessments of sustainability, which could be misleading. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not press the amendment.

There are issues that I have not mentioned, including the point raised by the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke) about Investors in Children. I can tell the hon. Lady that I am not convinced of the need for continuation of a kitemark scheme. However, I said to her in Committee that we are working closely with the National Children's Bureau to see what other arrangements we can put in place, supported by the sector—that is appropriate—to enable the funding that goes to local authorities to be used to ensure that there are local schemes. That will ensure that there is continuing development and improvement through those quality assurance schemes, which is the right way to go.

I hope that the hon. Member for Basingstoke will think that I have replied sufficiently for her to withdraw her amendment. Certainly, there is still a considerable political divide on amendment No. 1 and I make no apologies for not accepting it.

3.45 pm

Mrs. Maria Miller: I am sure that many people listening to the debate will share my disappointment that the Government still hark back to eight years ago and the records of bygone days, rather than starting to talk about their own record. They should do less of that and instead take account of their record and be responsible for it.

The amendments in the group are important and I am sure that they will be debated further in the other place when it considers the Bill. The debate on the role of parents has been useful. I was glad to gain agreement from the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke) on the fact that it is quite extraordinary that the Bill makes no reference whatsoever to the role of parents. I hope that that can be thought about a little further.

It is clear from the Minister's comments that, perhaps unsurprisingly, we are not going to agree on targets. We feel that a target culture is not helpful in always driving the right outcomes, but we will have to agree to differ on that point.

I want to pick up on the Minister's response on the pooling of resources. I am pleased that she is satisfied that we can leave a slight open-endedness when ensuring that partner agencies are compelled to take part in discussions and provide staff and resources locally for child care. I hope that she is right that that will be sufficient to secure the support that is needed. Knowing the financial position of my primary care trust in north Hampshire, which is £14 million in deficit, I find it difficult to see how great priority is going to be given to the matter in the future. I am sure that all those issues will receive further discussion in the Lords.

Returning to our discussion on "mind the gap", which has taken up most of the debate on this group of amendments, I am pleased that the Prime Minister agrees with us that it is levelling up that is important. We are entirely happy with the idea of reducing the gap between people who are disadvantaged and those who are not, but we believe that that is best done by raising aspirations. People listening to the debate will find it difficult to understand why Government Members take such exception to our argument. As a parent, I understand why many parents throughout the country believe that we should have better aspirations for our children—whether we come from the most wealthy or the most deprived areas of the country. We believe that if we put raising aspirations at the core of the Bill, we will make it better.

Peter Bottomley: As the Minister rightly said, I was not here at the beginning of the debate—I was chairing a churches meeting elsewhere—but I want to pick up a specific point on assessment. To talk about well-being by itself is useless to parents. I do not know how one would count it or measure it. If we go back to the Court child health report or the Plowden primary school report, we see that everything in them is measurable and there are procedures for assessing them. I hope that the Minister will reflect on what she has said and, if she will not accept the amendment now, talk to her officials and get better advice than she has offered to the House.

Mrs. Miller: My hon. Friend makes an excellent point; I wish that he had been able to make it a little earlier.

Edward Miliband: I want to give the hon. Lady one last chance to redeem herself in the eyes of the right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin). Given the words from him that I read out in the House, does she not agree that an amendment that would remove the words "reduce inequalities between" is a problem for her and, if she persists, she may well have to explain herself to the right hon. Gentleman on Monday.

Mrs. Miller: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his intervention. I was trying to give him one last chance to say something new, but he failed to do so.

I am entirely in accordance with my fellow Wessex MP, my right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset. We are entirely at one in our need and our desire to reduce the gap, but we are saying that it is about raising aspirations, not some vague notion of reducing inequalities.

These issues are not mutually exclusive. We can reduce the gap between those who are less well off and more in need, and those who are not. We can do that most effectively by raising aspirations and raising standards, and that is what we would like the Bill to focus on. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 18

MEANING OF CHILDCARE

Beverley Hughes: I beg to move amendment No. 15, in page 10, line 17, at end insert—

'(6A) "Childcare" does not include care provided for a child who is detained in—

(a) a young offender institution, or

This is a technical amendment that corrects an error—an omission from the definition of child care in clause 18. It will ensure that young people in young offender institutions and secure training centres will not be considered as being in child care. That means that local authorities will not be under a duty to secure sufficiency of provision or to assess provision under clauses 6 and 11 respectively. It is clearly not appropriate to describe young people in those institutions as being in child care. The amendment will ensure clarity in the Bill and I commend it to the House.

Peter Bottomley: I do not think that the Minister has justified her amendment. We know that the children who are most likely to be casualties are those in care. We know that the children in care who are most likely to be casualties are those in secure institutions. The Minister is shaking her head. Does she want to tell me that I am wrong? If not, I shall work on the basis that she agrees with me. It is the children of the state who have the most awkward lives and are likely to face the worst constellation of difficulties as they grow up.

If the local authority has no responsibility for the welfare of the child in the circumstances that the Minister described, who will carry out that duty effectively? My hon. Friend the Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) and I have experience of children who are parked in our town, in small children's homes. Many of them get dedicated care, and many of their experiences are not good. [Interruption.] I will give way, if the Minister wants to intervene.

We are debating an amendment tabled by the Government, who believe that they have wrongly drafted legislation. At present, local authority social services can have some interest in a child in secure accommodation.

Beverley Hughes: It may help the hon. Gentleman to get to his point if he understands that the Bill is about children aged nought to five and the duty of local authorities in terms of the outcomes for children aged nought to five—not their general well-being—and the provision of child care for children aged nought to 14. Patently, young people in institutions do not fall into that category.

Peter Bottomley: The point that I am trying to make, to which I hope the Minister was listening, is that we can use the amendment to focus attention on those whom she is trying to exclude from the Bill's provisions. She may need to do that for technical reasons, but if she is saying that we are wrong to be concerned about the interests of children who would otherwise be covered in theory, she is wrong. One thing that the Government should do is to direct their attention to improving the situation of children in the circumstances that I described.

The Minister may say that the peg for that is purely a technicality. She may say that the amendment is purely a technicality. However, the lives of the young people who concern me are not a technicality. They are at a stage when some of them have a chance of redemption and of getting a positive experience of life. The sooner she acknowledges that the better. She gave bland responses to the points made by Conservative Front-Bench spokesmen on the previous group of amendments. She can rightly say that nought to five does not cover those people, so the amendment does not relate to them, but the welfare of older children, whose circumstances would otherwise be covered by the Bill, does matter. I hope that the Government take that forward in a more positive way and that there is a process of assessing the outcomes, rather than just having targets.

Beverley Hughes: The situation of young people in young offender institutions is important. The Government take it seriously. However, it is outside the scope of the Bill.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 41

THE LEARNING AND DEVELOPMENT REQUIREMENTS

Annette Brooke: I beg to move amendment No. 9, in page 20, line 16, leave out from 'which' to 'and' in line 17 and insert

'young children should experience and learn, appropriate to their age, ability'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 8, in page 20, line 16, leave out 'taught to' and insert 'experienced by'.

No. 51, in clause 46, page 23, line 4, at end insert—

'(1A) The reasons for any such disapplication or modification must be set out clearly and published.'.

No. 53, in page 23, line 10, at end insert—

'(3) The reasons for any such disapplication or modification must be set out clearly and published.'.

Annette Brooke: This is the most important part of our discussion. We might have had a lengthy and sparky debate on the previous string of amendments, but to my mind learning and development is the most important issue to address.

I welcome the principles of the early years foundation stage, which lays out the basis of a curriculum so that we can make clear judgments about quality, which is set against milestones. Indeed, the early years foundation stage provides opportunities. However, including the word "taught" means that there is a great possibility of unintended consequences.

As we know, young children learn by being supported to play and by exploring the world around them. That must be reflected in the learning and development requirements. It is difficult to incorporate in the Bill the reality that children learn through play, which is why in Committee we tried to replace the word "taught" with "experience". As that was rejected, and bearing in mind the clause heading, we have redrafted the amendment to include experiencing and learning.

There is a concern that we might give out wrong messages to child care practitioners. We all know that we have much work to do in upskilling the work force. With the inclusion of the word "taught", it will be all too easy to incorporate practices that do not generate the type of learning that we would like young children to gain at such a key phase of their development.

Mr. Paul Goodman: Does the hon. Lady agree with the Daycare Trust, which in its comments on the Bill is worried that the Government's approach could lead to a "schoolification"—a new word—of early years provision for very young children?

Annette Brooke: That comment probably does reflect my concerns. As I said in Committee, the word "taught", whatever the dictionary definition, has connotations: it implies a group of young people, children or adults receiving instruction, rather than learning by experience at the right level.

4 pm

The anecdote that I want to mention came from a former inspector of early years, who, on looking through some Ofsted inspection reports, noted that the early years report said that worksheets were not being used. The provider in question responded by providing worksheets, but generally speaking, they are not appropriate at that level. The danger is that we will make this incredibly important stage of learning far too formalised. We will not achieve what we could achieve through this Government's vast investment in early years provision unless we ensure that there is the right environment and culture.

What we really need to do is to add depth and richness to children's lives. They need to have plenty of opportunities to explore the world, and plenty of experiences that they can choose from for themselves. Such learning must not be so prescriptive that we stunt—

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Does the hon. Lady not agree that the clause's existing phrase embraces experience and learning and does not necessarily have to be interpreted in an over-formal, over-prescriptive way? Why does it need amending?

Annette Brooke: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his intervention, which has actually underlined the point that the word "taught" is incongruous. In fact, it is incompatible with the guidance notes that the Minister distributed in Committee, which were almost encouraging in terms of how providers should approach the early years foundation stage. We are simply objecting to the word "taught", which I sincerely believe should be changed, as all early years providers agree. Whatever the civil servants may be saying, we should look to the professionals in this field.

Early years is the most important period: it impacts on future life experiences and attainments. During early years, children should be in a setting that provides a relevant and positive learning experience, so that they can develop a sense of their own identity—not that of the child care worker—and become self-confident learners. This is about setting the scene for a hopeful and positive education experience, which inevitably becomes more formalised once children go to school. At that early stage, it is absolutely vital that we enable children to develop at their own pace and give them every opportunity to learn and to assimilate as much as they possibly can. Children learn at different rates, and they must want to learn and be ready to learn. When we use the word "taught", which has specific connotations, we should remember that the ratio of pupils to teachers is usually higher than one to one. At this critical stage, we have to allow children to progress at their own rate.

I hope that we will get a positive response from the Government. This issue was debated in detail in Committee, and I felt that between us, we were winning the argument; however, it was not to be. As I have said, this is the single most important change that needs to be made to the Bill, and I hope that the Government are now listening.

I turn briefly to the amendments tabled by the Conservatives. They will be useful in securing further clarifications, as the answers in Committee to the questions that they raise aroused great unease. Clause 46 allows exemptions to the early years foundation stage to be granted to certain providers. The worry is that they could be granted here, there and everywhere, with the result that we lose the basis for quality assessment.

I understand that there might be a very good reason for granting an exemption in the occasional, one-off case, but clause 46 implies that exemptions could be widespread. I and my hon. Friend the Member for Hazel Grove (Andrew Stunell) hope that the Minister will say more about how the clause will be implemented, as I feel that there could be a case for deleting it entirely.

Tim Loughton: We support the amendment, as the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke) has shown again that she shares our approach to these matters. It is worth noting that the phalanx of class-war dogmatists has scarpered now that we are dealing with serious technical matters to do with the quality of child care. The fact that their interest has waned rapidly says a lot about their presence earlier, and reveals their limited interest in what the Bill is trying to do.

Amendment No. 9 centres on the use of the rogue word "taught". We concur that it is completely inappropriate for very young children, especially those aged between nought and two. I shall not rehearse Professor Bowlby's attachment theory, which the Committee considered in some detail, but it is clear that very early years children must be treated very differently. Whether or not the term "schoolification" is apt for the attempt to impose curriculums on them, the approach itself is simply not appropriate.

I draw some comfort from the more enlightened contributions made by Labour Back Benchers, and I welcome what the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) said a moment ago. Alas, the hon. Member for Bishop Auckland (Helen Goodman) is no longer present, but in Committee she supported our case. She spoke at length about peek-a-boo games, but also about children. She said:

"I have a great deal of sympathy with the points made by Opposition Members about the use of the word "taught" ... However, if we concentrate on taught literacy, we risk turning off small children."—[Official Report, Standing Committee D, 15 December 2005; c. 251–252.]

The first two years of a child's life are especially important, but too often the Government seem to want to rush to push young children through a regimented school system. They want to tick the boxes about children's ability to read, write and add up, but they do not give those children enough time and space to grow up and become sociable, well ordered and normal kids. That is the problem, and I fear that talking in the language of school curriculums does nursery-age children a big disservice. The Minister may say that "taught" is only one word, but it is a very important one whose use, we feel, sends out all the wrong signals.

The hon. Lady said presciently that if the Minister did not accept the amendment that we proposed in Committee she would be realistic and seek on Report to change the word "taught" to the phrase "experienced by". Well, hey presto, the hon. Lady's word is our command. Our amendment would do exactly that, because we feel that the phrase "experienced by" is much more sympathetic to the social development that should be going on in those child care environments, rather than a mini school curriculum, which is what the Government run the danger of being perceived as trying to thrust on them.

We had an interesting debate in Committee on the issue, with some excellent contributions from my hon. Friend the Member for Putney (Justine Greening), with her great tales about "The Very Hungry Caterpillar", on which she is the House's leading authority.

Amendments Nos. 51 and 53 seek clarity and to add transparency to the Bill. I do not know the conditions under which exemptions should be conferred by the Secretary of State, such that the learning and development requirements need not apply or can be modified. We are in danger of ending up with a bit of shambles unless we have a clear steer from the Minister as to what the exemption offer is trying to do and in what terms and on what occasions it might be used. The amendments request clarity and transparency in the Bill and seek to ensure that if any exemptions or disapplications are made, the reasons must be set out clearly and published, so that everybody can understand them and be sure that we are all acting on a level playing field or whether the fear of a two-tier system is justified.

We support the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole on amendment No. 9, which concurs with the intention of amendment No. 8. If she does not choose to push that amendment to a Division, I hope that the Government will nevertheless reflect on the point again in the other place. We all share the same intentions and the Minister's response to my pronouncements on the merits of attachment theory suggested that she concurred with our view on what we should be trying to achieve in those early years. However, the language that the Bill uses will be adhered to by local authorities and child care providers when they seek to do what the Government want them to do. They are in danger of throwing baby out with the bath water, by trying to make baby grow up rather faster than baby needs to, because baby needs to learn about how to be a decent child before getting into a school curriculum. The word "taught" smacks of schoolification.

Maria Eagle: I hope to be able to provide some reassurance, although in the light of our experience in Committee I am not convinced that I will be able to allay completely the concerns expressed by the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) or the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke). I do not think that there is much between us. I know that the word "taught" is between us, but I hope to try to provide some reassurance.

It is important to use the word "taught", and it does not necessarily imply the extreme formality that Opposition Members fear. It is a term recognised by the early years sector, and reflects the language already used in the foundation stage and in the Education Act 2002. It does not necessarily imply sitting toddlers in rows and cramming them with rote learning, no matter what age they are. I accept that "taught" can have that connotation, but it does not necessarily have it.

[Maria Eagle]

The hon. Lady will forgive me if I return to the dictionary definition because dictionaries, especially the Oxford English Dictionary, are the basis from which we start when interpreting what we mean by the words that we use. Although it is true that the dictionary includes formalised definitions of "teach" such as "to impart information to skill to (a person) or about (a subject) . . . do this for a living . . . put forward as fact or principle", another definition is more informal and is what we intend the work of the early years foundation stage to be. It is to "cause to adopt (a practice etc) by example or experience".

That uses some of the words that hon. Members are trying to replace "taught" with.

4.15 pm

My argument is that "taught" encapsulates what hon. Members are seeking to replace it with. To remove the word completely leaves us thrashing around to try to make sure that we can encapsulate fully the meaning of what we are trying to say in the legislation. Clarity is important in legislation.

This is not conclusive, but some technical defects with amendments Nos. 8 and 9 make it difficult for them to be accepted. They illustrate what could happen if we were to remove a word such as "taught" from the Bill, as amendment No. 8 would do by removing the word "taught" from the "matters, skills and processes" that practitioners should offer young children of different abilities and maturities and replacing it with reference to the matters, skills and processes that young children should experience by their involvement in or exposure to learning and development. That is a complicated way of removing a word from the Bill, and does not add to the clarity of the meaning.

Amendment No. 9 would have a more complex effect because it would remove the word "taught" from the Bill by replacing the phrase

"which are required to be taught to young children of different abilities and maturities" with

"young children should experience and learn, appropriate to their age, ability"

The effect of that would not be clear, because it would allow learning and development requirements to specify the matters, skills and processes that young children should experience, and it is hard to see how matters and skills can be experienced. I do not think that it would add to the clarity of the Bill if we were to adopt the wording that either amendment suggests, although I understand the point that hon. Members are making.

Andrew Stunell (Hazel Grove) (LD): I have been listening carefully to the Minister's argument, although I have had difficulty in following some of its intricacies.

If the hon. Lady accepts that the alternative words proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke) cover the full range of what she wants to achieve and if she is arguing that the word "taught" covers not only that but something that she does not want to achieve—young children being taught formally—does she not agree that it would be better to accept my hon. Friend's words? If they need tidying up, perhaps the hon. Lady could give us a hint that she will go in that direction. She seems to be trying to achieve something far beyond the aims behind the initial wording of the Bill.

Maria Eagle: No, I do not accept that. I said that the words with which Members have tried to replace the word "taught" are fully encapsulated in that word, so they add nothing. I have tried to illustrate that removing "taught" would make it more difficult to understand the clause. I understand the points that are being made about formality in education at too early an age, which we debated extensively in Committee. I do not think that there is much difference between us in respect of the outcomes that we want.

Removing the word "taught" will not solve things or add clarity in any useful way. It is well known in the early years sector, and is clear in "Birth to Three Matters" and the foundation stage documentation that "taught" means much more informal learning than that for older children.

Annette Brooke: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Maria Eagle: Yes, but I do not want to go round in circles.

Annette Brooke: Will the Minister confirm that in Committee it was established that the word "taught" does not appear in "Birth to Three Matters"? We are particularly concerned that we seem to be combining the whole age range.

Maria Eagle: But the word "teaching" does appear in that document. We could go round in circles for a long time, but our positions are close enough not to worry too much about that definition. I cannot accept the amendment, but there is not too much difference in substance between what we and Opposition Members are saying. "Taught" is only a little word, but it is obviously a central concept and we need to make sure that everybody understands it fully.

There will be further opportunities for us to make it clear that we are not talking about extremely formalised learning. There will be regulations and we shall hold consultations on them. There is ample opportunity to ensure that there is no misunderstanding in the sector about what we mean.

Justine Greening: Will the Minister give way?

Maria Eagle: I will, but this really is the last time.

Justine Greening: I am grateful that the Minister recognises that there is confusion. Parents in Putney have expressed concern about the word "taught" and that should be borne in mind as the measure is rolled out in the wider world, to allay parents' fears that the framework is more rigid than the Minister intends.

Maria Eagle: I hear what the hon. Lady says—her constituency surgeries must be interesting.

As we draw up the regulations, there will be more opportunities to deal with the issues—

Mrs. Maria Miller: Will the Minister give way?

Maria Eagle: No, I shall not give way again on that issue.

I want to move on to amendments Nos. 51 and 53, which were tabled by the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham. He asked me to provide more clarity about the waiving of learning and development requirements in certain circumstances. I want to reassure him that the measure will not drive a coach and horses through all our early development aims.

Such a waiver might occur where a local authority had difficulty in securing the training required to improve the skills of the local child care work force by 2008. For example, a small provider such as a playgroup might not technically yet fulfil all the requirements of the early years foundation stage, but could none the less offer an excellent service, or be not too far from being able to do so; the staff might be undergoing training but not have completed it. We would want the provider to improve so that it could deliver the framework rather than closing it down for a short period until the staff managed to gain the required qualifications. There could thus be a time-limited exemption so that the provider was not closed down when the early years foundation stage was implemented.

We want to provide flexibility, while ensuring that quality is maintained and improved. We also want to take into account some of the practical difficulties that small, local organisations might experience in getting themselves up to scratch as we make the transition to the early years foundation stage.

The hon. Gentleman suggested that it would be appropriate to publish the reasons for exemptions, disapplications or modifications in respect of individual children. It would, however, be unfair to single out individual children in that way. Indeed, Members said earlier, with reference to another matter, that they did not want data about individual children to be published, yet the amendment seems to suggest that we should do just that.

The situations that we are talking about are likely to be very rare. For example, it might be necessary to exempt specific individual children from certain aspects of the early years foundation stage where it is necessary because of their parents' religious beliefs. For example, I understand that members of the Plymouth Brethren do not really like information and communications technology, and they do not like their children to work on computers. If work on a computer does not conform with a parent's religious belief, even though that is a minority religious belief, it may be appropriate to exempt an individual child from requirements that relate to ICT.

We are talking about smallish and individual exceptions such as that. We do not anticipate that the provision would be widespread or extensively used. We want to try to provide the necessary flexibility to ensure that we are not riding roughshod over important matters such as human rights and the rights of individuals to follow their own religious beliefs, for example.

I hope that that reassures the hon. Gentleman, and that he will feel able to withdraw his amendments. I am sure, however, that hon. Members will feel less happy to withdraw their amendments in respect of the word "taught", and I fear that we might continue to have that debate in another place.

Peter Bottomley: The Minister has been quite convincing on amendment No. 53. I hope that the interpretation of that is that the parent will be told why their children are being exempted from certain things. Obviously, it is at the request of the parent that no information is to be given. If there is some reason why the parent has not asked, it is perhaps worth bearing in mind that parents should be told of the situation. That is a different sense of the meaning of "published"—not keeping secret.

As I think the Minister recognises, she is not on quite such strong ground on amendment No. 51. The main point of the debate is about the word "taught". The Minister explained that "taught" meant the same as "experienced by", and then explained that "experienced by" necessarily did not mean the same as "taught". It seems that that is where she got out of her circular argument—on the wrong spot. It would be a good idea if before this issue comes up in another place the Minister were to seek advice and would ask what would be lost—

Mrs. Maria Miller: I thank my hon. Friend for allowing me to intervene. I wonder whether he shares my concerns. The Minister was talking about drawing up regulations. When doing so, should she not take account of the impact that formalised teaching may have on premature babies who are still struggling to catch up in development terms during the important early years?

Peter Bottomley: The Minister may choose to respond again at the end of the debate, or she may want to consider this question when it comes up in another place. If the clause were not in the Bill, I do not think that anyone would miss it. Most people who are caring for children, especially in an early education setting, are trying to do all these things in any event. Given that the clause is in place, the Minister should be asking those whose opinions she respects—I hope that she respects our opinions in this place, but there are others whose opinions she may respect—that if "taught" means the same as "experienced by", cannot "experienced by" mean the same as "taught", and would not that then be satisfactory?

Annette Brooke: I drew a diagram, and I think that the hon. Member for Worthing, West (Peter Bottomley) has expressed the situation clearly. I drew a circle to incorporate everything that "taught" meant. Learning and experience was clearly a sub-set of "taught", so "taught" means a great deal more than learning and experience. That is clear.

[Annette Brooke]

The Minister questioned whether learning and experience could be applied to matters and skills—but when I visited the most excellent early years centre that I have ever seen, there was complete free choice for all the young children. Nothing was structured. The experience led me to ask some questions. I was given an example. If, for instance, some children decided that they wanted to fly kites, and it was found that there were not enough kites, others who wished to join them would have to make kites. For that they would need to find scissors from the cupboard. They would need to find paper. They would use scissors because they wanted to make kites, like the others. That is a clear example where one might say, "You must be taught how to use scissors." However, in the early years, we are talking of a skill that is acquired by learning and experience, when that skill is wanted. I question whether the Minister is right on this point.

4.30 pm

Peter Bottomley: We have been taught that the word "taught" has six letters. The sixth word after the word "taught" in clause 41 is "abilities". Perhaps the Minister should table a manuscript amendment to change it to "aptitude" as the Department has found it difficult to distinguish between the two.

Annette Brooke: That could take us down another route. The task in hand is to remove the word "taught"; so if the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I will concentrate on that.

I cannot stress enough the importance of changing that word. I am happy to accept that the drafting of the amendment is not perfect, but, having served on many Committees, I know that when one wants to say something, it is worth trying to write the amendment oneself, because if it makes a good point, professionals will rewrite it. I am concerned about the impact of the provision on professionals in the field.

A great deal of consultation is under way to establish exactly what the early years foundation stage will include. There is a great deal of confidence about those discussions, but there is not confidence among professionals while the word "taught" remains in the Bill. Their anxiety is much greater than the Government have conceded. Given the lateness of this debate I am not going to press the amendment to a Division, but I very much hope that Ministers will give a great deal of thought to the matter as the Bill proceeds to the other place. The amendments are certain to discussed further, and I expect that there will be professional input in the other place. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

GENERAL INTERPRETATION ETC.

Maria Eagle: I beg to move amendment No. 16, in page 50, line 32, at end insert—

'(f) the Council of the Isles of Scilly;'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendment No. 17.

Maria Eagle: I hope to deal with these amendments very quickly. Government amendment No. 16 refers to the council of the Isles of Scilly, which we have rather stupidly omitted from the definition of an English local authority. We clearly need to include that council in the Bill. Government amendment No. 17 ensures that the National Assembly for Wales can commence at the appropriate time the provisions in schedule 2. These are technical amendments, and I hope that the House will accept them speedily.

Tim Loughton: I am a little worried, as the good burghers of the Isles of Scilly must be seething, about an obvious omission that should have been addressed at the outset. Goodness knows, the Government have had enough time to deal with this. The Under-Secretary skimmed over it in a single sentence, but I would be grateful if she gave us an insight into the structure of the education authority on the Isles of Scilly so that we can understand why the change is essential.

Peter Bottomley: If the omission had not been spotted and the amendment had not been tabled, this is the kind of change that the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill could properly deal with. The Government would be well advised to ensure that such a change would be covered by that Bill. The Minister ought to congratulate the person who spotted the omission.

On Government amendment No. 17, it is right to pay tribute to those who advise the Minister and are involved in the drafting of the Bill. When a Bill proposes amendments to nine Acts, things are as complicated as they can be, especially in relation to consequential changes. Those who do that work deserve praise. The work is not as exciting as some of the policy changes and arguments, but detailed attention to what is in a Bill does matter.

Maria Eagle: I am happy to do as the hon. Member for Worthing, West (Peter Bottomley) suggests and pass on the congratulations of hon. Members to my officials, who work extremely hard to make sure that Bills are as good as they are. Although nothing is perfect, they frequently approach perfection, in my experience.

As for the comments of the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) about the education system in the Isles of Scilly, I can tell him that there is a population of 2,000 there. I cannot tell him how many of those people are children, but because the population is so small, the islands may require separate arrangements with regard to provisions in the Bill. I hope that is enough to satisfy him.

Order for Third Reading read.

4.36 pm

Beverley Hughes: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

Our debates on the various stages of the Bill have been productive, constructive, at times humorous, and well intentioned. I pay tribute to the commitment that Members in all parts of the House have shown, and to the detailed knowledge that many of them have brought to our deliberations as a result of many years of interest in the subject, going far beyond our experience as parents.

Apart from the one, albeit fundamental, dividing line between us on reducing inequalities, we have achieved a remarkable degree of consensus on the principles of the Bill and its aims. That is a measure of the extent to which the Government have shifted the ground. Such transformational change as we have seen over recent years, culminating in the Bill, in marked contrast to the previous Government's policies, commands consensus across the political parties.

The Bill has benefited from the close scrutiny to which it has been subjected, and the changes that have been made have improved it. I thank the Deputy Speakers who have chaired our discussions today, and our Chairmen in Committee. I thank the hon. Members for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) and for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke), who led the debates from the Opposition Benches, and their hon. Friends. I also thank the Under-Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Garston (Maria Eagle), and all my hon. Friends who have taken such an active part in the debate and helped us enormously, and I thank the Clerks and our officials, whom my hon. Friend has just mentioned, who have supported us ably throughout. I am grateful to everybody.

Let me put the Bill in the context of Government objectives since 1997 of transforming the experience of children, young people and their families. We are doing that, first, because we are serious about increasing social mobility, reducing inequalities and tackling the long-standing disadvantages for many children and families that existed prior to 1997. Secondly, we need to respond to the labour market changes that have occurred over recent years, the aspirations of women as well as men, and the desire for both parents to have the flexibility of combining work and home life in ways that still provide high-quality options for their children.

Thirdly—we have not discussed this issue, but it is none the less important—as a nation, we need to maximise the achievement of all our people in the face of increasing global competition, which includes rising economies such as China and India. We must ensure that every child reaches their potential and goes on from early years to educational success. Investment in early years is not only a social and moral imperative, but an essential measure for parents in their home and work lives and for our international economic competitiveness.

The Government have worked to bring about that transformation since 1997. We started with a massive increase in child care places and moved on to the Children Act 2004, the "Every Child Matters" programme, the five outcomes, the 10-year child care strategy, the promise of a children's centre in every community and extended schools, and this landmark Bill extends that process. It is the first ever Bill dedicated to early years and child care, which demonstrates our commitment to early years and "Every Child Matters". We are providing opportunities and choice, improving outcomes, reducing inequalities and increasing long-term investment.

The Bill focuses on outcomes and ensures that parents have a real choice. The Bill empowers local authorities to be the strategic leaders, which is a role that they will fulfil in consultation with parents and providers. Parents will be given the information that they need, and there will be a new approach to inspection and regulation. The early years foundation stage will build on what works and good parenting, and the child care register will extend quality. Last but not least, the need to safeguard children underpins the entire Bill. That is everybody's business, and we will discuss it in greater detail when we consider the Safeguarding Vulnerable Groups Bill, which has been mentioned today.

The Bill is important and exciting. It starts to redraw the welfare state in terms of what families can expect to be provided for them locally in their areas. The focus is on quality, improving outcomes for children in early years and reducing inequalities. The Bill is an integral part of our "Every Child Matters" programme, and it will ensure that every child has the opportunity to achieve their full potential.

It is good to see the commitment of Opposition Members to the Bill, which I commend to the House.

4.42 pm

Tim Loughton: I echo the Minister in saying that we had well-mannered, good-humoured and well-informed debates on Second Reading, in Committee and on Report. I thank the Committee Chairmen, my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) and the hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Benton). As has happened today, we conducted our deliberations in Committee without guillotines or knives, and the lesson is that we can have a rational debate without being constrained by artificial timings, which the Government Whips too often seek to impose.

I thank my hon. Friends who have contributed. Our Whip in Committee was my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous), who was here earlier today. We witnessed bravura performances by my hon. Friend the Member for Putney (Justine Greening), who mentioned "The Very Hungry Caterpillar". My hon. Friend the Member for Bromsgrove (Miss Kirkbride) is very well-informed, but, alas, she is abroad today and cannot join us. My hon. Friend the Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) made a cameo appearance on the Front Bench this afternoon, when he was the target of so much vitriol from Labour Members—he has now scarpered, as have some of his attackers.

Many additional amendments have been tabled. It assists debate if we can have as much notice and as detailed an up-front explanation of those as possible. If the Government intend to table further amendments, I hope that they give colleagues in the upper House a little more breathing space by supplying them as far in advance of the debate as possible.

We welcome the additional measures to safeguard children. As the Minister knows, over the past few years we have fully concurred and co-operated with the Government in their various Bills to try to make the protection of our children, particularly vulnerable children, a genuine priority and to achieve some genuine change from the poor outcomes that they have experienced for far too long. It is absolutely right that this Bill, like the other legislation that is yet to come before us, should be proof against those who would abuse and undermine our children.

There are other good things in the Bill. The Minister called it a landmark Bill and said that it is part of the redrawing of the lines of the welfare state. That suggests that the Government set rather more store by the great dogma of their programme than we do. As far as we are concerned, the Bill is about affording more people the chance to access quality child care to improve the start that their children get in life, whether they come from disadvantaged or advantaged backgrounds. That is why we have wanted to concentrate on those from a disadvantaged background getting those opportunities as well.

It is interesting, amusing and reassuring that we can occasionally rattle the great class warriors who still exist on Labour Benches, albeit in a rather confused way that contradicts their own Prime Minister. They set great store by phrases about reducing inequalities instead of concentrating on improving outcomes for those who need and deserve our support most of all. I do not think that those two things are mutually exclusive. It is interesting that there have been so many attempts to put divisions between what Members say. All that we are trying to achieve is better outcomes for the most disadvantaged, but for many, the argument about reducing inequalities is more important.

The hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke) rightly said that one of the most important parts of the Bill concerns the word "taught"—just six little letters and one little word. We had a great debate about that. The Minister was at pains to say that although there was little between us, that one little word was so fundamental that it had to stay in the Bill. That is a shame, and I hope that the Government will reflect on it. My noble colleagues in the upper House will certainly return to the subject as the Bill proceeds.

It was encouraging that we almost had a rebellion from the hon. Member for Bishop Auckland (Helen Goodman), who has also scarpered. She threatened to vote with the Opposition at one stage and abstained in one vote. Given her great expertise on early years child care and the whole subject of play for children, the Government would do well to listen to her comments.

The Government accepted many of our arguments and sympathised with many of our intentions, but in the end they did not accept any of our amendments. That is disappointing.

It is worth pointing out that the success of the Bill will rely enormously on the way in which local authorities embrace, interpret and enact its provisions, which of course bring no additional moneys with them.

All our discussions in the House will amount to nothing unless local authorities are able to do their job of ensuring that there is sufficient child care and that it is provided in a balanced way, because many of the private and voluntary independent providers, who have provided so much child care in the past, are threatened by unfair competition. The child care places that are lost must be set aside the creation of new ones. We admit that the net figure has increased, but the sustainability of those places is important.

The Bill is not just about the numbers or the shiny new buildings that may house those child care places, whether in nurseries or whatever, but about the quality of provision and ensuring that we are giving those children the very best start in life. That is absolutely fundamental. We can write all the terms into the Bill that the Government wish and we can exhort local authorities to ensure that the numbers tally with what the Government want, but the most important thing is the quality of the outcome that the Bill achieves for those children and its impact on them, particularly in those crucial early years—years one, two, three and four.

We welcome the Bill. We have supported it throughout, but we want it to work in practice. I hope that the Government have taken on board the serious concerns that we have expressed throughout our good debates. I hope that they will reflect on them and that, when the Bill reaches the upper House, they will allow some of the amendments that our noble colleagues table to see the light of day and be included in the legislation. Ultimately, we support the Bill. We wish it well, and we will certainly support its Third Reading this evening.

Annette Brooke: May I, too, thank the Chairmen, Deputy Speakers and all the hon. Members on both sides of the House who have participated in Committee and on Second and Third Reading? I certainly agree that we have had some very good debates—perhaps longer ones than I had anticipated, given the nature of the Bill—on some rather interesting issues. I particularly thank my hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams) for picking up some rather important Welsh omissions and for emphasising the rural nature of some of the child care settings in Wales.

It has long been Liberal Democrat policy to invest in children's early years, and we are delighted that the Government have proceeded with a large commitment since 1997. I know what a difference that has made to my constituency. I am sure that many children will be much better prepared for life. I am pretty convinced that we will eventually see some very goods returns on a lot of the Sure Start schemes. Whenever we—I use the royal "we"—are rather punitive towards young people, I hope that the early intervention that is taking place will make a real contribution to our local communities and society, and I mean that very sincerely.

I was going to count the number of times that Ministers have said "Oh, that's going to be in the regulations", but I found a better use for my time. They said that an incredible number of times in Committee, and that has been followed up at the same pace, if not an increasing pace, today. That makes scrutiny rather difficult. I am sorry that we could not have more information as we went through the Bill. I admit, of course, that we could not do so, because consultations were going on. I would not want to impede the consultations, but the lack of information seems a pity and it has made things difficult at times, because we have moved amendments to be immediately told, "That's all right: it's in the regulations"—but we have not seen them.

I also welcome the additional safeguarding measures. Although we mentioned safeguarding in our deliberations in Committee, experiences in school settings before Christmas heightened our awareness and made it important to table such amendments. The Safeguarding Vulnerable Groups Bill will also deal with some of those issues.

We have discussed quality at great length and we can never lose sight of its importance. As has been shown, it makes all the difference to outcomes, especially in the very early years. I am not convinced that we have managed to include enough about quality in the Bill, but we had good debates about it.

I would like to believe that the Bill will make a difference. Clause 6 states:

> "An English local authority must secure, so far as is reasonably practicable, that the provision of childcare . . . is sufficient".

Without the resources, "reasonably practicable" will mean minimal. I hope that the Government will monitor that to ensure that the Bill makes a difference. It may well be necessary to provide a top-up in resources. We must not make false promises to our constituents. The words in the Bill are generally good but, without the resources, they will not mean anything for our constituents. They will not make the genuine difference to the disadvantaged about which we all care, however we express that.

I sincerely hope that the word "taught" will be changed, but I have probably said enough about that for one day. I support Third Reading.

4.56 pm

Peter Bottomley: My hon. Friend the Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) and I have adjoining constituencies and it falls to me to express my party's thanks to the Conservative Front Benchers, my hon. Friends the Members for Basingstoke (Mrs. Miller), for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman) and for East Worthing and Shoreham. I add my hon. Friend the Member for Bexleyheath and Crayford (Mr. Evennett), who has paid close attention to everything that was said.

Perhaps it is too late to suggest to Ministers that the title of the Bill should be changed to "Early Years Well-Being". When considering the well-being of children up to the age of five—or up to the age of eight if one takes account of part 3—it is important to reduce the avoidable disadvantage, distress and handicap that they may face and to improve their well-being, which is a mixture of wealth and welfare. The development stages, which part 1 covers, are vital.

Although the measure is primarily about the duties of local authorities, everybody in local authorities will want to involve parents. Trying to develop the confidence and competence of parents is the key to developing the confidence and competence of children in the early stages and building on that through the primary school years, secondary school years and adult life.

Earlier, I referred briefly to the Plowden report, which was published in 1967. The research papers are worth rereading and I commend them to people in local authorities as well as to those who advise Ministers. The Court report on child health services again showed that parents' actions matter. There is no point in relying on what local authorities or health services can provide if we do not engage parents in what they can do. The reports may be 30 to 40 years old but, if the work was redone now, the same conclusions would be reached. What was learned in Home Start and what Sure Start is introducing are lessons that are not especially new. Every generation needs to relearn them.

The bipartisan approach to the issues that local authority responsibilities cover matters. We have the problem—of challenge—of trying to ensure that that gets across to parents in all parts of the country in every generation. If 600,000 to 700,000 children are born each year and at least half are first children in a family, many new parents need to know what is available, what their child's experience will be and what the normal hiccups, obstacles and problems are. All those who dedicate themselves to children, whether in the voluntary sector or in other ways in their professional lives, matter a lot.

My final word of caution is to enthusiastic Ministers in this third way, new Labour Government. Life did not start in 1997, and nor did the co-operation between health and education. It has been said in a slightly jokey way that, when my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) was booked into a hotel room at a party conference with his wife, Lady Young, they were the Ministers for the under-fives in health and education, and that the two Departments have had better dealings with each other ever since.

We need to monitor the outcomes that people have worked for. When my wife, who is now in another place, was Minister for Health, she was as concerned about these matters as Ministers are now. I suspect that Ministers will be coming to the House in five or 10 years' time to report on the measurable outcomes. The issue of whether reducing inequality—which is not how I would have put it—or raising people up from levels at which they should not be allowed to stay is the more important will become clear.

An example of inequalities for the elderly in our constituencies is that they have to wait nearly two years for a hearing aid, but if they go privately they can get one almost straight away, for a vast sum of money. We could reduce that inequality by saying that people should not buy hearing aids privately. Alternatively, we could reduce the level of unfairness by saying that everyone should get their hearing test and their hearing aid within 18 weeks. I commend that to the Ministers as well.

Blackpool to Fleetwood Tramway

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Alan Campbell.]

5.2 pm

Mr. Gordon Marsden (Blackpool, South) (Lab): The Blackpool to Fleetwood tramway, which spans 10.4 miles from Starr Gate to Fleetwood and carries 6.5 million passengers a year, is genuinely unique. Opened in 1885, it remains the oldest continuously operating UK tramway. Along with the tower, the winter gardens and the Big One, it is the thing that defines Blackpool for millions of people in Britain. The tramway has also been a star of the silver screen, from the films of George Formby with his little stick of Blackpool rock to the shocking demise of Alan Bradley, who was crushed under the wheels of a tram in "Coronation Street", and, most recently, the BBC hit drama series, "Blackpool".

The tramway also annually frames and garlands the greatest light-show in the UK, the illuminations, and the best way to see the illuminations is still by tram. The Under-Secretary of State for Transport, my hon. Friend the Member for Halton (Derek Twigg), as a north-west MP and a history enthusiast, will appreciate all this. He will also understand the pivotal role that the Blackpool to Fleetwood tramway has played, not only in our broader social history but in the identity, life and success of Blackpool as a seaside resort, not least because hundreds, if not thousands, of his own constituents will have travelled on Blackpool trams.

However, just as Britain cannot live in the past, neither can Blackpool. At 120 years old, the tramway is showing its age. It is in urgent need of modernisation and renewal. It serves not only Blackpool but Cleveleys and Fleetwood, which is why Blackpool council and Lancashire county council have come together on a bid that is enthusiastically backed by all the Fylde coast MPs. I want to emphasise at the outset that the bid is not a heritage project, as some people have suggested.

It is not something that could be hived off for lottery funding elsewhere, even if the necessary sums were available. Nor is it a tourism project. Some 60,000 people use the tramway every day in Blackpool as a vital element of work and daily travel in the town. It is vital in particular because a larger than average number of elderly people live in Blackpool, and Blackpool still has the lowest car density in the north-west. Having used the tramway to travel from my home and office base in South Shore up to North Shore, I know that it is still a very important practical link—and the journey is of course very evocative, whether one is seeing winter gales or summer sunshine over the Irish sea. Ultimately, the tramway meets a core transport need for the residents of Blackpool and the Fylde coast.

The Blackpool scheme should not be regarded as a blue-sky scheme. It must not be seen as part of the network of assorted light rail proposals that have been submitted to the Department for Transport in recent years, however worthy they may be. For my constituents, this bid is an essential bread-and-butter—or perhaps, as we are talking about Blackpool, I should say fish-and-chips—component of public transport.

The revised project cost of £88 million, of which the Government would contribute £72 million, covers the delivery of fully accessible platforms at stops, new rolling stock which would include articulated trams and low-floor trailers for older trams, a major programme of track renewal, the complete renewal of the electrification from Thornton Gate to Fleetwood, and the revision, substantial extension and modernisation of the tram and bus depot.

If any evidence is needed of the urgent need for this project, I can draw the Minister's attention to the following facts—and they are facts. Less than a quarter of the existing track is in good condition. More than 55 per cent. of it requires attention now and in the near future. A full tramway service from Starr Gate to Fleetwood has not run in any winter since 2001, and the winter of 2004–05 saw Manchester square closed to tram travel south to Starr Gate. Indeed, on that occasion a £1 million emergency maintenance scheme funded by the Department for Transport was needed to retain access to the depot. The worst part of the track is between Central Pier and South Pier, but the electrical infrastructure north of Cleveleys is powered from a 60-year-old electrical substation, and there is an urgent need for track renewal if the whole system is to remain open beyond 2006–07.

The tramway is key not just for Blackpool and Fylde in the present, but for Blackpool and Fylde in the future. An updated tramway is crucial to Blackpool's continued regeneration efforts, and to the success of the town's master plan. Not only would the proposed scheme provide a mass transport system for Fylde coast regeneration by linking Blackpool with Cleveleys and Fleetwood; it would provide the option in future years for further developments to the coast south of Fylde, with considerable potential for links to Blackpool, North and Blackpool airport.

The tram will deliver the economic and social benefits of resort regeneration by providing a high-quality public transport link between the central area and the main tourism destinations, including some of the large hotels. Transport is a major element in the application to the Department for Culture, Media and Sport for a regional casino in Blackpool, and we know that potential developers regard the tram as a key asset in that context.

There is considerable—indeed, substantial—local support for the bid. I have mentioned already the support from Members of Parliament. There has also been concerted co-operation and collaboration between Lancashire county council and Blackpool, and full integration with all the planning and local highways authorities. Popular local support for all aspects of regeneration and specifically for the renewal of the tram system has been sustained and widespread. After his recent attendance at the Labour party spring conference, the Minister will know of the intense enthusiasm for the project, not just from the local papers but from delegates and others.

Perhaps most significantly, the bid has attracted unqualified and unhesitating support from the Northwest Development Agency and from the North West regional assembly. The tram bid was recommended as a priority in the top quartile for regional funding allocation. The Minister will know that, on 22 February, Steven Broomhead, the chief executive of the Northwest Development Agency, wrote to him in support of the project. He said:

"The Tramway scheme scored well in each area and was well placed in the top quartile of these schemes examined. It has been recommended by the Region as a priority for funding . . . because this scheme is partially a deferred maintenance scheme it carries less risk . . . I would be grateful if you could place on record the Agency's full support for the Blackpool and Fleetwood Tramway project".

That underlines just how strong and unanimous the support for the scheme is across the region.

It is also important to comment briefly on the basis for the resubmitted scheme that Lancashire county council and Blackpool have put forward, because that indicates how they have responded positively to the demands that the Department placed on them after the initial submission of the scheme resulted in a request for revision. The revised scheme emphasises that it is a tramway, not a light rail system and that it updates an existing system, rather than building an entirely new tram network. The scheme scores well on deliverability and value for money. Blackpool already has a right of way and other assets that will provide cost savings. The scheme has been nearly five years in development and so the costs and the patronage figures that are quoted in the submission are far more robust and involve far less risk than might otherwise be the case. The relatively modest cost—£88 million at 2005 prices—works out at a cost per kilometre of £4.9 million, which is a fraction of the cost of most other light rail projects. The tram routes in Blackpool are free of utilities equipment, so there will be no need for expensive relocation work. The project is phased across a range of financial periods. Government contributions are requested to be £8.1 million in 2006–07, £26 million in 2007–08 and £37 million in 2008–09.

Importantly, the scheme will ensure that there are modern articulated trams that are compliant with the Disability Discrimination Act 1995. The positive benefit-cost ratio that the Department has asked for is in line with its requirements. However, no direct account is taken in the submission of the positive synergy between a tramway upgrade and the development of key sites in the regeneration area. I would argue, therefore, that the economic benefits of the scheme as outlined have been substantially underestimated. In my view, that strengthens the case for it.

The devil is always in the detail of such projects, as we know, but I would argue that Lancashire county council and Blackpool between them have produced sufficient detail to satisfy the most demanding transport anorak. Let me cite some of what has been achieved. The revised bid, which was submitted in July 2005, reduced the capital cost by a third. It reduced the Government's contribution to £72 million over three years from 2006–07. It also produced a benefit-cost ratio of 1.59:1, to which I have already referred. Blackpool has cut costs by reducing the number of stops from 61 to 40, reducing the number of points and crossings from 147 to 54 and reducing the number of vehicles from 19 new and 20 refurbished ones to 16 new and 12 refurbished ones. All that was done in line with Department for Transport guidance and advice, and the consideration went right down to the type of coaches that would be commissioned if the bid went ahead.

The Minister must forgive me if he detects a slight note of frustration, as well as enthusiasm for the bid, in my voice, given the time over which the bid has been going on. We in Blackpool believe that we have done virtually everything that the Department has asked of us. The cost-benefit information shows that the bid is as robust and conservative as the driest economist might wish. However, even at this stage, if there are aspects of the bid that are not clear to departmental officials, the council and others in Blackpool stand ready to provide even more information.

We have tried to respond to what officials have asked for and produced a proposal that meets the Government's tight priorities. Other light rail schemes have been criticised because of runaway costs and over-optimistic forecasts. Our tram appraisal, as now submitted, is tight, informed and on the button.

I suggest to the Minister that the time for a decision is very close. I hope that with the examples that I have cited, I have underlined that I do not believe that the possible closure of elements of the track due to health and safety concerns is a question of exaggeration or bluff. I thus ask him to reflect on and respond to several specific questions.

Will the Minister tell me why there has been confusion among officials about the new submission? There is evidence that they did not realise that it was a new bid, rather than a resubmission. Will he tell me why issues around supporting information on capital costs were not raised until recently by Department for Transport officials as part of the KPMG assessment?

Does the Minister realise that because Blackpool's bid involves the upgrade of an existing system, the project would be much cheaper than a typical light rail scheme and be a low-risk project? The bid has much evidence on which to base costs and patronage figures. I understand that it will involve no costs or Transport and Works Act requirements for moving utilities or existing cables. Is the Department fully aware of the endorsement of the tram project by both the Northwest Development Agency and the North West regional assembly, and that they have placed it in the top quarter of priority of all the projects that need funding in the north-west regional transport plan, which is now with the Minister and his officials?

I know that in a tight fiscal climate, any Minister will always want to be satisfied about the detail. However, we in Blackpool ask that the bid is judged on fair and transparent criteria that apply to it, rather than to other bids for light rail schemes. We ask that the goalposts are not continually moved throughout the process.

For us in Blackpool and on the Fylde coast, the tramway—and its survival and renewal—is not tourism frippery or an end-of-the-pier show. The bid is a core funding proposal for something that is essential to the future functioning of public transport in Blackpool and on the Fylde coast, and that is the basis on which I ask the Minister to approve the scheme urgently. Although he will want to exercise throughout the process all the analytical powers that I know that he will bring to bear, I hope that he will not ignore the honourable place that history would afford him—along with George Formby and "Coronation Street"—as the man who gave new life to a treasured, iconic and very practical public transport system and made it fit for purpose in a 21st century, regenerated Blackpool, rather than dooming it to curio status and possible closure.

5.20 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Derek Twigg): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Mr. Marsden)on securing this debate. He and my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble) are great champions of Blackpool and the issues it is faced with. I welcome the opportunity to hear at first hand the views on the Blackpool to Fleetwood tramway and to set out the Government's position in respect of its future.

I am aware that the Blackpool to Fleetwood tramway is the oldest continuously operating tramway in the UK. It has been operating since 1885, and it currently carries about 4 million passengers a year. The Government recognise that the tramway is an established part of the transport network on the Fylde coast. Blackpool council has spent £4.5 million over the past four years on essential maintenance to keep the tramway running. It says that a minimum of a further £16 million will be required over the next three years to maintain the existing tramway.

We therefore recognise the situation regarding the tramway's future. To do nothing in the next few years would mean that it could no longer operate in the way that it has been doing for many years. We also need to consider the tramway in the wider local and regional context. Blackpool's provisional local transport plan was submitted in July 2005. It highlighted three significant changes since the previous local transport plan, which crucially affect the context within which Blackpool council will seek to deliver its transport strategy. They are the decision to bid for the tramway upgrade; a revision of the local land use planning framework; and the development of a master plan for Blackpool and subsequent formation of an urban regeneration company to take this vision forward.

Blackpool council's master plan aims to transform the town, widening its appeal to fresh tourist markets both from the UK and abroad, and providing opportunities for the people of the town, especially those in the most vulnerable groups. The council recognised that the most significant challenge during its local transport plan period will be to deliver the development necessary to regenerate its resort economy, while still meeting sustainable transport objectives. Those objectives aim to minimise the impacts of traffic, encourage modal shift away from the car, minimise poor air quality and improve the accessibility of vital jobs and services, especially to the residents of deprived areas. The council considers that continuing access to a mass public transport system in the form of a modernised Blackpool to Fleetwood tramway is integral to the sort of regeneration anticipated by the master plan.

In 2001, Blackpool and Lancashire councils submitted a bid for a major upgrade to the system. That was rejected by my Department on value for money grounds. The promoters submitted a new major scheme business case in July 2005. Their preferred option, as set out in the business case, is to renew the existing track, replace the electrification infrastructure on the most northern section of the line and replace the overhead conductor over the entire length of the line. They propose to meet the requirements of the Disability Discrimination Act 2005 by a combined fleet of new low-cost tram vehicles, accessible trailer cars coupled to refurbished heritage trams and raised platforms at stops to enable level boarding.

The forecast outturn cost of that would be £96 million, of which the local councils would provide £24 million. The promoters are therefore seeking central Government funding of £72 million. In terms of value for money, which my hon. Friend referred to, the promoters say that their preferred option would have a benefit-to-cost ratio of 1.57:1. Their assessment is that it will have a strong economical benefit and will have some additional benefits in terms of environment, safety, accessibility and integration objectives. My officials are reviewing the promoters' BCR and other claims. If the reported BCR turns out to be accurate, and it is established that all the non-monetised impacts will be positive, the scheme would be classified as offering medium value for money under the Department's guidance.

We require promoters, when presenting a business case to the Department, to consider alternative options. In this case, the promoters have considered three other options for system upgrade, which I shall briefly set out.

The next best alternative is similar to the preferred option, but with a reduced length of operation. It proposes the loss of a third of the northernmost section, with services turning around at the proposed loop at Thornton Gate. A lower cost alternative would further reduce the length of tramway, with the line terminating at Thornton Gate and Pleasure Beach. That would be coupled with minimal investment in infrastructure and vehicles. Special services would be provided by refurbished heritage units. Finally, a "do minimum" option has been considered, which proposes the retention of a tramway only between Pleasure Beach and North Pier, accepting the loss of its local transport function. My officials have worked closely with the promoters on their proposals and are carrying out an economic assessment of the business case to provide me with value for money advice on the scheme.

My hon. Friend raised specific questions about the Department's handling of the Blackpool bid. He suggested there has been some confusion among my officials about whether the bid is new. I assure him that there has been no confusion. My officials met Blackpool council in July 2005, before the bid was submitted, to understand the context of the bid. We have treated the submission as a new bid.

My hon. Friend asked whether the Department recognises that the bid has been substantially revised to meet the Department's earlier concerns about affordability and value for money, and that it meets the Department's requirements. We recognise that the costs have been reduced significantly compared with Blackpool's previous bid. As I said, we are considering the value for money assessment, and I cannot say at this stage what the results will be.

My hon. Friend also asked whether I accept that the costs and risks of upgrading an existing system are lower than for a new system. I confirm that we recognise that certain risks are lower for an upgrade. For example, a new light rail system would require utility diversions and Transport and Works Act 1992 powers.

My hon. Friend suggested that questions have been raised only recently on the capital costs. We raised issues about the information on capital costs at the end of 2005, following the Department's and our consultants' initial assessment of the bid submitted at the end of July. Also, we recently had to consider how the costs in the bid relate to the costs indicated in the advice that we received from the north-west region at the end of January on its priorities for use of the regional funding allocation. As I indicated, we are still completing our assessment of the bid, and at this stage I have not made any decisions in respect of the Blackpool to Fleetwood tramway. Therefore, the debate is very timely. I will take my hon. Friend's points into account, as well as other advice that I have received and the advice that my officials will give me in due course.

Following the publication of regional funding allocations last year, the north-west regional bodies have provided me with advice on which schemes are prioritised within the region. My hon. Friend asked whether I am aware of the endorsement of the tram project by both the Northwest Development Agency and the North West regional assembly. The advice that I received from the regional bodies gives priority to the refurbishment of the tramway to help the economic regeneration of Blackpool. I have also had a representation from the North West regional assembly supporting the scheme.

Any decisions on the projects prioritised by the regional bodies will be made in due course. We will take account of their views in our final decision on spend within the regional transport allocations. That will include their views on the timing of any funding provision as well as the amount.

The debate has given me the opportunity to hear my hon. Friend's views on the future of the Blackpool to Fleetwood tramway. As he rightly said, I have also received other representations, not least on my recent visit to Blackpool. I understand that there is a great deal of interest in the tramway in Blackpool. Obviously, I am not in a position to make and give a decision at the moment, but I listened carefully to my hon. Friend, and I am grateful for the opportunity to do that

Climate Change and Sustainable Energy Bill

As amended in the Standing Committee, considered.

New Clause 1

LOCAL AUTHORITIES: DUTY TO CONSIDER MEASURES TO ALLEVIATE CLIMATE CHANGE AND FUEL POVERTY

'(1) Every local authority shall, after having regard to any guidance issued by the Secretary of State, within twelve months of the passing of this Act consider how the measures specified in this section can assist the authority in the discharge of its functions relating to—

(a) reducing emissions of the greenhouse gases; and

(b) alleviating fuel poverty.

(2) The measures specified in this section are—

(a) energy efficiency;

(b) renewable energy;

(c) low carbon energy; and

(3) Every local authority may repeat that consideration at such intervals as it may determine.

(4) Every local authority may draw up, and thereafter revise as it sees fit, a report on measures to promote microgeneration.

(5) Every local authority may take measures that it sees fit and are within its powers to promote microgeneration.

(6) In this section "local authority" means a district council, a borough council, a London borough council, a county council or unitary authority.'.—[Gregory Barker.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

9.33 am

Gregory Barker (Bexhill and Battle) (Con): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following: Amendment (a) to new clause 1, in line 5, leave out from 'gases' to end of line 6.

New clause 2—Extension of section [local authorities: duty to consider measures to alleviate climate change and fuel poverty] to Scotland and Northern Ireland—

'(1) Section [Local authorities: duty to consider measures to alleviate climate change and fuel poverty] shall apply to local authorities in Scotland and Northern Ireland if the relevant devolved assembly so resolves.

(2) In this section "relevant devolved assembly" means—

(a) in relation to Scotland, the Scottish Parliament;

(b) in relation to Northern Ireland, the Northern Ireland Assembly.'.

Government new clause 4—Local authorities to have regard to information on energy measures in exercising functions.

Amendment (a) to new clause 4, in line 16, leave out paragraph (d).

Amendment No. 2, in page 1, line 8, clause 1, leave out paragraph (b).

Amendment No. 14, in page 7, line 25 clause 11, leave out from 'England' to end of line 27.

Amendment No. 21, in page 15, clause 23, leave out lines 29 and 30.

Government amendment No. 53.

Government amendment No. 55.

Amendment No. 1, in page 16, line 13, clause 26, leave out 'and 16 to 18' and insert

', 16 to 18 and [Local authorities: duty to consider measures to alleviate climate change and fuel poverty]'.

Gregory Barker: I am happy to say that we will not press the new clause. I am delighted that, following our lengthy deliberations and votes in Committee, the Government tabled new clause 4, after my hon. Friend the Member for East Surrey (Mr. Ainsworth), the shadow Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, tabled new clause 1, which has Liberal Democrat support. The Government have thought better of their previous view and tabled a sensible proposal that is similar to ours.

I am especially delighted about the Government's decision because new clause 1 had significant support, not least from the Local Government Association, which wrote:

"As an Association we are supporting and promoting local authority work to reduce $CO_2$ emissions through increased energy efficiency and wider use of renewable energy and microgeneration, and encouraging further action on fuel poverty .... The LGA is therefore supportive of your proposed amendment which will link action with national objectives through the pivotal role of local authorities while giving councils the flexibility to adopt the best local solutions for their communities."

Sir Sandy Bruce-Lockhart, chairman of the LGA, and of Conservative-controlled Kent county council, wrote that letter.

There have been other general expressions of support, especially for the important part of the Bill dealing with the work of local authorities in driving forward its objectives. For example, the London borough of Bromley passed a resolution on 23 January to welcome the Bill's Second Reading, which happened on 11 November 2005. It noted the elements of the measure, supported it, resolved to inform the Government of the council's views and urged the Government to continue to support the Bill and all Members of Parliament to consider its provisions carefully. That is typical of wide support throughout the country.

If we are honest, the Bill is relatively timid. It contains no great sweeping powers, regulatory impositions or financial implications, but it shows a clear direction, and the new clause is important in reasserting political leadership locally. It is vital to enable local authorities to implement the Bill in a way that is suitable to their communities. That is the nub of the new clause, and Government new clause 4 reflects it. It would provide for local authorities to be mindful of the regulations but also for local implementation with due regard to local factors.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch) (Con): What will the new clause enable local authorities to do that they cannot already do?

Gregory Barker: The most important thing is to prioritise climate change. We know from a poll conducted by the Energy Saving Trust of 300 local authorities throughout the UK that more than 90 per cent. perceived lack of leadership from central Government as a significant obstacle to taking a strategic approach to tackling climate change. More than 90 per cent. said that other issues had a higher priority in their council. The Energy Saving Trust believes that the inclusion of a "duty to consider" clause—new clause 1 is such a provision—would have a marked effect in changing local priorities. We are therefore establishing a clear direction and providing for a duty to consider. The new clause states that local authorities should have regard to "any guidance issued by the Secretary of State, within twelve months of the passing of this Act"

and

"how the measures specified in this section can assist the authority in the discharge of its functions relating to . . . reducing emissions . . . alleviating fuel poverty . . . energy efficiency . . . renewable energy . . . low carbon energy; and microgeneration."

This is about putting those things on the agenda. It is pretty timid stuff, because it does not go further than that, but it is about reasserting political leadership and ensuring that these issues are deemed a priority among all the matters that busy local authorities have to contend with.

We have a lot to get through today, and I greatly look forward to hearing what the Minister has to say. I am delighted to see the Bill back on the Floor of the House, and I congratulate the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz) on steering it through the Standing Committee and getting it back here.

The Minister for Energy (Malcolm Wicks): The hon. Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker) referred to the provisions as timid. I know what he means, in the sense that they try to introduce some modest steps, although I am bound to say to my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz), who introduced the Bill, that they will represent a giant step forward in terms of microgeneration and the climate change agenda.

I have been reflecting on our lengthy discussions in Committee on the role of local authorities in tackling climate change and alleviating fuel poverty. During that interesting debate, it seemed to me that little of substance divided us. I certainly tried to strike the appropriate balance between central Government strategy and local authority responsibilities. I am keen that there should be no misunderstanding about the Government's commitment to supporting local councils on these issues, which is why I am introducing new clause 4.

New clause 4 places an obligation on the Secretary of State to publish a report on ways in which local authorities can improve energy efficiency, reduce greenhouse gas emissions and alleviate fuel poverty. Local authorities would then have to have regard to the report within the exercise of their existing functions. The report will in effect be a joint effort between all interested Departments.

As we heard in Committee, there are many examples of local authorities developing innovative policies to achieve real reductions in fuel poverty and greenhouse gas emissions. The work by Merton, Woking and my own borough of Croydon is well known in that regard. The report required by new clause 4 will help all local councils to learn from those exemplars. It will support them in developing their approaches to reducing carbon emissions and alleviating fuel poverty, giving them the flexibility to adopt the best local solutions for their communities. It has already been mentioned that the Local Government Association has indicated its broad support for a clause along these lines.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): If the Minister is so happy about what is already being done by some local authorities, why do we need this additional legislation? If local authorities are already able to do what is needed, and if they have the necessary powers to do so, why do we need yet again to legislate for something that is already being done?

Malcolm Wicks: That is a good question. As I said in Committee, we are trying to get the balance right—[Interruption.] Well, I said it was a good question. The right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) should not shake his head. Others might shake their heads and think that it was not a good question, but I am in a compassionate mood at this early hour, although I might not be later. I share the Committee's judgment that the measure would be helpful. We are simply proposing that a report be considered by local authorities. There is growing interest in these matters among local authorities, and many would welcome this lead from the Government.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth (East Surrey) (Con): I apologise to the House, because I shall have to leave shortly to attend a memorial service.

I thank the Minister for the constructive way in which he has approached the Bill and the new clause. I congratulate the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz) on introducing the Bill, of which I am a sponsor. I also congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker), who has worked tirelessly on it and on his new clauses, to make it a really good measure that will make a big difference in helping local authorities to address the problems of climate change and fuel poverty. I wish the Bill every success.

9.45 am

Malcolm Wicks: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his support for my hon. Friend's Bill. The different parties have worked hard on it, and it commands widespread support in the House.

Government new clause 4 would not impose a new burden on local authorities, as it is framed in terms of existing powers and functions. I do not expect authorities to have to incur additional costs in having regard to the report, and the report would not impose any unfunded new burdens. In fact, it should help authorities to achieve more cost-effective ways of tackling climate change.

Mr. Chope: Why does the Minister's new clause let the Mayor of London off the hook by not including him, even though it would include the smallest parish council in the country?

Malcolm Wicks: The Mayor, the Deputy Mayor, Nicky Gavron, and the Greater London authority are taking the lead when it comes to climate change. The GLA is one of the exemplars in that regard; perhaps I should have mentioned it earlier. It is drawing heavily on the Woking experience in regard to its ambitions for Greater London.

Mr. Chope: The Greater London authority is specifically not included in the new clause.

Malcolm Wicks: Perhaps we could look at that. Given the powers that are there already, and given the wish expressed by the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst not to overburden local authorities with needless things, why do powers need to be in the Bill?

The enforcement of building regulations, the support and advice that local authorities give local businesses, community groups and individuals, and the quality of the housing and regeneration projects that they sponsor, are all important levers that local authorities have under their control, as is the planning system, which we discussed in Committee. The urgent review of local authority plans being carried out by my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning will help us to establish whether local authorities are implementing planning policies in relation to renewable energy, as required by planning policy statement 22. I hope that hon. Members will support the new clause.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): On the question of planning powers, thousands of new houses are about to be built in Kettering. Were the local authority to insist that microgeneration measures be included in those development plans, only for that to be opposed by the applicant, and should the matter go to the Deputy Prime Minister on appeal, which way would the Government rule if the new clause had become part of the Bill?

Malcolm Wicks: That would be dealt with by the overall planning system. My hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning has heard the hon. Gentleman's question. Perhaps she will find an ingenious way of noting the issue. That might be the best way of dealing with it.

We have tabled amendments Nos. 53 and 55, which are consequential amendments that will be required if new clause 4 becomes part of the Bill. Amendment (a) to new clause 4, and amendments Nos. 2, 14 and 21 all seek to remove references to fuel poverty. I do not wish to spend too much time on that, but for the record, let me explain why alleviating fuel poverty deserves to remain a key purpose of the Bill.

What we call fuel poverty—we can argue about the terminology—undoubtedly damages people's quality of life and imposes wider costs on the community. People who are struggling to afford to heat their homes might face difficult decisions between keeping warm and other basic necessities. They suffer an increased chance of ill health and find it more difficult to recover if they do fall ill. Fuel poverty imposes higher health costs and is a factor in the thousands of excess winter deaths each year, particularly among elderly people. It also contributes to social exclusion and affects children's education.

Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South) (Lab): As my hon. Friend probably knows, Coventry city council was probably one of the first local authorities to introduce energy conservation schemes. Is he satisfied with the level of grant available to authorities for such schemes?

Malcolm Wicks: I am satisfied with our development of measures such as the warm front programme, which has helped—I speak from memory—1 million households. There are equivalent programmes in Wales and Scotland. There is also the supply companies' obligation to take energy efficiency seriously, and there are the winter fuel payments, which are very popular with the elderly and arrive in December, which is important. I am confident about the armoury of measures that we are developing, but we probably need to do more.

It may be said that we use jargon when we talk of fuel poverty, but this country has a poor record historically when it comes to protecting vulnerable elderly people in winter. We should all be ashamed of that. I believe that we are moving in the right direction, but regardless of any arguments about terminology and jargon, there is no denying that even during mild winters, in Bromley, Croydon, Merton or anywhere else, some of our elders die from cold-related conditions—respiratory conditions, for instance, or circulatory conditions such as heart disease. That is a real problem, and the House should not be in denial over its immensity. As I have said, I think that we are moving in the right direction, but as one who wrote a book about this subject in my youth, I feel strongly about it. I will not allow anyone to say that it is not a real issue, because it is.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD) rose—

Malcolm Wicks: The hon. Gentleman knows that it is a real issue, so I will give way to him.

Sir Robert Smith: The Minister is making a strong case on the importance of the issue. Has not this winter, with its very high fuel prices, shown that relying on fuel prices to end fuel poverty is not effective? Should we not instead think about the quality and energy efficiency of our buildings? Is that not a more robust, long-term way of ensuring that people can afford to heat their homes? In encouraging such action, the Bill will take us in the right direction. The Government may have relied too much on fuel prices as a means of tackling fuel poverty.

[Sir Robert Smith]

Malcolm Wicks: There are two major ways of tackling the problem. One involves income-maintenance measures such as pension credit and winter fuel payments, which are subjects for another debate. The other, which I consider more important, at least in the long term, involves improving the energy efficiency of our housing. We have introduced energy efficiency measures that have been applied both to new build and to existing stock, but we need to go further.

I must confess that I have not looked at the English house condition survey for a couple of years—I have probably shocked my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning by admitting that it has not been part of my most recent bedtime reading—but when I have looked at that and similar data in the past, I have noted that there is still a great deal of housing that is not energy-efficient, lacking adequate insulation and good heating systems, and that there is a correlation between such housing and our poorest and most elderly people. Moreover, I think I am right in saying that it is the very elderly who are likely to live in the most inefficiently heated houses. As the hon. Gentleman knows, in physiological terms they are most at risk from cold conditions.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): The Minister has pointed out that the poorest and the oldest people tend to live in the oldest properties. Should we not ensure, through exhortation if not through legislation, that home improvement agencies always take account of the energy aspects of their work? Energy efficiency is important, but should they not consider other energy measures that could give those people a quality of life that, as the Minister says, they are denied at present?

Malcolm Wicks: Absolutely. I am not complacent—none of us is complacent—but I am encouraged to note that more housing associations and other organisations, statutory, voluntary and private, are taking account of such issues. I hope that our carbon building programme, which involves some £30 million over three years, will enable us to earmark some of the money for dealing with fuel poverty. Apart from the issue raised by my hon. Friend, there is the problem of vulnerable households that are off the grid and not connected to gas mains. We should think imaginatively about how they can be helped.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): Energy-saving light bulbs are more expensive than more energy-consuming bulbs, and poorer people may find it a more attractive option in the short term to buy energy-consuming bulbs. Might there be a more dynamic way of ensuring that those people receive assistance so that they can buy energy-saving bulbs? Have the Government considered withdrawing energy-consuming bulbs from sale? If they were not available, every household would have to replace them with energy-saving bulbs.

Malcolm Wicks: That is not on our agenda, but I have heard the argument before and it will doubtless form part of an ongoing debate. Many agencies that deal with energy efficiency can provide vulnerable people with more efficient light bulbs. That is part of what is called, in the jargon, the eco-obligation on supply companies, which also involves insulation and draught-proofing.

James Duddridge (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): Will the Minister give way?

Malcolm Wicks: I was about to do so permanently by ending my speech, but I am happy to let the hon. Gentleman intervene.

James Duddridge: The Minister said that energy-efficient light bulbs were important, but he also said that they were not on the agenda. Why?

Malcolm Wicks: There is a great deal on our agenda, including our renewables strategy. As I am sure the hon. Gentleman knows, our target is that 10 per cent. of our electricity should come from renewable sources by the end of the decade, and our aspiration is to double the amount by 2020. The issue of light bulbs has been put to us; no doubt it will be debated in future and the pros and cons will be weighed, but tackling climate change is an ongoing saga.

Mr. Michael Wills (North Swindon) (Lab): I do not wish to make my hon. Friend remain on his feet a moment longer than necessary, but new clause 4 is relatively permissive. Is he confident that it will do enough to encourage local authorities to search restlessly for the best ways of tackling climate change in their areas, rather than settling for minimal incremental improvements?

Malcolm Wicks: We discussed in Committee whether we should impose more mandatory requirements on local authorities. A balance must be struck between strong central direction and the new localism of which we have heard, and I hope that we have managed to do that.

Before I end my speech—

David Lepper (Brighton, Pavilion) (Lab/Co-op): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Malcolm Wicks: May I finish my sentence first? It is quite interesting. It is a sentence that I think has at least some merit.

Mr. Forth: You found one merit, then.

Malcolm Wicks: On the terrible day of judgment, there will be a weighing of speeches to determine whose had merit and whose did not. I am particularly proud of this sentence—if I can remember it. During our interesting discussion about the Mayor and the GLA, I argued that we did not need to include them in the new clause because they were such exemplars. Nevertheless, I am advised, as they say, that a wider review of GLA powers is being undertaken. What I did not know until recently is that its involvement is being considered as part of that review.

10 am

David Lepper: I congratulate the Minister on the finely honed observation with which he finished. Before he finally sits down, will he deal with the following point? He has drawn attention to the fact that the Minister for Housing and Planning is also on the Front Bench today. Will he join me in urging her to ask her Department to review its guidance to local authorities on regulations in conservation areas? In my constituency, people in older properties in conservation areas who wish to install renewable energy systems frequently come into conflict with the requirements that the planning system imposes on those who live in such areas.

Malcolm Wicks: That issue is being looked at, and my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning has of course heard what my hon. Friend said.

In conclusion, I point out that I oppose amendment (a) to new clause 4, and amendments Nos. 2, 14, 21 and 1.

Mr. Forth: My hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker) inadvertently gave the game away in his opening speech when he used phrases such as "direction of travel" and "prioritising climate change" in the context of local authorities' role, as envisaged in his new clause 1 and the Minister's new clause 4. It has already become apparent in our brief and so far friendly exchange—an opener to what will be a fascinating debate through today, and probably subsequent Fridays—that the risk is that this well-meaning Bill is neither more nor less than a gesture. I have a real problem with the concept that we in this House need endlessly to legislate to show what good people we are, what good intentions we have and how much we agree with this or that outside interest group; indeed, I find that rather offensive. Our job should be passing necessary and practical legislation that adds value to the statute book and the body politic, not endlessly loading the statute book with good thoughts and clever ideas. I am afraid that this Bill comes into the latter category.

We are already struggling to see—typically, my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) elicited this from the Minister—just what value the Bill adds. It has already been claimed that we need not worry—there will be no new burdens on local authorities as a result of these new clauses. However, the very first sentence of new clause 1, tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle, says:

> "Every local authority shall, after having regard to any guidance issued by the Secretary of State, within twelve months ... consider how the measures ... in this section can assist the authority".

That immediately imposes a new burden on local authorities, and if it does not, it is not worth doing. So we begin to see, even in that first sentence, the potential for conflict. It is claimed that this is a relatively innocuous thing that everyone is doing anyway; indeed, the Minister gave examples of excellent local authorities that are already doing most of what is in the new clauses. So if we are not careful, we will either simply repeat what is already being done, or add new burdens to local authorities. It is incumbent on us to face such issues head on. If we are indeed asking our benighted local authorities to do yet more—albeit in the best of causes and with the best of motivations—we should know about it and acknowledge it. We need an absolutely open and honest answer to that question before we can sign up to new clause 1.

New clause 1 goes on to specify the various valuable developments that it would doubtless bring about. In discussing later my amendment (a) to new clause 4, I hope to initiate a debate on the concept of fuel poverty, which this House has never had in a proper sense. As I have said many times in this House, I have serious doubts about that concept. In many ways, it is misleading nonsense and I want to explain why. Fuel poverty is a concept that everybody signs up to, saying—as the Minister said earlier—that is outrageous, disgraceful and awful and that we must deal with it. When I have finished discussing local authorities, I want to explore in a little more detail the claims made about fuel poverty, as opposed to poverty in general or any other specific poverty, and how we can best deal with it—an issue raised earlier by the hon. Member for West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine (Sir Robert Smith).

For the moment, however, I want to concentrate on new clause 4, with which there are some problems. At the outset, it lays a new burden on the Secretary of State. It should not be imagined, as it often is when we are faced with such Bills, that we can ask more and more of Government Departments at zero cost. The Chancellor is boasting—is he not?—that we will see increased productivity and slimmer and more effective Government Departments, which will result in a saving to the taxpayer. At the same time, however, Bills such as this repeatedly come before the House that make further demands on Departments. These demands cannot be met at no cost, and if they can they are probably not worth meeting, or will not be met very well. At the outset of new clause 4, there is again this apparent conflict between the rival claims being made for the Bill. It either does something new, exciting and beneficial—if so, it will probably involve substantial additional cost—or it is simply a gesture to make us all feel better, in which case, it may well not.

New clause 4 contains another of these mandatory requirements. Subsection (2) states:

> "Every local authority must, in exercising any of their functions, have regard to the most recently published energy measures report".

So it is surely unavoidable that at least one official in each local authority will have to spend time having regard to such a report. Someone who could have been looking after old people, young people or people with disabilities will instead have to beaver away studying an energy measures report, doubtless having to reach a conclusion on what positive contribution their local authority can make to all the good things in the Bill.

Mr. Hollobone: I mentioned earlier potential confusion in the planning system. As my right hon. Friend knows, district councils have extensive planning powers, and they may or may not have regard to encouraging microgeneration schemes in their plans. Once those plans are decided and approved by regional assemblies or the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, they are set in stone. However, an energy measures report could then come along suggesting a different tack. On what basis will appeals against the applications that planners will make be determined?

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who anticipates what I will have to say later about potential conflicts between the different levels of local government mentioned in new clause 4. One of my amendments seeks to tease out the conflict that will exist between the desire for more microgeneration and, for example, the conservation areas that the hon. Member for Brighton, Pavilion (David Lepper) mentioned earlier. The new clause is shot through with potential conflicts. In many people's minds, macrogeneration, which involves wind turbines, and microgeneration—little windmills on people's houses—give rise to potential planning conflicts. That is to say nothing of the conflicts between the various planning authorities listed in new clause 4.

My hon. Friend has made a very important point and I hope that, before we get anywhere near resolving whether we support the new clause, somebody somewhere will give us an answer to such questions. I look forward to that. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle or the Minister will seek to catch your eye again, Madam Deputy Speaker, to spell everything out for us, to put our worried minds at ease. I await that moment.

Gregory Barker: We know that my right hon. Friend's local authority does not support him in his view. We know also that the Local Government Association and Kent county council does not support him in his view. Has any local authority contacted him to ask him to raise these matters on its behalf?

Mr. Forth: No. If authorities are so lacking in diligence not to do so, they must answer to their voters. I am serving the voters of my constituency by asking questions on their behalf. My view of local government is that councillors are elected representatives in their own right. They make their own decisions, which I honour and respect, as I respect them to honour and respect mine. That is a view to which I have held throughout my time in the House, and I will continue to maintain it.

Shortly, I will ask some questions about what local authorities can or cannot do. That will apply to all local authorities.

Mr. Chope: Does my right hon. Friend share my concern that the intervention of my hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker) indicates a lack of reality about what happens within parish councils? How is a parish council to have ascertained the details of new clause 4, which was tabled only a few days ago? Often, parish councils do not have anyone to support them other than a part-time clerk.

Mr. Forth: We will come on to parish councils shortly. We will want to examine what their role is supposed to be under the terms of new clause 4. We will go through each of the authorities in turn and ask that same question. We might even bring in the Mayor of London, who knows, or the Greater London Assembly. The mayor and the assembly are not mentioned but probably they should have been. That is something that the Minister was not able to explain to us. When he sums up and seeks to persuade us to support the new clause, perhaps he will be answering all these questions.

I think that we have reached new clause 4(3). We have identified the fact that an official in each local authority will be studying the energy measures report and deciding what the local authority will do about it. That immediately raises the question of what local authorities will do to improve efficiency in the use of electricity, increase by microgeneration, reduce emissions of greenhouse gases or deal with so-called fuel poverty.

It may be that the answer lies in what the Minister has already told us, and that is that there are some excellent local authorities that are doing some excellent work and demonstrating how some or all of the objectives that we are considering can be fulfilled. In that case, why do we need the new clause or the Bill? There is an apparent paradox in that it is all happening already, and a jolly good thing too—that brings in our old friend best practice. In the days when I had the privilege to serve in the previous Conservative Government, that was one of the buzz terms to which we were most attached. Best practice was supposed to be the answer to all problems. Maybe best practice would be the answer in this instance. Perhaps the local authority umbrella body that has been mentioned with such affection should be contributing by disseminating best practice. Instead of having Bills and other legislation, bureaucrats, bureaucracy, targets and all the other things that we in this place are becoming increasingly fond of, why cannot we have a simple and informal procedure out there in the real world—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. New clause 4 is quite lengthy. I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman could find more relevant matters to which to address his remarks.

10.15 am

Mr. Forth: I have plenty of ammunition, Madam Deputy Speaker. I am exploring some of the possibilities that I thought were germane to the new clause. I will be guided, as ever, by you, Madam Deputy Speaker. Do not worry, I will not run out of material. I have not yet moved on to fuel poverty, which will be the main thrust of my remarks. I am now going through the preliminaries. It is a bit of a warm up. It is important that we explore in some detail a new clause of such dimension. As my hon. Friend has said, it was brought forward so late in the day. It was a pleasant surprise to see it set out in the amendment paper, but it caught us all as a bit of a surprise. Perhaps you will forgive us, Madam Deputy Speaker, for not being quite as well prepared as usual, and perhaps not being able to examine these matters in the detail that we might otherwise prefer. This is just a cockshy at it. It is an amateurish attempt at a late date to tease out some of the salient features. If I miss the target occasionally, Madam Deputy Speaker, I am sure that you will be as forgiving as ever.

I move on to the partial answer to the question that I have raised. The new clause states:

"'local authority measure'— the clause is trying to be helpful—

"means any way in which a local authority can exercise any of their functions, including . . . taking any particular step in the exercise of a function, or . . . not exercising a particular power".

Perhaps this begins to answer the question raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone). Perhaps there is a hint that local authorities should be looking the other way in planning terms when something of this sort is in the offing. Perhaps they should not be fulfilling the normal duties that we would expect of them if they are not to exercise a particular power.

That is rather worrying to me because a potential conflict could arise between the desire for microgeneration and the objective of our planning regime to protect amenity, whether it be visual, noise or whatever. That will be the subject for a later debate under a later amendment. However, the issue is germane in considering the new clause.

There is another unresolved question. What are we expecting local authorities to do in not exercising a particular power? Does that have any sinister connotations in an easement of the normal rigours of our planning regime and what we expect of it?

Mr. Chope: Before my right hon. Friend moves on, will he respond to my concern that the Secretary of State will be able to second guess local authorities under the new clause? It is only if he thinks that something will be one of the effects set out in subsection (3) that that can be a requirement upon a local authority to take account of the matter, even if it disagrees with the Secretary of State.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I have not mentioned that. I will come on to potential conflicts under subsection (6). As ever, the Secretary of State will play a vital role. He is explicitly referred to in the new clause. He is given an explicitly leading role. That gives rise to the possibility of some conflict given the view that the Secretary of State may take as against the view that local authorities, at their different levels and with their different perspectives and priorities, might have. My hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle said that he would not move the new clause in his name but he referred to it. He used the word "priority". He said that he wanted local authorities to give priority to climate change. That worries me.

That raises the important question of where in the priorities of a local authority does my hon. Friend think that climate change should come as against, for example, the welfare of the elderly, the protection of young people, the improvement of the local environment and the management of traffic, social services and the plethora of local authority services that bear directly on the well-being and everyday lives of our constituents and our taxpayers?

It sounds good to say that climate change should be given priority. No doubt the interest groups that seem to have ever more influence in our affairs in this place will be pleased when they hear someone saying—someone of the eminence of my hon. Friend—that we will ensure that local authorities give priority to climate change. That is priority over what? I want to hear what will suffer in terms of the priorities of local authorities if we allow climate change to go to the top, or near to the top, of the agenda. We cannot give something priority meaningfully without something else suffering. I want to hear much more about what will suffer if climate change, so-called, is given a much higher priority and a better role.

James Duddridge: I disagree with my right hon. Friend in relation to climate change and the priority that it is given. It should be given greater priority. However, I agree with my right hon. Friend that local authorities should decide on priority. Knowing that he is a great friend of America, does he recognise that while the American federal Government have certainly not done enough on climate change—I regret that they did not sign up to Kyoto—some federal states are quite innovative, such as California, in respect of the environment. Perhaps it would be better if we allowed local government to be genuinely independent and to prioritise so as to promote best practice to increase climate change and to give that the correct priority.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention, but I support President Bush and his Administration 100 per cent. in not signing Kyoto, which I think is nonsense. I hope that we will have an opportunity on Third Reading, or on the second Bill due for consideration today, to explore at great length why Kyoto is both dangerous and damaging. None the less, I accept my hon. Friend's point and I agree that as much decision making as possible should be done at local level. However, if local authorities were to pay any attention to this Bill—I hope that they do not—and give climate change priority over other matters, they should tell local voters and taxpayers that that is what they are doing, and why. I do not want us to all pretend, in the usual cosy way on a Friday, that by saying climate change should be prioritised something magical will happen and nothing else will suffer. We should be up-front about this and explain to people exactly what the prioritisation of climate change would mean.

New clause 4(5) contains our good old friend consultation—another favoured word in private Members' Bills and other legislation. It is usually designed to make people feel a little easier and more relaxed about what is suggested. If we have consultation, everybody will be involved and we can reach out, embrace, cuddle and hug all sorts of people, and all will be well. However, I would like to know a little more about who the "representatives of local government" will be. Will they be a random sample or will they be carefully selected—or does that phrase mean the body that has already been described as wholeheartedly in favour of the Bill?

Even more intriguing is the reference in subsection (5)(b), whereby the Secretary of State must consult "such other persons (if any) . . . as he considers appropriate".

That is a clever formulation, because we do not usually see "if any" included. Such legislation usually refers to such other persons as are deemed appropriate, relevant, knowledgeable, friendly or whatever it may be. The phrase "if any" suggests that the Secretary of State may not bother to consult anyone else at all, in which case it will be only local government that is consulted. If I had been able to see the new clause a little earlier, I might have suggested that we delete paragraph (b), if it meant that nobody consulted the single interest groups that have a perverse influence on our policy making now. We need to know a little more about what subsection (5)(a) and (b) mean before we rush to give the new clause our support.

I now come to what is potentially the most difficult and complex area of the new clause, subsection (6), which states:

"In this section, 'local authority' means any of the following"—

not all, but "any"—

"a county council ... a county borough council ... a district council ... a London borough council ... the Common Council of the City of London ... the Council of the Isles of Scilly ... a parish council" and even

"a community council."

That raises all sorts of interesting possibilities and potential conflicts. The first question is what would happen if, in that sea of excellence, some of those authorities disagreed with some of the others? It would be perfectly legitimate for them to do so. It is not, after all, unknown for district councils to be at odds with county councils or London boroughs to be at odds with the London Assembly or the Mayor, although the latter two are not mentioned here. It is not unusual for different levels of representative Government to take a different view. We know nothing of what will happen if some of those bodies take different views of the energy measure reports and their new responsibilities—which will, apparently, be seamless and costless.

If we zero in on parish councils and community councils, we may ask where they will get the resources to fulfil the requirements laid on them by the new clause. It is one thing for county councils and county borough councils—and maybe even district councils—to do so. It appears that my borough council will have to spend much of its time dealing with such matters, although it has not told me how it will manage that; it is, of course, entirely a matter for the council itself. What really bothers me is whether we may expect parish councils and community councils to be able to fulfil the requirements and aspirations in the new clause in any meaningful way. If we do expect that, how will they do it, where will they get the resources, do they have the staff and the expertise, and is it any part of their remit, other than as provided by the new clause?

Mr. Chope: Does my right hon. Friend agree that putting parish and community councils on a par with larger councils offends against the principle of proportionality, to which the Government pay lip service when talking about the importance of deregulation?

Mr. Forth: I agree that there is that risk. Before we sign up to new clause 4(6)(g) and (h), we need to hear much more from the Minister about how a parish or community council can fulfil the requirements set out in any meaningful, efficacious or practical way. Otherwise, the new clause starts to look aspirational, or like gesture legislation, not meaningful legislation. It is time the House put its foot down and put a stop to such nonsense. I lived with it for five years in my service as a Member of the European Parliament, and I thought that I had seen the last of it when I came here to Westminster, but apparently not. Here we are, in the 21st century, still proposing gesture legislation, in a very European way—which is among my many objections to things European. I hope that this is not an example of gesture legislation, but I wait to be persuaded.

James Duddridge: I see no mention of unitary authorities in subsection (6), and I am conscious that 60,000 of my 72,000 constituents live under a unitary council. In my right hon. Friend's assessment, would unitary councils be covered by subsection (6)(h), which mentions community councils—a term with which I am not entirely familiar?

Mr. Forth: I do not know. I can say that because it is not my new clause and I do not have to explain it. Indeed, I am beginning to have more and more severe doubts about it as time goes on. The first question that the Minister was unable to answer was about the role of the Greater London Assembly and the Mayor, and now we have a question about whether unitary authorities are subsumed under, or contained within, any of subsection (6)(a) to (h). I am sure that my hon. Friend will want to hear the Minister's answer to his question, along with all the questions that I have posed, before the House can dream of giving the new clause its support.

Mr. Chope: Has my right hon. Friend noticed that new clause 1, which my hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker) does not apparently intend to press, specifically refers to unitary authorities, although they are excluded from new clause 4?

Mr. Forth: Funnily enough, that reassures me, because it shows that our Front Benchers are not totally in bed with the Government on this issue. That discrepancy reassures me that there is at least the slightest smidgen of difference between our Front Benchers and the Government, which makes me—as a traditionalist—feel rather comfortable. However, I shall not hold my breath waiting for much more evidence of that.

I shall now conclude my preliminary observations on new clause 4, turn to my amendment (a) and initiate what I hope will be a vigorous and extensive debate on the concept of fuel poverty, which has bothered me for some time. It encompasses a wide variety of different concepts, which have not yet been addressed or dealt with. There is the concept of poverty itself, which is well known but not yet fully explored in terms of whether we mean an absolute or relative poverty. There is also the role that fuel, as opposed to other essentials, plays in the household budget. There are historic comparisons to be made, with fuel prices past and present, and lifestyle choices. One of the issues that we must explore is whether the frequently made claims that people are fuel poor have anything to do with their lifestyles and their personal priorities.

One of the reasons why I have sought to initiate a debate on fuel poverty, by seeking to remove the reference to it from the new clause and throughout the Bill, is that I am not sure that it has any place in a Bill on so-called climate change, emissions, microgeneration and all that. Fuel poverty is a completely different subject and should be covered by a different policy direction. In any case, I remain to be convinced that fuel poverty is a legitimate concept.

10.30 am

When one looks at definitions of poverty, one comes across "want of necessities", "indispensable things", "wanting means of subsistence" and "minimum resources to sustain life". Those definitions are all unexceptional, and nobody would disagree with them. But when I began to think about what fits into those descriptions, I made a little list: accommodation, food, clothing, heating, perhaps transport—and then I got to alcohol, tobacco, entertainment and the like. I then began to wonder in what order one should list them in terms of the minimum resources to sustain life, subsistence or want of necessities. That immediately brings us to the time-honoured debate, which I do not think we have ever resolved—perhaps because we do not really want to confront it—about whether poverty is relative or absolute. In a very wealthy society, which we pride ourselves on being, if one defines poverty in relative terms, one gets some rather peculiar outcomes. People who enjoy things that could hardly be called necessities are suddenly regarded as being in some way poor. On the other hand, if one looks at poverty as an absolute, which would be my preference, it starts to take on a different context.

If we are really talking about necessities—the minimum resources to sustain life—I originally put accommodation first, but then I thought that food should be first, because if people do not eat they do not survive, and we know that there are people who choose—many, but not all choose—to live on the streets. They can survive almost indefinitely without conventional accommodation, but they need food and clothing. The point that I am working towards is that fuel does not feature very highly in what people need to survive and maintain themselves. So why do we not talk about food poverty or clothing poverty? Why do we not talk about poverty in other essential aspects of life? Why are we obsessed with the concept of fuel poverty, as opposed to poverty in other aspects of life?

Mr. Brooks Newmark (Braintree) (Con): I remain in awe of my right hon. Friend's forensic analysis, but I would like to help to connect the dots. He referred to the responsibilities of local government, and one of those is to look after the welfare of the elderly. In that respect, fuel poverty has to do with the relative amount that pensioners pay for fuel. In connection with the concerns that my right hon. Friend mentioned earlier, microgeneration, the insulation of housing, and the responsibilities of local government with regard to that, can help to alleviate fuel poverty.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to my hon. Friend—I think—but I shall come to that subject later, because I shall talk about means-testing. My hon. Friend has fallen into the trap of talking about the elderly and fuel poverty. Most elderly people these days are perfectly capable of looking after themselves. They are well housed and have good incomes, because they have pensions and other assets. They get support. Therefore, simply to say that elderly people may have a problem with heating their homes is a questionable concept. Later I shall come to the individual choices that people, elderly or otherwise, make about their spending priorities within their households. I would want to know about those—or at least I think I would, because this takes us into means-testing which I shall explore in a moment. It takes us into asking legitimate questions of people who claim that they cannot afford their heating bill, about what else are they spending their money on, before we get too worried or rush to help them with a windmill on their roof. We must go through this argument one stage at a time.

Greg Clark (Tunbridge Wells) (Con): I have some sympathy with the point my right hon. Friend is making, but he rather overplays his hand. Surely he will accept that for elderly people and the disabled there are physical and medical reasons why they may need to spend more on heating than other groups in society.

Mr. Forth: Of course there are, as there are for people with very young children. Of course there are groups in society that have different priorities and different needs, but that does not mean to say that we should bring out a blanket definition of something such as fuel poverty and then apply it indiscriminately across the board. Later, I shall come to regional considerations. Will we say that someone who has the joy of living on the Isle of Wight, for example—the southernmost part of our wonderful country—will have the same needs as someone living in the extreme north of Scotland? Of course they will not. Therefore I believe that we must start taking account of climatic conditions, whether they are affected by climate change or not, the Gulf Stream, prevailing winds or whatever it may be. Catch-all definitions such as fuel poverty, which we are dealing with here, will not do. We must have a better understanding of what people need, why they need it and what we should do to alleviate shortcomings.

Now I shall go back to the point that I was making—asking why we do not talk about food poverty, clothing poverty or people's inability to pay for other aspects of their lives, and how essential we think those things are compared to fuel or heating. My hon. Friends have said that they think there is a serious problem of elderly people being unable to warm their homes. But what about elderly people being unable to eat or to clothe themselves properly?

Mr. Newmark: My right hon. Friend is digressing. We are talking about climate change. Fuel poverty relates to climate change and people keeping warm. I agree that food poverty is an issue, but it has no relevance to the Bill, which is why we are talking about fuel poverty in this context.

Mr. Forth rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. It is for the Chair to determine what is relevant. The right hon. Gentleman has been going rather wide in his remarks. I am sure that with all that is in the new clause, he will now be able to address the Bill in an appropriate manner.

Mr. Forth: I am addressing my amendment, which seeks to delete the term "fuel poverty" from the Bill, Madam Deputy Speaker. That is why I am giving some consideration to the concept. I am rather surprised at my hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Newmark), because I thought that the alleged worry was climate change and global warming. If we are going to have global warming, why on earth are we talking about people being unable to heat themselves? This is getting us into intriguing territory, and I want him to think about that before we get too excited about alleged climate change, alleged global warming and the alleged effects that it might have.

Mr. Newmark: The important thing is that if we can have, for example, windmills on people's roofs or insulation, that will lower the cost of fuel, thereby reducing fuel poverty.

Mr. Forth: Who supplies the windmills is a question that we will come to later. I would digress if I followed that idea too far; even I have spotted that one. We will come back to who pays for the windmills in debates on later amendments.

Mr. Chope: Does my right hon. Friend accept that one of the ironies of the new clause is that it could result in higher fuel bills because microgeneration is uneconomic? With higher fuel bills, fuel poverty would be increased rather than reduced.

Mr. Forth: Again, we will come to that later—but to touch briefly on it now, it has not yet been demonstrated to me that solar panels or windmills necessarily have an acceptable pay-off period, or a yield that will give the results that are claimed for them. I have never been persuaded of that. If they did, presumably every roof in the country would already have solar panels and, within existing planning constraints, we would all have windmills, as leading members of our party apparently say they will have. I am not convinced that there is an acceptable pay-back in terms of the investment required in a windmill or a solar panel to give us an overall advantage in fuel terms.

I have had a quick look at some household expenditure figures from 20 years ago and now to see where fuel and power fitted as a percentage of spending. I could go into a lot of detail but I am eager to reach some of the later debates, which will be much more substantial than this one. This is just a taster, after all; there is some meaty stuff to come later. Suffice it to say that the figures I have been given by the Library show that in the year 2003-04 the proportion of household expenditure spent on housing—rent, council tax and so on—was 17 per cent., on food and non-alcoholic drinks 16 per cent., on motoring 15 per cent., on leisure services 13 per cent., and on household goods 8 per cent., but for fuel and power it was 3 per cent. That suggests that we should be careful about analysing the proportion of household expenditure—

Greg Clark: Does my right hon. Friend accept that those proportions would be very different for some of the groups of people that we have been talking about, specifically the disabled and the elderly?

Mr. Forth: They might be—I concede that—but it is relevant to consider by how much. I return to my point about the spending choices and priorities in each household. There is a real difficulty, but a fascinating diversion or digression to be had, about means-testing or blanket support. A large part of me would say that if we want to help people in what is claimed to be fuel poverty, and there are households where, because of individual needs relating to health, location or whatever, people are forced to spend a disproportionately large part of their income on heating and fuel, there may be cause to help them. However, I very much doubt whether we would do that by putting a windmill on their roof, or even a solar panel, because in the middle of winter neither would help them. The help would probably have to be more direct—but I am not sure that that is what we are saying.

Greg Clark: I think that my right hon. Friend has made progress by accepting that, although he may not like the terminology, there is a concept of fuel poverty—that certain people whose needs require them to spend more on fuel than others suffer financially, because they do not have the means to make up the shortfall. He may not like the jargon, but the concept is accepted. The question is how it is addressed.

Mr. Forth: Only partly. What about food poverty or clothing poverty? What if people find that they have to make difficult choices in their household budget, between buying clothes, paying their rent, heating their home or buying food? Why do we always concentrate on fuel and not the other things? That is my point. There is of course cause for us as a society to help needy people and people in difficulties, although we are entitled to ask them some fairly pertinent questions about what they do with their household income and how they prioritise before we rush to help them. But the question has never been answered; we go on and on about this thing called fuel poverty, yet we ignore everything else. It is at least theoretically possible that someone could end up living in a very warm house without enough to eat. What would we do about that? Why do not we answer that question, too?

The idea—the concept—of fuel poverty is extremely dubious. I do not accept that, simply because it is raised in the context of a Bill such as this, people should try to connect it to climate change and windmills and lump them all together as though they were on a continuum. I do not see the connection or the validity.

Mr. Nick Hurd (Ruislip-Northwood) (Con): As usual, my right hon. Friend is playing a robust role in testing the value added of proposed legislation, but surely subsection (3)(d) of new clause 4 merely recognises that a side benefit of promoting greater energy efficiency, which is of increased strategic importance to this country, will be that we shall be "reducing the number of households in which one or more persons are living in fuel poverty."

It is not the main driver of the Bill but an important side benefit, and should be seen in that context.

Mr. Forth: It might be—I do not know, nor do I think that it is as self-evident as my hon. Friend suggests, because it implies that we can make a direct, practical, on-the-ground connection between identifying those who are genuinely in so-called fuel poverty and the ability to help them directly by microgeneration. That may or may not be so in individual cases, but the application is not as general as the Bill and its supporters suggest.

I remain to be convinced about the whole idea of fuel poverty. It needs to be explored in much more detail. I worry that, as ever with such things, we shall raise people's expectations and make them think that somehow the Bill contains ready solutions to problems. I, for one, do not see that. We require much more explanation. I have raised many questions—as have other Members—which I hope that the Minister will be able to answer, to persuade us that new clause 4 is worthy of our support.

10.45 am

Mr. Chope: To follow what my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) has just said about fuel poverty and his amendment, I have always been rather an enthusiast for eliminating fuel poverty and thought that the Government were, too. Indeed, I thought that Labour's 1997 manifesto included a commitment to that effect. In those days, the Government defined fuel poverty as occurring when a household had to spend more than 10 per cent. of its gross income on fuel. Since then, however, they realised that they would be unable to meet their political promises so they changed the definition of fuel poverty and watered it down to a much woollier concept. My right hon. Friend is right to draw attention to what is now a meaningless concept; it sounds good, but what will it actually achieve in practice?

About two or three years ago, I developed the idea—I should like to claim the credit for originating it—of describing the plight of pensioners whose council tax bills are so high that they take more than 10 per cent. of their annual income as pensioner council tax poverty. I took the view that it is unreasonable to expect old people, who obviously have heating costs and other bills and liabilities, to have to spend more than 10 per cent. of their gross income on council tax.

However, I received no sympathy for that proposition from the Government. Indeed, they pooh-poohed the idea and seemed to think it perfectly reasonable that some people might have to pay out 20 per cent. of their gross income—as they do in my constituency—on council tax, which delivers few direct benefits for them and goes towards paying the costs of education. They may have grandchildren or great-grandchildren in education, but many of my constituents feel that the burden of council tax going towards the cost of education is at breaking point—indeed, beyond breaking point. Instead of paying such high council tax, they would much prefer to have the money in their pocket so that they could pay their fuel bills without needing to be dependent on subsidies from the Government.

If we want efficient use of energy, we should allow the market to operate, as it has been doing recently. The cost of fuel has been rising and as a result, I suspect that many people are using less. Of course, one consequence of the market operating is that the cost of fuel is rising for elderly people and households such as I have described.

Mr. Forth: My hon. Friend is no doubt aware that the long-term secular trend of fuel prices both in real and relative terms in households has gone down steadily over 20 or 30 years, or more, so although there may be an increase at present, if we accept the argument that there should be an additional effort to offset it, does not he think that if fuel prices were then to go down again, relatively, that would justify reducing that effort? Or does he believe that the market mechanism alone is to be relied on?

Mr. Chope: I believe in the market mechanism. One of the ironies about the figures on the proportion of household income spent on energy to which my right hon. Friend drew our attention is that the proportion is declining in richer households while it is rising for poorer households; for example, people living in park homes in my constituency who have high council tax bills and cannot install insulation. As the Minister knows, it is not easy to heat or insulate park homes efficiently. Such people have high fuel bills plus high council taxes. I should like something to be done to help them, but I do not think that adding to their burdens by pushing up the cost of electricity by requiring suppliers to buy microgenerated electricity, which is not economic to them, will help to lower fuel prices.

Mr. Newmark: I should like to draw my hon. Friend's attention to the link between council tax and energy efficiency. Braintree council gives a £100 council tax rebate to those who insulate their houses. That local initiative encompasses energy efficiency and lowering council taxes.

Mr. Chope: That is an exemplary form of what we call localism. Each council is left to make its own decision on whether it is more important to take part in the gesture politics of dealing with global warming or whether it is better to give some practical help to the people who live in its area, by providing them with proper insulation.

Greg Clark: Does not the Bill meet precisely the objection that the Minister raises? Clause 1(2) requires: "the relevant persons and bodies shall have regard to ... the desirability of alleviating fuel poverty".

If my hon. Friend is right and such measures would increase the cost of fuel, that is precisely something that needs to be taken into account by the relevant persons, so that subsection deals with the problem either way.

Mr. Chope: I suppose that the subsection does so in a sense—my hon. Friend is right—but the trouble is that the two possibilities that he describes are contradictory. If the costs of microgeneration are uneconomic and local authorities are required to increase the amount of microgeneration even though it is uneconomic, that will push up the cost of energy, thereby exacerbating the problem of fuel poverty.

Greg Clark: Does that not, perhaps inadvertently, precisely meet the requirement? It might protect people from fuel poverty and from fashionable impositions in quite the way that my hon. Friend desires, so perhaps his alternative proposals are not necessary to meet his concerns.

Mr. Chope: I am addressing my remarks to new clause 4 and amendment (a), tabled by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst. Under new clause 4, as my hon. Friend will know, it is left to the opinion of the Secretary of State as to which of those approaches is better. Why not trust local authorities to make their own assessment of whether promoting a lot of microgeneration, where it is uneconomic, is preferable to reducing the fuel bills or increasing insulation in the houses of the poorest citizens of their locality? Surely we should leave that decision to the local authorities—indeed, they have the powers to do so at the moment—and my hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Newmark) has referred to the way in which his council exercises those powers very responsibly. Of course, the trouble is that the Government are dictating so much council activity from the centre that the discretion to do such worthwhile things is being reduced, because of the way in which the Government are manipulating council tax grants.

Mr. Newmark: The spirit of the Bill is intended to deal with climate change, and as I read it, the phrase "have regard" is not a compelling function, but merely tells people to consider what councils, such as Braintree, are doing and perhaps take on those examples in their own local communities and councils.

Mr. Chope: I agree with my hon. Friend, but nothing under present legislation stops Braintree council having regard to such things. Indeed, he has introduced into the debate an air of reality. If councils want, they can already do such things, and if they are not doing them, it can be an issue at the local elections. Perhaps councillors who want to do so will be elected at by-elections or district council elections. Of course, we hear that the Government want to defer the district council elections in 2007, but that is a side issue.

If there are elections and the Government do not abolish them, it is possible for people who want their councils to become more involved in tackling climate change, global warming, fuel poverty and so on to press for just that: they can stand for election or promote candidates who want their local council to promote such policies. Surely that is what localism is all about, and it is why the Minister has been squeezed between saying on the one hand that new clause 4 is tremendously important and accepting on the other that it will not increase the burdens or responsibilities placed on local authorities one iota. It cannot work both ways.

If new clause 4 would leave the law alone—it just engages in a bit of gesture politics—that offends against all the principles of deregulation that the Government propose. I have spent much of the past two weeks as a member of the Standing Committee that is considering the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill, which would, if implemented—perhaps you would be pleased with this, Madam Deputy Speaker—completely negate the purpose of any Friday sittings. Any such Bill could be pushed through by the Government without the need for any primary legislation. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] Labour Members cheer because they think that the Executive are on their side. I am not so sure whether they would be cheering so much—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. However much any hon. Member might be pleased or displeased about that, it is not a matter that we need to discuss this morning.

Mr. Chope: I agree, Madam Deputy Speaker. I was just explaining the Bill's context, and part 2 of the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill deals with the subject of regulatory burdens. [Interruption.] I shall give way to the hon. Member for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead) if he wants to intervene.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I have just reminded the hon. Gentleman that we are not discussing the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill.

Mr. Chope: I am not discussing the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill, Madam Deputy Speaker, and I do not intend to do so. I have spent the past two weeks discussing it in detail, but I hope that we will have the chance to discuss it further on Report. However, what I am discussing and what I want to address my remarks to is whether Government new clause 4 is consistent with the Government's avowed intent to reduce the burden of regulation on organisations and local authorities. My understanding is that one of the principles of good regulation that the Government avow is that legislation should not be duplicatory or exhortative and that it should add something new to the statute book that is necessary to achieve an objective. New clause 4 is basically window dressing; it has no substance in my view or in the Minister's view. If it had substance, he would have to concede that it would impose a new burden on local authorities, and he denies that it would do so. That is the case.

Mr. Forth: I hope that my hon. Friend—with his vast experience of local government, but more particularly, in the context of the constituency that he has the honour of representing—will give us just a few observations on the possible conflicts that might arise between the approach of parish councils, district councils and county councils to new clause 4 and the possibility of differences of view on how those conflicts might be resolved.

Mr. Chope: I was certainly intending to do so, but I shall do it immediately, so that we have some continuity in the debate. I have already referred in an intervention to my concern that new clause 4 lacks proportionality, as it applies to very big councils and to very small ones. The Minister referred to the fact that the Greater London authority has not been included because there will be a review of GLA powers, but when one looks at new clause 4 in detail, one sees the phrase:

"Every local authority must, in exercising any of their functions".

If the GLA was included in new clause 4(6), when the GLA's functions were changed, the proposal would fit completely. I do not believe the Minister's explanation that, because the GLA's powers and functions will be reviewed, it should not be included in new clause 4.

I find it ironic that the largest local authority is excluded, but the smallest parish council in the country is included. Parish councils are finding it increasingly difficult to get volunteers to serve on them, because of the burden on regulation. This is going to be another burden on them. They cannot afford to employ a parish clerk, but parish councillors will have to consider the report that emanates from Government and try to work out what the implications might be. For example, in my area, Burton parish council and Hurn parish council organise Christmas carol concerts on the green every year, and they may have to think about whether they should, in accordance with new clause 4, put up Christmas lights that will obviously burn energy and might have an adverse effect on the emission of greenhouses gases. [Interruption.] As my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst suggests, they might consider investing in a windmill that could be used to provide the power for the lights during the Christmas period provided that there is enough wind blowing.

11 am

Mr. Hurd: I have listened to my hon. Friend's argument about local councils and parish councils very carefully, and I understand it. Surely, however, the one requirement in new clause 4 that we have not discussed is the only real requirement. That is the requirement on central Government to think about and communicate how we get smarter about the energy that we produce and how we consume it. In the context of a Government who are widely considered to have underperformed on this issue, does he not welcome that requirement?

Mr. Chope: My hon. Friend is on to a very good point. The Government have underperformed compared with what they said they would do. The comments by my hon. Friend and those on the Opposition Front Bench are apposite. The Government talk the talk, but do not walk the walk. They certainly do not produce the legislation.

I fear, however, that my hon. Friend has been slightly deluded by the impact that he thinks that new clause 4 will have. The only burden or responsibility that the new clause places on the Secretary of State is that he should produce an energy measures report and, from time to time, produce a revised energy measures report. That leaves things totally to his discretion. The new clauses says that an "'energy measures report' means a document containing information on local authority measures".

They are not Government measures; we always see that the Government do not want to bind themselves with the same constraints that they want to impose on everybody else. For example, the principles of the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill do not extend to Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs, although it is probably one of the biggest functionaries imposing regulation.

Similarly, this new clause does not impose any regulations on Government Departments, but it imposes them on local authorities. It does not just leave it to local authorities to exercise their discretion and use their own knowledge as to whether they think greenhouse gas emissions are a life-and-death issue for our planet, but second-guesses what they might say. It refers to measures that not only "would" but

"might in the opinion of the Secretary of State have any of the following effects".

Why should an elected local council have to agree with the Secretary of State's opinion about something when it disagrees?

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend makes an excellent point about the parameters of the energy measures report containing information on local authority measures. I take that point completely. However, may I illustrate the potential value of the provision? When I asked the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, what her view was on the Braintree initiative, I found out that she did not know anything about it. I found that extraordinary. Surely this exercise would be of value in bringing to the attention of central Government some of the innovation and good practice that is out there, not least because that might feed through eventually into the Treasury and the opportunity to stimulate the national strategy for energy efficiency.

Mr. Chope: Again, I understand my hon. Friend's point. I will not call him naive because he comes from a very distinguished political family, and he knows a lot about the issue. However, I had the privilege of being a Minister for a time, and all I can say is that we delude ourselves if we think that Ministers will find out about the good things that parish councils do just through the bureaucratic network. The way that they will find out about the good things that are going on in, for example, Braintree is if the Member of the constituency concerned raises the issue in the House, puts it to a Minister, tables an early-day motion or secures an Adjournment debate.

Mr. Forth: May I suggest another couple of approaches? Any local authority that believes that it has a very good approach to these matters could either set up a consultancy organisation and sell their ideas or could go to the famous Local Government Association, which apparently supports the Bill enthusiastically, and disseminate good practice through that body. Local authorities can bypass central Government altogether. They can do their own thing at a local level. Does my hon. Friend not agree that that would be a much more efficacious approach?

Mr. Chope: I agree absolutely. That is what responsible local authorities will do. I do not agree with the Greater London authority and the Mayor about much, but we have already heard that they are now apparently so exemplary in the way that they perform these functions that the Government do not want to include them in the provisions of the new clause.

Trust is one of the new themes of the Conservative party.

Mr. Forth: Trust the people.

Mr. Chope: It has been a perennial theme that we should trust the people and the institutions to do what is best for their own local communities. Why do we not keep it local instead of getting the Secretary of State involved when he is not even prepared to impose the same burdens on Government Departments?

When we come into the Palace, we sometimes see Government Car Service vehicles outside with their engines running. What sort of example does that set? It is an example of the Government saying one thing to everybody else, but doing something else. If some of the new office blocks in London that the Government are preparing for their own occupation met some of the standards that people aspire to in the context of the Bill, I would have more faith that the Government are intent on doing something themselves and for themselves rather than their just imposing burdens on local authorities.

In the context of any new "requirement", one always has to ask what the sanction will be if local authorities do not have regard to the energy measures report. I re-read new clause 4 to try to find out what sanction there is, and I do not think there is one. What is the point of having a "requirement" if there is no sanction? That merely enables those who ignore Government circulars because they are so plentiful and they cannot cope with them to be able to get away with that. It also imposes an unnecessary burden on those who think that, just because something comes from the Government, they have to have regard to it. The fact that there is no sanction gives the lie to the suggestion that this is a significant move forward.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker) described this as a timid Bill, but said that it showed a clear direction of travel. I am not sure that it even shows a clear direction of travel except in the sense that it is an exercise in cynicism on the part of the Government. I do not think that the Bill is necessary to enable local authorities to do what it suggests they will be able to do. They can do what is set out in the Bill already.

I do not know whether the Minister will respond to these points, but the context of the debate is about objective universal truths. If there are universal truths about greenhouse gases, global warming and so on, why, in subsection (3) of new clause 4, does he not rely on those universal truths instead of including the expression

"might in the opinion of the Secretary of State have any of the following effects"?

That subsection is a recognition of the reality that we are in unknown territory in which there are arguments on both sides of the issue. In so far as new clause 4 does anything, it seems that it gives the Secretary of State the last say on which way the argument should go.

I am sure that my hon. Friends will be familiar with The Spectator, and today's edition contains a superb article by a former distinguished Chancellor of the Exchequer, Lord Lawson of Blaby. It shows that there is no universal truth in relation to the issue and that it is subjective. He makes some remarks about whether, for some people, we are talking about something that is tantamount to seeking a religion that they do not already have. I will not go down that road—certainly not without the Prime Minister in his place. I do not think that we are dealing with something objective.

What I do not like and find rather distasteful about new clause 4 is the way in which the Secretary of State's opinion would be imposed on local authorities, even when they disagreed with it. On Second Reading, my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Robert Key) intervened to ask what he was going to do about his local council, which does not buy into the science at all. I think that he thought that the provisions would force the council to buy into the science even if it did not agree with it, and perhaps that is the Government's intention, but that is the complete antithesis of local democracy.

Mr. Forth: I am glad that my hon. Friend said that. Presumably the obvious answer is that it is up to local voters to express an opinion. If the matter becomes an important local issue, which I doubt it ever will, because people have got far more important things in their lives than windmills, the answer is that the local ballot box is the vehicle by which local government can decide, in its various different ways, whether to give any significant priority to the matters contained in new clause 4.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend is absolutely right. I am sure that he is as enthusiastic a supporter of the principles of localism as I am. We do not believe in just mouthing platitudes about localism; we would like it to be implemented in practice.

On that final point, I find it extraordinary that the GLA will be excluded from the provisions when the local parish council down the road from where I live in my constituency be will required to deal with this new burden—if indeed it is a burden, and if it is not a burden, it is a complete waste of everybody's time.

I am delighted that my hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle thinks that he has won a great victory, because I am all in favour of the Opposition winning victories. If he thinks that new clause 4 is a great victory, far be it from me to disabuse him of that idea. From my perspective, new clause 4 could potentially have a very intrusive effect on local authority freedom. It offends against the principles of deregulation, which I thought that the Government signed up to.

James Duddridge: I will try to make my comments brief. I had hoped to speak in favour of the amendments, but, having listened to many of the points that have been made, I recognise that new clause 4 is fundamentally flawed. I had hoped to speak in support of it because I believe passionately that climate change is the biggest problem that we face. However, very little evidence has been brought forward in this debate on how to prioritise and allocate resources efficiently in relation to the problem. New clause 4 takes the direction of environmental policies away from local government to central Government. I do not support that move, because localism will create much greater diversity. It concerns me greatly that the Secretary of State will have greater powers, particularly under new clause 4(3), which appears to give him powers to compel local authorities to have regard to any report that he deems relevant. That is turning things on their head. We need diversity in local government.

Unlike other hon. Members, I do not believe that fuel poverty has a place in the Bill. It is a useful term and engages with real problems. However, rather than highlighting an issue, it dilutes the more general issue of poverty overall and negates some other forms of poverty such as water poverty. The Government are fixated on fuel poverty and water poverty, rather than food poverty—my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) raised that point. They are still deeply uncomfortable with energy and water requirements being provided by the private sector in their entirety. It is less defensible to attack the position on food security and food poverty, requirements that have been dealt with by the private sector efficiently for a much greater time.

11.15 am

My hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Hurd) believes that new clause 4(5) is a good provision and provides a much greater case for approving the Bill. I am afraid that I share the views of my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) that it does not compel the Secretary of State to produce anything of substance. If an energy measures report was going to be useful, it would have been much better to see a detail compelling the Secretary of State to produce specific information in that report.

I mentioned the issue of unitary councils in relation to new clause 4(6). I would appreciate it if the Minister dealt with that point. It may well be that a unitary council is part of a community council.

Malcolm Wicks: May I preface my remarks by saying that, at times, I have found that I am listening to what almost amounts to a private conversation on the Conservative Benches? As a Darwinian, I found that fascinating, despite my embarrassment. On the one hand, we have heard the points of view being put forward by the Front-Bench spokesman and some colleagues, representing a new political creature—the green Tory or cleaner and greener Tory—that has recently been discovered. Experts are not entirely clear about the location, but Notting Hill seems to be the leading hypothesis. That new political creature has been debating with—I am talking technically—a throwback: Bromley man.

Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test) (Lab) rose—

Malcolm Wicks: The DNA tests are still in the laboratories, but I think that Bromley man is genetically related to an earlier creature: Selsdon man, close to my constituency. The debate has been fascinating. As a generous person, I wish the Opposition well in trying to resolve matters in due course.

Greg Clark: Will the Minister give way?

Malcolm Wicks: I will give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead) first, not because he is my hon. Friend but because he stood up first.

Dr. Whitehead: I thought it might be worth reminding my hon. Friend of Piltdown man, who I think was discovered in Kent and turned out to be a complete hoax and fraud.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that we will now get back to the amendments and new clauses under debate.

Malcolm Wicks: I will not say any more about fuel poverty, because I hope that I covered that in my earlier remarks, but I remember, once upon a time in Bromley, discussing with elderly people and their representatives very real concerns about—to use the jargon—fuel poverty. There are people in Bromley who are too cold, just as there are in all our constituencies, and we need to help them. That is the serious point to make about this issue.

A substantive point was raised, perfectly properly, about the definition of a unitary authority in relation to new clause 4(6). We have checked and I am advised that unitary authorities are included under district councils.

Gregory Barker: I am delighted to be called to respond to the debate, which I do not intend to delay. A good point was raised about parish councils and unitary councils and I can see the merit in that argument. I certainly do not want untoward burdens to be placed on that tier of local government. Nevertheless, I know that there is a great deal of support for measures to tackle the problems of climate change at the lowest level of local government. I have received numerous letters from people involved in parish councils who want us to be more robust in giving clear direction to local government at all levels.

Let me come back to the point that I made in my opening speech about the survey of 300 local authorities, to which 92 per cent. responded. The authorities thought—Conservative Members have said this—that the issues covered by the measure fell under the remit of existing provisions on the statute book that provided powers to tackle climate change, but that the reason why they were not being prioritised—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. May I ask the hon. Gentleman to face the Chair while he makes his remarks?

Gregory Barker: I beg your pardon, Madam Deputy Speaker.

The existing powers were not being used because of a perceived lack of political direction from central Government, and the Bill will now clearly put a duty on the Secretary of State to provide that much-needed central direction. I thought that new clause 1 was a brief and correct measure, but the Minister has drafted his own interpretation. I am not entirely sure what the extra lines in new clause 4 add to new clause 1, but I bow to the knowledge of the civil service, which will have advised him as he drafted his measure. While acknowledging that we have won this battle, I willingly and happily beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 3

ANNUAL REPORT ON ENERGY PRODUCTION

'It shall be the duty of the Secretary of State in the course of each calendar year to lay before Parliament a report on the amount of energy consumed in the previous calendar year in the United Kingdom which was produced by—

(a) those sources of energy mentioned in section 82(7) of the Energy Act 2004 (c. 20) (microgeneration);

[Gregory Barker]

(b) nuclear energy;

(c) fossil fuels.'.—[Mr. Chope.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Chope: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 28, in clause 2, page 2, line 9, at end insert

'and

'(c) the reduction in emissions of greenhouse gases in the United Kingdom during the three most recent years for which information is available which is attributable to—

(i) the use of those sources of energy mentioned in section 82(7) of the Energy Act 2004 (c. 20) (microgeneration);

Mr. Chope: I tabled new clause 3 because if we are to have a constructive debate about climate change and sustainable energy, which is what the Bill is all about, we need to ensure that the public are properly informed of the facts and options. At the moment, the extent to which energy consumption in this country is rising and the sources of that energy consumption are not generally known. New clause 3 thus refers specifically to energy consumption.

In 1998, energy consumption in the United Kingdom was 155.8 million tonnes of oil equivalent. The "Digest of United Kingdom Energy Statistics 2004", which is published by the Department of Trade and Industry, says that that was shared among the domestic sector, which consumed 46.1 million tonnes of oil equivalent, industry, which consumed 34.5 million tonnes of oil equivalent, transport, which consumed 53.7 million tonnes of oil equivalent, and other sectors, which consumed 21.5 million tonnes of oil equivalent. Solid fuels accounted for 5.3 million tonnes of oil equivalent. Petroleum accounted for 66 million tonnes of oil equivalent. Gas accounted for 55.9 million tonnes of oil equivalent, electricity for 27.1 million tonnes of oil equivalent and renewables for 0.9 million tonnes of oil equivalent. One does not have to be a mathematician to see that renewables, which are effectively the subject of today's debate, produced an extremely small proportion of the energy consumed.

11.30 am

The latest figures for 2004—I will not cite the statistics for the intervening years—show that total energy consumption in the United Kingdom rose from 155.8 million tonnes of oil equivalent to 161 million tonnes of oil equivalent between 1998 and 2004. Energy consumption in the United Kingdom thus increased by 5.2 million tonnes of oil equivalent. Over that period, the amount of energy consumption by fuel changed dramatically. The amount for which solid fuels accounted dropped from 5.3 million to 3 million tonnes of oil equivalent, while the figure for petroleum increased from 66 million to 69.8 million tonnes of oil equivalent. The figure for gas increased slightly from 55.9 million to 56 million tonnes of oil equivalent, and the figure for electricity from 27.1 million to 29.2 million tonnes of oil equivalent—an increase of 2.1 million tonnes. However, the amount of energy that came from renewables fell from 0.9 million to 0.7 million tonnes of oil equivalent, although it is fair to say that 2.2 million tonnes of oil equivalent came from "heat sold" in 2004.

I cite the statistics because they show that the mood music behind the Bill, which is an attempt to make people think that if we talk a lot about renewables, we will sort out the problems of climate change, is completely fallacious. Although there was an increase in energy consumption of 5.2 million tonnes of oil equivalent between 1998 and 2004, the amount of energy produced by renewables went down. We know from the Government's most optimistic figures that 10 per cent. of electricity should be produced by renewables by 2010, but that would be less than 3 million tonnes of oil equivalent, which is a lower figure than the total increase in energy consumption between 1998 and 2004. On even the Government's most optimistic view, renewables will not contribute to reducing the proportion of energy consumed that comes from other sources.

There is a belief that global warming and climate change are the biggest issues that we face, and the Government's chief scientific adviser says that they are more important than terrorism. If they are of such gravity, it is important that we ensure that the proper figures are available so that a good public debate can take place.

Mr. Forth: Does my hon. Friend think that one of the reasons why renewables have failed to make the breakthrough into viability and credibility is that the planning constraints, which have already been touched on in the debate—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. New clause 3 refers to the duty of the Secretary of State to lay a report before Parliament, rather than the merits of one kind of fuel over another.

Mr. Chope: I am grateful to you, Madam Deputy Speaker, for making that point.

I make a plea to the Government to let the facts speak for themselves. If the facts are publicised, a lot of the mythology about the contribution that renewables can make to addressing climate change could be exposed for what it is.

Another reason why I thought that it would be useful to produce the report to which new clause 3 refers was that it would point out the amount of energy that was produced by nuclear power in the previous calendar year. A lively nuclear debate is going on at the moment, and we are told that there will have to be less reliance on nuclear in the future. Indeed, unless new nuclear power stations are constructed, the amount of energy produced by nuclear will decline significantly. Of course, nuclear came under the definition of "electricity" in the statistics that I cited.

The latest figures that I have on the proportion of electricity consumed in other countries that comes from nuclear are for 2002 and are contained in the energy White Paper. They show that the proportion of electricity from nuclear power in Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development countries ranged from about 4 or 5 per cent. in the Netherlands and nothing in Poland, Portugal, Norway, New Zealand, Luxembourg, Australia and Austria to nearly 80 per cent. in France, almost 60 per cent. in Belgium, nearly 50 per cent. in Sweden, 30 per cent. in Finland, which is investing in new nuclear capacity, almost 30 per cent. in Germany, 25 per cent. in Japan and well over 20 per cent. in Spain.

The amount of electricity from nuclear sources should be increased. The United Kingdom is pretty well down the league in terms of the amount of energy used that is produced from nuclear. If the amount of nuclear energy produced across the globe was doubled, that would deal with all the Kyoto targets at a stroke. Yet there seems to be almost a conspiracy among people who are taking decisions relating to energy policy to ignore or underrate the role of nuclear energy. [Interruption.] Does the hon. Member for Perth and North Perthshire (Pete Wishart) want to intervene? I cannot hear what he is saying from a sedentary position.

Mr. Forth: Will my hon. Friend give way to me?

Mr. Chope: Of course.

Mr. Forth: I do not know whether my hon. Friend is aware of this, but in my conversations with parliamentary colleagues, there is, happily, overwhelming support among Conservative MPs at least for the development of nuclear energy. I hope that that gives him some encouragement—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I have ruled that we are talking not about the merits of one kind of energy apropos of another, but about the duty to produce an annual report.

Mr. Chope: I am grateful for that, Madam Deputy Speaker.

In the annual report, which I hope the Government accept that they should produce, they would have to demonstrate the amount of energy consumed in the previous calendar year in the UK produced by nuclear energy. I hope that as part of that they would tell us what percentage of electricity consumed came from nuclear energy generated outside the UK. I used to represent Southampton, as the hon. Member for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead) does now, where Pirelli produced the pipeline that transfers energy between France and the UK, and vice versa. That is an important means of ensuring that we obtain electricity for our grid.

If the policy of the Government and the chief scientist is that global warming is the most catastrophic prospect that we face, and even greater than the threat posed by terrorism, we should welcome the chance to assess the electricity consumed in the previous year that emanated from nuclear energy. We should assess the energy generated within the UK and the nuclear energy that was generated in that great country where we have so many friends—France. That information would be useful for the public debate. Sometimes people are concerned only about their home patch, but if we are to be honest with ourselves and accept that the fuel balance and the amount of energy produced need to have a mixture from various sources, surely we should not run down our own nuclear generating capacity only to "impose a burden", in the eyes of the opponents of nuclear energy, on the people of France to produce more nuclear energy so that we can consume it and feel happy in our skins when we leave the television on standby at night.

The issue of nuclear energy and where it comes from is important. The Prime Minister talks about having a big debate. Indeed, he referred to the subject in Prime Minister's questions this week. That big debate needs to be based on hard facts relating to actual consumption of energy in this country and the contribution made by the different methods of generation. When those figures are produced and, I hope, publicised, they will enable people to realise that a cosy talk about microgeneration cannot be a substitute for nuclear energy. The consequence of putting our heads in the sand about that will mean that we have to rely much more on fossil fuels, which is covered in proposed new paragraph (c).

The new clause speaks for itself. If it is introduced, I hope that it will enable the Bill to be slightly more balanced, instead of relying on or talking about renewables and microgeneration. I am not against microgeneration. Everybody should have the freedom to generate things for themselves if they want to, as long as they comply with the planning conditions and do not impose a burden on their neighbours. To put my cards fairly and squarely on the table, however, I am much less sure about whether we should subsidise people to enter into microgenerative production of energy so that it can be sold at a subsidised rate to the national grid.

Most of all, I am keen that we should have this big debate. Even today, the article in The Spectator by my noble Friend Lord Lawson of Blaby—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I have not had the opportunity to read the article, but the new clause is about the need for an annual report to be presented to Parliament. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will address his remarks accordingly.

Mr. Chope: I think that the person who wrote the article on nuclear energy in The Times today would agree that we need the information to promote that important public debate.

James Duddridge: In the unlikely event that the excellent new clause is not accepted, will my hon. Friend press the Minister to provide the information to the House either as a result of the debate or via a written answer? Does my hon. Friend agree that if it is not accepted, he could table the question on a regular basis, asking for a comparative analysis from the Minister, which would be a welcome contribution to the debate?

Mr. Chope: My hon. Friend makes an important point, but I am not sure—perhaps the Minister will tell us—whether he would find the requirements in the new clause a major new burden on the Government, or whether the information that it requires them to produce is readily available. It is certainly not easy for people to get the information at the moment without going to various sources. I do not think that there is any information about the amount of energy consumed in the United Kingdom that emanates from nuclear energy generated in France.

Gregory Barker: As a relatively new boy I hesitate to give advice to a former Minister and senior colleague, but I am sure my hon. Friend is loth to trouble the legislature by requiring more things to be put on the statute book. Why does he simply not visit the Table Office with a written parliamentary question? I am sure that the Government will furnish him with an up-to-date answer—[Interruption.] Or go to the Library, indeed.

Mr. Chope: I congratulate my hon. Friend on framing the expression "Touché" in such polite terms. He is making exactly the same criticism that I made of new clause 1 and Government new clause 4, which do not achieve anything that cannot already be achieved by other means. I accept in the spirit in which it is intended his criticism that new clause 3 will not achieve anything that we cannot achieve in written parliamentary questions. He will know, however, that in business questions, the issue was raised as to whether or not our right to table as many ordinary written questions as possible will be curtailed by the Government, thus removing the liberty of representatives to defend their interest in a subject. In such circumstances, if one exhausted one's allocation of questions on a particular day or the Minister did not answer the question, as is often the case, one might not have the opportunity to ask more questions.

James Duddridge: Perhaps my hon. Friend did not hear the Minister say from a sedentary position that he would be delighted to provide that information, which I welcome. Will he press the Minister to confirm that that information will cover all the points that he has raised? As a new Member, I know that full answers to questions cannot always be provided, sometimes for a very good reason.

Mr. Chope: I agree with my hon. Friend. Had such information been readily accessible it would have been useful to the Prime Minister when he responded to questions this week. I am glad that, even though I did not hear the Minister's sedentary intervention, he is minded to accept the new clause. To ask a rhetorical question, if worthless legislation is to be included on the statute book what harm is there in adding another worthless provision to it?

Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): May I declare the support that I have received from the sustainable energy partnership and its members in introducing the Bill? May I also declare to the House that I am organising a seminar on sustainable energy, for which I expect to receive support from co-operative financial services?

The intervention of the hon. Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker) has pre-empted most of my contribution. When we debated the last group of amendments, the criticism was that the measure went too far. New clause 3, however, goes far beyond the scope of the Bill, which is an ambitious measure that became more ambitious in Committee. However, one has to draw the line somewhere. With respect to the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope), his proposals are a contribution to the energy debate. I accept that that is a necessary debate, but the difficulty that he and his hon. Friends had in sticking to the subject shows that this is not the right time to hold it. I urge him to take up the invitation extended by his hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle to table questions. Indeed, he could submit a request for an Adjournment debate. I am sure that he wants to take a constructive approach, so as the Bill's promoter I urge him strongly to withdraw the motion. If he is not willing to do so, I urge the House to vote against the new clause.

Mr. Chope: I thought that the hon. Gentleman was saying that my new clause was innocuous. If so, and given the fact that, by definition, it falls within the scope of the Bill otherwise it would not have been selected for debate, why will he not accept it?

Mark Lazarowicz: As the hon. Member for Bexhill and Battle said, we should not burden the legislative body with provisions that will not achieve any objective. The hon. Member for Christchurch said that his new clause will not achieve anything, so I urge him to withdraw the motion. If he does not do so, I will urge the House to oppose it.

Mr. Forth: I am rather torn. On the one hand, much of the information required under new clause 3 is already available but, on the other, my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) is seeking additional information. We must probe the measure to establish its efficacy and how much value it adds to the debate. No one in the House would shrink from the need for an open and frank debate about the relative values of different sources of energy, not least nuclear energy, which I strongly support, as do most of my parliamentary colleagues, as far as my conversations reveal. When my hon. Friend set out the information that he required he gave the game away by revealing to the House that he had elicited a considerable amount of that information from existing sources.

That illustrates the dilemma that we face in such cases, as information is already available in the Library and in responses to parliamentary questions. I gather that there are things called websites that purport to give information, but the reason why colleagues should rely on them when they are strongly advised not to believe a word that they read in the newspapers eludes me. That discussion, however, is for another day. Given the plethora of information sources, it is ironic that my hon. Friend should seek to add his new clause to the Bill. There is an echo of our earlier debate, because we need to prevent the Bill from being burdened with additional provisions, as the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz) has just said but, equally, we have just agreed without a vote a substantial new clause tabled by the Minister. We will always be in two minds about such matters.

My hon. Friend wishes to place a new duty on the Secretary of State. To reiterate what I said earlier, the word "duty" always gives me pause for thought, because I am reluctant to add to the burdens even of these Secretaries of State, as that can distract them from other important matters and, if we are not careful, increase the burden on the taxpayer, who always pays for the resources needed to discharge those duties. We should not be under any illusion—it is not the Secretary of State who undertakes these things but officials acting on his behalf. We are therefore talking about departmental resources and priorities, and we must ask ourselves whether the additional information that my hon. Friend is seeking to elicit and lay before Parliament will be beneficial. A new duty will be imposed on the Secretary of State, and information will be required every calendar year. I am not sure whether annual reports are of much value in helping us to deal with the great issues of climate change, greenhouses gases, emissions and so on. May I suggest to my hon. Friend in a friendly spirit that it is long-term trends that are important, not annual changes? In the 1970s, the experts told us that we were definitely entering another ice age, but they soon had to reverse that opinion, which demonstrates that an annual snapshot of emissions, the climate and so on is arguably of little value.

Mark Lazarowicz: The right hon. Gentleman and I might have been of the same mind if the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) had tabled a new clause calling for a review every millennium. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that that would be more appropriate?

Mr. Forth: That sounds like a very attractive proposition. Perhaps we could consider it through further amendments to the Bill. I am happy to say, as I am sure Madam Deputy Speaker will confirm, that if by some mischance we do not finish our deliberations on the Bill by the end of today, there will be many opportunities for further amendments to be made. I welcome the hon. Gentleman's suggestion. He is helping us suggest amendments to his own Bill, upon which we can deliberate on other Fridays—Fridays, plural.

The point that I am making relates strictly to the wording of new clause 3, "each calendar year". I am sorry to say this to my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch, but I am querying the efficacy, benefit and value added of annual reports on movements in the huge issues that confront us, of the kind that new clause 3 covers. The amount of energy consumed could be affected by alterations in climate. If we had a very cold winter—that seems virtually impossible, given the claims about global warming, but let us imagine that we had the odd cold winter or a drop in temperature, rather than the much promised global warming, to which I look forward very much, because it will benefit many parts of the world and many aspects of our lives—given the variations in climate, the consumption of energy in the United Kingdom would vary from one year to another. What conclusions are we expected to draw from that? Will we panic, change our policies and change direction as a result of this or that movement, on a yearly basis?

To answer the rather tongue in cheek but helpful suggestion from the promoter of the Bill, triennial or quinquennial reports might be more relevant, in order that we could begin to see the development of trends in energy matters, as related to climate matters. That would be of more value. I want to look again at the Bill in the context of the hon. Gentleman's helpful suggestion, to see whether we can work up some further amendments that would reflect that.

Mr. Chope: Does my right hon. Friend agree that "built to last" is an important principle, and that for something to be built to last, it needs foundations? The building of those foundations may be momentary, but may be seen as significant in the context of history.

Mr. Forth: Such matters must be weighed up. We are discussing whether an annual approach is the most efficacious, and I am raising some doubts about that. When my hon. Friend sums up the debate, he will no doubt seek to change my mind.

When we go on to examine the detail of the measure that my hon. Friend outlined, other questions must be asked. Given that it calls for a yearly report to be laid before Parliament, what is Parliament expected to do as a result? I hope he is not suggesting that we get into the ghastly provinces of early-day motions and rather feeble Adjournment debates, where Members of Parliament unburden themselves, usually unheard by most people and listened to by few. Such a response to the proposed annual report would have no effect whatever.

I am delighted that the Minister is conducting a review of energy requirements and I look forward to its outcome. I support what the Prime Minister said on Wednesday about energy and energy supplies, and the spirit in which he said it. If it meant what I thought it meant, he will have my support on that matter.

How is Parliament supposed to react to a report on energy consumption every year? Not much at all, I hope. It would make no sense for us to react on an annual basis to movements one way or another in the amount of energy consumed in the United Kingdom year by year.

Next we come to a more interesting part of my hon. Friend's new clause. The report will seek to identify—I choose my words carefully—

"those sources of energy mentioned in section 82(7) of the Energy Act 2004 (c. 20) (microgeneration)".

I hope my hon. Friend will refer to this when he sums up. I wonder whether we have any certainty or confidence in our ability to identify, in a useful and usable way, the production of energy by, for example, windmills, solar panels, tide, biomass or any of the other trendy means to which people are so attracted.

I cannot conceive how, in a meaningful way and with figures on which we could rely year by year, even the Government, with all the resources at their disposal, could identify the production of energy by those various means. Surveys could no doubt be done and questions asked, but would we get real figures, particularly for domestic installations of little windmills, solar panels and the like? I concede that tidal installations would be a much easier proposition, but I question whether we could get real, reliable figures at the micro level of detail. I hope to be reassured.

Nuclear energy, on the face of it, looks much easier, except for the fact that my hon. Friend mentioned—the interconnector. When we come to the import of energy, I pose another question to which I do not know the answer. It is always risky to ask a question to which one does not know the answer, but since we are among friends, having a private conversation in the Chamber on a Friday, I feel a little freer to ask such a question. In the context of the import of energy and the interconnector, do we know the sources of that energy? If electricity comes flowing across from our friends in France, do we know whether is it generated by their nuclear installations or from other sources, perhaps fossil? We would certainly want to know that, in the context of the new clause and the Bill, but I am not sure that we could be confident of that.

The same applies to fossil fuels. Again, it is one thing to seek to identify the amount of energy consumed overall, but is it possible to identify energy consumed in terms of its production from different types of fossil fuel, as opposed to nuclear, whether imported or not, and microgenerating sources, and what value would that have?

Mr. Chope: If the Government have set a target of 10 per cent. of electricity from microgeneration, that suggests that they must have some source for the figures.

Mr. Forth: One would think so, but just saying it does not make it so. It may be possible to identify the total amount of energy consumed, but my hon. Friend's new clause refers to "sources of energy", plural, which I assume means our old friends windmills, solar panels and so on. Is such a breakdown into meaningful detail possible? I am sure we all want to know whether windmills are a viable source of energy. As I suggested earlier, regional and geographical variations come into play, as they do with solar panels and various other renewable sources of energy.

There is a debate, rightly, about how far those can be relied upon and whether they can be a meaningful part of our overall energy production day by day, hour by hour, season in, season out, in different parts of the country. All that is relevant, but I do not know whether my hon. Friend's new clause would provide any of that information or whether that was his intention.

Mr. Chope: I apologise to my right hon. Friend for not having engaged him in the drafting process, because new clause 3 would have been even better with his help.

Mr. Forth: Perhaps we can sit down together in the next few days to draft further amendments, because I am confident that an opportunity to draft such amendments will arise, given the need to scrutinise this important Bill very carefully.

It pains me to say this, but I remain unconvinced by my hon. Friend's new clause. Although my hon. Friend and I agree on most things, our friendship allows us occasionally to disagree on such matters. I can see what he is getting at, but new clause 3 is defective. I await his further explanation, because if he can answer my questions, he may yet persuade me to support his new clause.

12 noon

Malcolm Wicks: The concept of a millennium has been mentioned, and we have used up a proportion of one this morning.

I will not enter into a debate about nuclear energy. New clause 3 mentions nuclear energy, but as Madam Deputy Speaker has said, this is not an opportunity to discuss nuclear energy policy. The Bill is about microgeneration and micro-power, and the concept of a micro-nuclear generator suitable for the patio is still a glimmer in the eye of the maddest of mad nuclear scientists. Nuclear power is not directly relevant to today's deliberations.

Mr. Chope: Will the Minister give way?

Malcolm Wicks: No; not yet.

New clause 3 would give the Secretary of State a duty to report whether energy consumed in the UK was produced by microgeneration, nuclear energy or fossil fuels. The Department of Trade and Industry already publishes monthly, quarterly and annual data on energy produced by nuclear energy and fossil fuels, and microgeneration, which is currently minimal, does not form part of the survey. When the number of microgeneration installations has risen to a level that allows the collection of reliable data, we will include microgeneration in our reports, so the new clause is superfluous. I do not know whether the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) has studied the existing published data and found it to be inadequate, or whether he has not accessed the relevant shelves in the Library.

Mr. Chope: The Minister has referred to statistics on energy produced, but the new clause deals with energy consumed. Does his Department produce weekly or monthly statistics on, for example, the percentage of energy consumed generated by nuclear power in France?

Malcolm Wicks: If the hon. Gentleman studies the data again, he can satisfy himself—for example, we know that roughly 19 per cent. of current electricity consumption was generated by nuclear power. I will write to him about the French connection, because there may be technical factors in determining the source of electricity coming into this country. If my physics has let me down, which it often does, I shall write to him, but I think that two British isles—Guernsey and Jersey—already consume French nuclear energy, although the situation is more complicated across the rest of the British isles.

Amendment No. 28 would mean that the annual report on greenhouse gas emissions published under clause 2 would contain data on reductions attributable to microgeneration and nuclear energy. The Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs currently publishes data on greenhouse gas emissions by the energy sector, and as I have said, the DTI publishes statistics on energy produced from different sources. Given all that publication, there is no need for a specific requirement on reductions attributable to microgeneration and nuclear power. I therefore oppose new clause 3 and amendment No. 28.

Mr. Chope: We have had a useful debate. I am grateful to the Minister for joining in, for telling us what information is available and for offering to write to me about the important question of the amount of energy consumed in this country that was generated overseas by nuclear power. His willingness to try to provide that information suggests that he sees that it would be remiss of the British people to think that they are doing a good thing in rejecting domestically generated nuclear electricity if they continue to rely on surges of French-generated nuclear electricity. The difference between Greenwich mean time, British summer time and continental time mean that peak surges in demand come at different times, which is a great virtue of the interconnector.

I was disappointed by the response by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz). The Bill includes many requirements to produce this and that, so I should have thought that he would be pleased to see such a report being presented to Parliament. There is a difference between statistics being published by Departments and statistics being included in a report available to Members of Parliament. I thought that I detected a sneering tone in the hon. Gentleman's comments about nuclear energy, but perhaps I was mistaken and am being unduly jaundiced.

My greatest concern about this short debate is that my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) remains unconvinced. He made the good point that individual figures are not useful unless one can identify trends. The Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development has produced a document examining trends over a 12-year period—not a millennium—which shows significant changes in activity. For example, the amount of nuclear electricity produced in the Czech Republic increased by 48.9 per cent. between 1990 and 2002. Over the same period, the amount increased by 125 per cent. in Sweden, decreased by 0.9 per cent. in South Korea and increased by 33.9 per cent. in the UK. I accept my right hon. Friend's point that taking one year's figures alone is not useful, unless one can point to the trend, but obviously if the Secretary of State produced the reports every year, we could compare one year's report with the next. When the new report was published, we could examine the equivalent figures for the previous year and work out the trends from that.

Mr. Forth: My hon. Friend is probably right in a technical mathematical sense. However, I am more worried about the cost of collecting the data to produce the report to which new clause 3 refers. Is he satisfied that it would be reasonable and containable? A more sporadic basis for reporting would cost less than insisting on doing it annually or continuously. Will he concede that at least?

Mr. Chope: I would concede that, if the Minister had not already said that most of material that I have requested is already available. However, my right hon. Friend's point about cost is material to microgeneration. I was surprised when the Minister admitted that he had no ability to measure in detail the amount of consumed energy that comes from microgeneration. Yet the Government have set a target of 10 per cent. by 2010. If they cannot measure the existing amount, how can they set a target?

Malcolm Wicks: I know that the hon. Gentleman is a master of data, because that is what the new clause is about. However, he is wrong about the target. The target of 10 per cent. is for renewables: we hope that 10 per cent. of our electricity will come from renewables, including wind turbines rather larger than those that some of us hope to put on our roofs. It is not a target for microgeneration. On this rare occasion, he has missed the point.

Mr. Chope: I am grateful for that clarification. I fully accept that I was under a misapprehension. I wrongly equated renewables with microgeneration. The Minister will correct me if I am wrong, but I understood that microgeneration was a form of renewable. [HON. MEMBERS: "Not necessarily."] In that case, I am even more confused.

Mr. Forth: Does my hon. Friend agree that the little friendly exchanges that we have on Fridays illustrate the value of such debates? It is important that amendments are tabled and debates are held on Report so that we can all learn, as well as make good law.

Mr. Chope: My starting point was believing that the Bill was about climate change. As I understood it, the way of avoiding climate change—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is supposed to be winding up the debate on new clause 3. Perhaps he would do that.

Mr. Chope: I will. I was simply following on from my helpful exchange with the Minister because I was told that microgeneration was not necessarily renewable and did not therefore necessarily contribute to a reduction in climate change. That puts a different perspective on a Bill that includes climate change in its title. All its important provisions apparently refer to renewables—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The new clause deals with the need for an annual report to Parliament. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will conclude the debate on that.

Mr. Chope: Absolutely, Madam Deputy Speaker. It has become clear that the new clause has a fault line. It refers to microgeneration but not to renewables. It also refers to nuclear energy and fossil fuels. I admit that when I drafted it, without the benefit of Government drafting advice or that of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst, I omitted to acknowledge that microgeneration and renewables are two different concepts and that the former, as I now understand it, is irrelevant to climate change and global warming. On that basis, it would be better to ascertain whether I could draft the new clause better.

However, I am grateful to the Minister for offering to write to me about the interconnector, and to all those who have made constructive alternative suggestions. I am also pleased that I tabled the new clause. If I had not, I would have remained under the illusion that microgeneration contributed significantly to reducing climate change, when it obviously does not. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 4

LOCAL AUTHORITIES TO HAVE REGARD TO INFORMATION ON ENERGY MEASURES IN EXERCISING FUNCTIONS

'(1) The Secretary of State—

(a) must, not later than 12 months after this section comes into force, publish an energy measures report, and

(b) may from time to time publish revised energy measures reports.

(2) Every local authority must, in exercising any of their functions, have regard to the most recently published energy measures report (if any).

(3) In this section, "energy measures report" means a document containing information on local authority measures which would or might in the opinion of the Secretary of State have any of the following effects—

(a) improving efficiency in the use of electricity, heat, gas, fuel and other descriptions or sources of energy;

(b) increasing the amount of electricity generated, or heat produced, by microgeneration or otherwise by plant which relies wholly or mainly on low-emissions sources or technologies;

(c) reducing emissions of greenhouse gases;

(d) reducing the number of households in which one or more persons are living in fuel poverty.

(4) In subsection (3)—

"local authority measure" means any way in which a local authority can exercise any of their functions, including—

(a) taking any particular step in the exercise of a function, or

(b) not exercising a particular power;

"low-emissions source or technology" means a source of energy or a technology mentioned in subsection (2) of section 23.

(5) Before publishing an energy measures report (or a revised energy measures report), the Secretary of State must consult the National Assembly for Wales and—

(a) such representatives of local government, and

(b) such other persons (if any),

as he considers appropriate.

(6) In this section, "local authority" means any of the following—

(a) a county council;

(b) a county borough council;

(c) a district council;

(d) a London borough council;

(e) the Common Council of the City of London in their capacity as a local authority;

(f) the Council of the Isles of Scilly;

(g) a parish council;

(h) a community council.'.—[Malcolm Wicks.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 5

BUILDING REGULATIONS RELATING TO EMISSIONS AND USE OF FUEL AND POWER: TIME LIMIT FOR PROSECUTIONS

'(1) After section 35 of the Building Act 1984 (c. 55) insert—

"35A Time limit for prosecution for contravention of certain building regulations

(1) Despite anything in section 127(1) of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1980 (c. 43), an information relating to a relevant offence may be tried by a magistrates' court if it is laid at any time—

(a) within the period of two years beginning with the day on which the offence was committed, and

(b) within the period of six months beginning with the relevant date.

(2) In subsection (1) above, "relevant offence" means a contravention of a provision contained in building regulations which is designated in the regulations as one to which this section applies.

(3) A provision may be designated under subsection (2) above if, and only if—

(a) it was made—

(i) for the purpose of furthering the conservation of fuel and power or otherwise in connection with the use of fuel and power, or

(ii) for the purpose of reducing emissions of greenhouse gases (within the meaning of the Climate Change and Sustainable Energy Act 2006), and

(b) contravention of the provision would be an offence under section 35 above.

(4) In subsection (1)(b) above, "the relevant date" means the date on which evidence sufficient to justify the proceedings comes to the knowledge of the person commencing the proceedings.

(5) In the case of proceedings commenced by a local authority—

(a) evidence is to be regarded for the purposes of subsection (4) above as sufficient to justify the proceedings if in the opinion of the proper officer or an authorised officer it is sufficient to justify the proceedings, and

(b) a certificate of the proper officer or, as the case may be, that authorised officer as to the date on which evidence which, in his opinion, was sufficient to justify the proceedings came to the knowledge of the person commencing the proceedings is to be conclusive evidence of that fact.

(6) Subsection (1) above does not apply in relation to a contravention of any provision contained in building regulations which was committed before that provision was designated under subsection (2) above."

(2) In section 53 of that Act (effect of initial notice ceasing to be in force), after subsection (6) insert—

"(6A) Subsection (6) above is without prejudice to any ability which, after that function has become exercisable, the local authority may have under section 35A above to commence proceedings for the offence after the end of that period of six months." '.—[Yvette Cooper.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

12.15 pm

The Minister for Housing and Planning (Yvette Cooper): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following:

Government new clause 6—Building regulations to emissions and use of fuel and power: report regarding compliance

Government amendments Nos. 54, 56 and 57.

Yvette Cooper: I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz) on all the work that he has done on the Bill, and my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead) on his work on the issues relating to building regulations that are raised in the new clause. I also welcome the work that was done in Committee on this issue.

New clause 5 extends the time limit within which local authorities may bring prosecutions for breaches of those parts of the building regulations designed to conserve fuel and power. We will be strengthening those regulations—known as part L—from 6 April, so that buildings will be 40 per cent. more energy efficient than in 2002. They are particularly important in tackling climate change when building new developments.

If the regulations are to make a difference, they need to be complied with. The new clause will increase the time limit for action, so that if local authorities discover a breach up to two years after it has taken place, they can still take action in the courts, rather than having only six months, as they now do. New clause 6 also promotes greater compliance by asking the Government to report back to Parliament on the issue. Extending the time limits for local authorities to take action could improve compliance with all aspects of the building regulations, and we would like to extend to two years the period relating to all aspects of the regulations. However, only certain parts of the regulations fall within the scope of the Bill. We have therefore taken this opportunity to extend the time limit for the regulations relating to energy efficiency, but it is important to recognise that other aspects of the building regulations also need improvement in order to increase compliance.

Mr. Forth: Is the Minister not worried that this could cause confusion? If we are to have two different regimes operating, people might be unaware that only a partial change has been made. They might not know the status of each type of regulation, and whether it had a time limit of six months or two years. Will that not create difficulties?

Yvette Cooper: Clearly, it would be better to be able to extend the time limits for all the building regulations at the same time, but that is not within the scope of the Bill. However, we shall seek to extend the provisions to all the other regulations at the earliest opportunity. It is right that we should make the most of this opportunity, given the impact that it could have on improving compliance with the energy efficiency regulations, and the benefits that that could have for addressing climate change.

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): Is the Minister aware of my concern that building regulations have driven a lot of good electrical engineers out of business? Will she assure me that the new clauses will not adversely affect such traders?

Yvette Cooper: I cannot see why the new clauses would affect such traders in any way. They are simply about giving local authorities more chance to pursue breaches of compliance, and it is right that they should be able to do so.

New clause 6 requires Ministers to report back to Parliament on the steps taken to improve compliance with part L and related provisions. We intend to do that, and we take the matter very seriously. If the Bill passes in a timely way, it is our intention to make the report in January 2007 and to include in it matters such as pressure testing, which we are introducing from this April.

The new clauses will be a helpful way of improving compliance with the building regulations. Given the importance of having high standards in the new homes that we need for the next generation, the provisions will add considerable value to the Bill.

Gregory Barker: When this issue arose in Committee, it usefully exposed a flaw in the Bill which we thrashed out at the time. I am glad that the Government have been as good as their word, and I thank the Minister for returning with a sensible proposal that I am sure all members of the Committee will welcome.

Extending the time within which prosecutions can be brought must not send local authorities the message that they can relax, and can delay investigation of breaches. The provision is not a way of buying them more time; it constitutes a recognition of the importance that we attach to effective enforcement.

As the Minister has heard, there was considerable dissatisfaction with her Department in Committee. While that was articulated by Opposition Members, including me, I think that it was felt throughout the Committee. I am pleased to see the Minister here today, however, and I hope that the constructive way in which she approached the Committee's deliberations on this issue will be reflected in more constructive consideration of other matters in relation to which concern about her Department was expressed in Committee.

Dr. Whitehead: I welcome the new clauses. One of the Bill's aims is to ensure that account is taken of ways in which new build can deal with its own energy needs and consumption, which will not be possible in the long term without proper compliance with building regulations in their current or future form. The new clauses make that possible in a practical fashion, and I thank the Minister for proposing measures that will increase the breadth of the Bill.

Andrew Stunell (Hazel Grove) (LD): I welcome new clause 5. There is clear evidence from the Building Research Establishment that most new homes do not comply with the current building regulations. As we raise standards—regrettably, not fast enough or far enough—the risk will increase, as will the need for effective enforcement.

I am pleased that the Minister has proposed these measures. As we heard from the hon. Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker), in Committee her Department was subjected to sustained criticism from me, among others, because of its unambitious approach to the implementation of effective building regulations and improvements in energy efficiency and conservation, not just in the housing sector but throughout the built environment.

I hope that, having taken this important step, the Minister will take a second look at the Sustainable and Secure Buildings Act 2004, which I was fortunate enough to promote successfully in the House. The Act proposes that a responsible and accountable person should carry the can for compliance with regulations in the case of each building project. Enforcement becomes a great deal easier if someone on the contracting side is responsible for compliance.

I also welcome new clause 6, which gives the Government a duty to report. I hope that it will give Parliament an opportunity to remind the Minister annually that we still think she has not done enough to bring this part of her Department's work under control.

Mr. Chope: It is a very long time since I was a Minister in the equivalent of the Minister's Department, but I recall that in those days, it was the building inspector's responsibility to look at a building's construction and to decide whether the building regulations had been complied with. We privatised the building inspectorate so that a range of different people could carry out building inspection responsibilities, and my understanding is that it is already incumbent on the person constructing or seeking to alter a house to employ a building inspector. If so, why should a building inspector so employed not ensure that a building complies with the regulations? The hon. Member for Hazel Grove (Andrew Stunell) thinks that—even before the new, much more stringent regulations come into force on 6 April—the majority of new houses do not comply with the building regulations.

Andrew Stunell: That is not my opinion; it is the result of a survey carried out by the Building Research Establishment. It identified the cause of the problem—the privatisation of the building inspection regime that the hon. Gentleman has just boasted about.

Mr. Chope: That is a bit of a non sequitur, is it not? As a result of such privatisation, house builders are entitled to ask a range of different people to carry out building inspections. If a builder fails to employ a building inspector or to produce certificates, they fail to comply with the building regulations. However, under the new clause, instead of the onus being placed on the building inspector, it is the constructor who will be subject to prosecution, and long after the event.

The extent of the powers being taken in the new clause is absolutely unconscionable. The normal principle in a magistrates court is that someone has to receive a summons or similar information within six months of committing an offence, and we know how that process operates with speeding or other motoring offences, for example. Unless someone is charged within a maximum of six months of committing such an offence, it is, in a sense, time-expired. The thinking behind that principle is that such a person cannot possibly recall exactly what they were doing more than six months after laying such information before a court.

That is the background to section 127(1) of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1980, which provides an important safeguard against the abuse of arbitrary power. In essence, it says that anyone who is going to charge somebody with an offence had better get on with it. There is no reason why building inspectors should be unable to have the relevant information at the time when the building in question is being constructed. Six months is obviously a reasonable period within which they or the owner of the building can be prosecuted if there has been a failure to comply with the regulations. Why should the period be extended beyond that?

Implicit in the new clause is the belief that there is a problem with identifying whether there has been a breach of the building regulations, but surely such matters should be the responsibility of the building inspector, who has a statutory duty in this regard. If there is collusion between a building inspector and a developer—it seems that the hon. Member for Hazel Grove thinks that that has been happening—that is a separate issue. That would be a conspiracy to break the law. There is no time limit for the initiation of prosecution. Conspiracy is a serious criminal allegation and a serious criminal charge. If there is a conspiracy between a developer or the builder of a house and a building inspector to try to mislead on whether the building regulations have been complied with, that is not covered by the time limit, because that would be a conspiracy.

12.30 pm

In a situation short of a conspiracy, why do we need to make an exception to the general principle that is set out in section 127(1) that for such an offence any information should be laid within the period of six months? In the new clause, the Government are saying that such information can be laid within two years rather than six months. That is subject only to the qualification that information is laid within six months beginning with what is described as "the relevant date". That is the date

"on which evidence sufficient to justify the proceedings comes to the knowledge of the person commencing the proceedings."

An incredibly wide power is being taken by the Government. Subsection (5) says that if the person bringing the proceedings is a local authority—it does not matter if it is anybody else—

"evidence is to be regarded ... as sufficient to justify the proceedings if in the opinion of the proper officer ... it is sufficient to justify the proceedings."

In other words, there is no objective assessment. There is no scope for this to be justiciable in the court. Why not? Why is the power of the court being ousted in terms of whether or not the person, in bringing the proceedings, should have known, could have known or did know that the offence had been committed prior to the period of six months beginning with knowledge of the information?

Why should that power be contained in the subsection? Surely the test of whether the relevant date has been satisfied should be an objective one that the court can investigate as to when the knowledge of the person commencing the proceedings was such that he or she felt that there was sufficient information to enable the proceedings to be brought.

Paragraph (b) is a further affront to those of us who believe that evidence should be assessed by courts rather than on the basis that the evidence is as it is if some official says it is. That is no way in which to bring people to conviction following a prosecution. Why is it that this issue is not to be allowed to be justiciable? That is outrageous and entirely over the top. Of course, that is typical of so many things that the Government are doing at the moment. They are playing fast and loose with our civil liberties. This is a little measure to be brought in under the umbrella of a Bill that people may think is of no great issue. The result could be that people, long after the event, are being accused of offences, and at that stage no longer having the material available to enable them to defend themselves. That is the essence of the proposal before us. I am extremely concerned that the Government should want to introduce such a measure.

Like much regulation we see in this House, the provisions we are considering are based on a failure to ensure that the existing system operates properly. We have a system of building regulations and a requirement, which is separate from planning permission, for a building inspector's approval of new houses and alterations. Now we are saying that, notwithstanding that approval and even in cases in which there is no conspiracy, if it comes to light within two years that there has been an alleged breach of building regulations, it will result in a prosecution. In my submission, that could end up—as my hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle suggested—being counterproductive. Only time will tell, but the provision is in any case oppressive and should not be included in the Bill. I shall oppose it.

Mr. Forth: On this occasion, I happily defer to the wisdom and experience of my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope), who has had a distinguished career in local government, as a Minister in the relevant Department and as an eminent lawyer. His comments chime with my lay reservations about this part of the Bill. The Minister did not make much of an effort to give any really good reason for the change. It is no secret that new clause 5 is something that the Government want to do and they are slipping it into this Bill as a precursor to some wider measure. It always makes me suspicious when private Members' Bills are used as a vehicle to further the Government's purposes.

A worse prospect is the real possibility that confusion will arise between the proposed two-year period and the existing six-month period. What the Minister said, in effect, is that the two regimes will run side by side, both covering building regulations and local authorities, from whenever this provision reaches the statute book—I hope that it does not—and whenever the Government get around to introducing a broader dispensation. We should not be in the business of increasing confusion. If the Government want to make such a change, they should introduce it properly so that it may be scrutinised properly.

The most worrying aspect was pointed out by my hon. Friend, based on his legal experience. Even a cursory reading of new clause 5 would make one suspicious that it would radically alter the balance between the individual and the authorities. We should always be very suspicious of such a change and, in my view, we should resist it unless an overwhelming case is made for it. We have not only not heard an overwhelming case today: we have not heard any real case at all. That should give us considerable cause for concern.

New clause 5(5) states:

> "In the case of proceedings commenced by a local authority . . . evidence is to be regarded for the purposes of subsection (4) above as sufficient to justify the proceedings if in the opinion of the proper officer or an authorised officer it is sufficient to justify the proceedings".

If that is not an example of untrammelled power, I do not know what is. We do not even know who these authorised officers might be, nor what restrictions might be placed on the giving of the power under the new clause. That is a very worrying development.

Of course, we will be told that the new clause is all right, because it is going to save the planet. It is not all right. It will not save the planet, but even if it would, we would want much more justification than has so far been offered for what appears to be a fundamental shift in the balance between the individual and the authorities under the apparently innocent provisions in new clause 5.

Mr. Chope: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, if one looks at subsection 4, one sees that the issue relates to when the material came to the knowledge of the person commencing the proceedings, instead of when it ought to have come to his knowledge? If a building inspector employed by local authority fails to report something, notwithstanding that, the local authority will be able to proceed as though there was no information coming from that building inspector.

Mr. Forth: I agree with my hon. Friend. That raises the issue of why this matter was not aired in Committee. However, we have to be frank that one of the problems with Committee proceedings on private Members' Bills in particular is that the Committee members tend, not unreasonably, to be supporters of the Bill and there is a scramble between the Government, if they rather like the Bill, the promoter of the Bill, if he was not given the idea by the Government in the first place, and a compliant Opposition, which is the trend at the moment. Everyone is tumbling over each other to put more and more into the Bill. This measure is a classic case of what should have been done, if at all, in Committee, where it could have been properly scrutinised, instead of bobbing up at the last minute with very little notice to make this fundamental alteration in the law. For all these reasons, unless a much better effort is made to explain and justify this measure, I will not support it.

Yvette Cooper: With the leave of the House, I shall reply to the debate. I shall begin by responding to the points made by the hon. Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker) who the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) just described as "the compliant Opposition" in this case. I am keen to take a constructive approach to the deliberations of the Committee where this matter was discussed and to the decisions of the Department. I wish him luck in trying to take similarly keen and constructive approach to the comments of the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst and the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) where he may have a little more difficulty.

I welcome the hon. Member for Hazel Grove (Andrew Stunell) to his new appointment shadowing the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and congratulate him. I know he is interested in sustainability issues, and I look forward to having many debates with him on that issue. I assure him that we are looking at the questions he raised in his private Member's Bill about appointed persons and other matters as part of the current review of existing buildings and how to improve their sustainability.

It is important to recognise that in April energy efficiency standards will be raised by 40 per cent. compared to 2002. We have already introduced a series of measures to improve compliance, including on training and pressure testing, all of which we need to address as part of the report called for under new clause 6.

The measures do not change the enforcement framework. At present, if a breach of part L of the building regulations is discovered seven months after work is completed on a building, the local authority cannot take action. The provision would allow action to be taken on discovery of a breach. That is a proportionate and sensible response to the concerns raised with the Government by local authorities and Back Benchers, and debated extensively in Committee.

I commend the new clause to the House.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton) (Lab/Co-op): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I raise the issue of the door that blocked my way as I was coming to vote? I was unable to vote, so I will report the matter to the staff of the Serjeant at Arms. However, I wish to place on record the fact that there was a blockage.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): I thank the hon. Lady for raising this issue. There have been occasions when defective door mechanisms have obstructed hon. Members. Fortunately, it was not crucial to the outcome of the vote today, but I regret the inconvenience to her and possibly to other Members. I am sure that now that the matter has been placed on the record, it will be dealt with as speedily as humanly possible.

New Clause 6

BUILDING REGULATIONS TO EMISSIONS AND USE OF FUEL AND POWER: REPORT REGARDING COMPLIANCE

'(1) The Secretary of State—

(a) must, not later than 6 months after this section comes into force, lay before Parliament a report as mentioned in subsection (2), and

(b) may from time to time lay further such reports before Parliament.

(2) A report under this section is a report on what, if any, steps—

(a) he has taken during the reporting period, or

(b) he proposes to take, with a view to securing a greater incidence of compliance with relevant provisions of building regulations.

(3) In this section—

"reporting period" means the period specified in the report as the period to which the report relates;

"relevant provision", in relation to building regulations, means a provision of building regulations which is in force at any time during the reporting period and which, in the opinion of the Secretary of State, was made—

(c) for the purpose of furthering the conservation of fuel and power, or otherwise in connection with the use of fuel and power, or

(d) for the purpose of reducing emissions of greenhouse gases.'.—[Malcolm Wicks.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

Clause 2

REPORTS ON GREENHOUSE GAS EMISSIONS

Malcolm Wicks: I beg to move amendment No. 35, in page 2, line 10, leave out subsection (2).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 29, in page 2, line 13, leave out paragraph (c).

Government amendment No. 50

Malcolm Wicks: Amendments Nos. 35 and 50 will move the definition of greenhouse gases to clause 23, alongside other definitions. This consequential amendment is required because greenhouse gas emissions are referred to at other points in the Bill.

Amendment No. 29, which was tabled by the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope), removes nitrous oxide from the definition of greenhouse gases. Nitrous oxide is a powerful greenhouse gas, with a global warming potential 296 times greater than carbon dioxide. Once released, nitrous oxide has a lifetime of 120 years in the atmosphere. Therefore, the nitrous oxide emitted now will be warming the Earth well into the next century.

The United nations framework convention on climate change has recognised the seriousness of anthropogenic emissions of nitrous oxide by including the gas in the "basket" of six gases to be included in the Kyoto protocol, and that is what the UK and the rest of the parties to the convention report on.

Mr. Chope: Does the Minister agree that nitrous oxide is a by-product of catalytic converters? If it is a by-product of them and is a bad thing, why are the Government imposing catalytic converters on vehicles?

Malcolm Wicks: That goes beyond our discussions today. The point of my remarks is to say that although the hon. Gentleman wants to remove nitrous oxide from the definition, it would, with respect, be foolish to do so given its dangerous nature. Given its immense global warming potential, it makes no sense to remove it from the reports, because that would not give a full picture of the UK's progress in reducing emissions of the most important greenhouse gases.

I commend amendments Nos. 35 and 50 but, for the reasons given, I oppose amendment No. 29.

Mr. Chope: I wish to speak briefly to amendment No. 29. As the Minister said, it would remove nitrous oxide from the list that it is in the Bill. It would no longer be necessary for the Secretary of State

"in the course of each calendar year to lay before Parliament a report on . . . steps taken by government departments" to reduce the levels of nitrous oxide

"in the United Kingdom during the previous calendar year, including any increase or decrease in that level recorded during that year."

I tabled the amendment because the effects of nitrous oxide, as with many other things, cut both ways. I accept that it is 1,000 times less abundant in the atmosphere than carbon dioxide, although it has a more potent greenhouse effect. However, nitrous emissions in the United Kingdom fell by 40 per cent. between 1990 and 2003, so that it now represents only 6 per cent. of UK greenhouse gas emissions.

Before we start saying, "Well, because it's a bad thing, we must try to reduce its use or ban it," let us think about some of the applications for which nitrous oxide is used. Agriculture is the largest single source of nitrous oxide and accounts for about two thirds of its emissions. The rural parts of this country still have a largely agricultural economy. If we did away with agriculture, we would obviously be able to reduce nitrous oxide emissions by two thirds, but think of the consequences of doing that. Nitrous oxide is used in agriculture for fertiliser application and leeching. The only way in which the nitrous oxide generated by agriculture could be reduced would be to have fewer farm animals, or to use less fertiliser. If less fertiliser is used, land, by definition, becomes less productive.

It is interesting to examine the trends of nitrous oxide emissions in the United Kingdom. In 1990, agriculture caused 103,000 tonnes of nitrous oxide emissions. In 2003, which is the latest year for which I have figures, the figure had reduced to 87,000 tonnes. Progress has been made in the right direction because the extent to which fertiliser is used unnecessarily has been reduced, but I suggest that the figure of 87,000 tonnes cannot be significantly reduced further without there being a disastrous impact on the viability of agriculture in our country.

We have already reduced almost all the nitrous oxide that emanates from industrial processes. That amounted to 94,000 tonnes in 1990, but by 2003, the figure had gone down to just 10,000 tonnes. However, the amount of nitrous oxide produced because of road transport has been increasing because of the introduction of catalytic converters. I actually think that they are a good thing, so I was putting a tongue-in-cheek question to the Minister when I asked whether he wished to abolish them. Catalytic converters make the use of motor cars less dirty than would otherwise be the case, but let us not ignore the consequences of that. One of the side effects of imposing catalytic converters on our road transport fleet is an increase in the United Kingdom's output of nitrous oxide into the atmosphere, which has an impact on greenhouse gas emissions.

The output of nitrous oxide from sources other than agriculture, industrial processes and road transport has remained roughly the same. The output was 18,000 tonnes in 1990 and 17,000 tonnes in 2003—a modest reduction. Overall, we were able to achieve a significant reduction in nitrous oxide emissions from 219,000 tonnes to 130,000 tonnes, and one of the main reasons for that was that emissions owing to nylon production fell following the installation of emissions abatement technology.

We should praise the role of catalytic converters because they eliminate carbon monoxide and hydrocarbons. The Minister might disagree, but I think that nitrous oxide is worth the cost. At the moment, most experts agree that the United Kingdom's nitrous oxide emissions are as low as they are ever likely to be with existing technology. That is because almost all sources of nitrous oxide other than agriculture and road transport have been eliminated.

[Mr. Chope]

There is another use for nitrous oxide, which is as an anaesthetic because it deadens pain. It has been described in that context as laughing gas. However, the gas is released naturally from the oceans and by bacteria in soils. Nitrous oxide gas production has risen by more than 15 per cent. since 1750. Each year 7 million to 13 million tones of it go into the atmosphere globally. It is an unavoidable by-product of disposing of human waste in sewage treatment plants. I do not know whether the Minister thinks that we should do away with those and do what they do with sewage in the Army when out on an exercise, or perhaps he agrees that we should have sewage treatment plants as part of a civilised society. Let him recognise that nitrous oxide is a by-product of sewage treatment plants.

We are left with a situation in which the only way for local authorities to respond to the annual reports, which is what the Bill is essentially about, produced by the Secretary of State on greenhouse gas emissions—if, indeed, the purpose of the reports is to reduce nitrous oxide—is to close down farms or sewage plants, or remove catalytic converters from vehicles. We are absolutely mad if we think that that is a price worth paying so that we can sign up to saying, "Well, nitrous oxides are a greenhouse gas that we can continue to reduce." There are a lot of greenhouse gases that we can do something about, but nitrous oxide is not one of them. That is why the Bill would be much better if references to nitrous oxide were removed.

Obviously, nitrous oxide is one of the six greenhouse gases mentioned in the Kyoto negotiations, but the Bill is a United Kingdom Bill. I am sure that there are other parts of the world in which nitrous oxide greenhouse gas emissions are a significant factor and could be reduced, but there is no evidence that we can reduce them further here. We should consider amendment No. 35 alongside new clause 4. Why should we require every local authority, in exercising their functions, to have regard to reducing nitrous oxide emissions? That is a total waste of everybody's time. If we want local authorities to deal with greenhouse gases, it would be much better for them to deal with gases other than nitrous oxide.

Amendment No. 29 is grouped with Government amendments Nos. 35 and 50. I do not understand, and the Minister did not explain, why he needs to rephrase the Bill. Is it because he seeks to group all greenhouse emissions together rather than ensuring that they are dealt with seriatim, as the lawyers say? If so, why is he doing so? Is he trying to fudge the issue? Would it not be much better to look at each greenhouse gas on its own and produce a separate report so that we can be realistic about the pros and cons of seeking reductions? I suspect that the Government amendment would lump together all greenhouse gases, which is rather like a school or a gathering such as the House of Commons blaming everyone equally for something rather than taking a rational approach. It is not rational that UK arrangements should tackle nitrous oxide alone. It is much better to concentrate on tackling other greenhouses gases if, indeed, we need to tackle any of them. That, however, is another debate, and I do not wish to dilute what I hope the House accepts is a potent argument for excluding nitrous oxides from UK arrangements by referring more generally to other greenhouse gases. Other Members, however, may wish to test the Minister's reasons for wishing to deal with the gases collectively rather than separately.

Kyoto imposed many targets, and I fear that that will lead to distortions. If one bundles greenhouse gases together in a collective target one may lose sight of the main objective. In lumping different greenhouse gases together for the benefit of the UK economy, I fear that the Government are doing a disservice to people engaged in agriculture, sewage disposal or the treatment and manufacture of vehicles with catalytic converters, who will not pleased if it is policy that NOx are considered a bad thing that must be reduced in every circumstance. In conclusion, we place a responsibility on the police, the Highways Agency and sometimes local authorities to ensure that vehicles are fit for the road. One test is to ensure that catalytic converters are effective. Will it be the case that a local authority can say that a catalytic converter is not operating, but that is not a bad thing because it means that it is not contributing to greenhouse gas emissions? I fear that we will embark on such debates if the Minister does not accept my amendment.

Mr. Forth: My point of reference for debates on these matters is the excellent second report of the House of Lords Select Committee on Economic Affairs, HL paper 12, which covers many of the subjects that we are discussing today extremely well, and I recommend it to the House and to people outside. On page 11, their Lordships consider the greenhouse gases listed in clause 2, and say:

> "The main greenhouse gases are carbon dioxide . . . which is emitted by the use of fossil fuels and by the burning of forests; methane . . . which comes from decaying degradable matter, e.g. in landfill sites, and from livestock".

They consider nitrous oxides—the subject of the amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope)—which, they say, come > "from fertilisers, industrial processes, and fossil fuel burning."

The report goes on to refer to a group of other gases such as perfluoromethane, perfluoroethane which is used in aluminium production, and sulphur hexafluoride from dielectric fluids. The list is in line with the one that we are discussing.

1.15 pm

The report helpfully provides a list showing how the gases force temperature rises and how they vary substantially. That is expressed in terms of their global warming potential. Carbon dioxide is set at 1, methane is 23 and nitrous oxide is 296. Hydrofluorocarbons vary from 12 to 12,000, perfluorocarbons from 5,000 to 12,000, and sulphur hexafluoride up to 22,200. That bears out the point that my hon. Friend made so eloquently. Sadly, a list such as the one in the Bill, which the Minister proposes to move to a different part of the Bill, gives no indication of the relative effects of the gases.

My hon. Friend brought out extremely well in his submission and in his amendment the fact that we must be careful not to fall into the trap of treating all gases in the same way. Their lordships' report goes to some pains to identify the fact that some gases are far more important and potentially damaging than others. It is therefore important that we always make a distinction not only as to their relative effect—there are uncertainties surrounding that, which we may explore at some length on Third Reading, but not now—but as to their volumes, so that we can assess their potential effect in the atmosphere and therefore on the climate.

In that context, I wonder whether the requirement in clause 2 for an annual report on greenhouse gas emissions, which are listed, showing levels of emissions, including increases or decreases, will give us the measure of their potential effect. I say in passing, as I said earlier, that I very much doubt whether an annual report would be the appropriate vehicle for that. Annual variations in emissions may not tell us very much because of individual circumstances of various kinds. It would be much more efficacious to look over a longer time scale, with longer intervals of reporting, to get a clearer view of possible trends and to examine the policy imperatives that may arise from those.

The impression given by the clause, and even by the annual reporting process, is that if one detects a slight variation in the level of one of the greenhouse gases, something can be done immediately to deal with that. No one would pretend that that was the case, but there is a risk that we give that impression. If, in one of the reports, methane, say, was shown to have gone up slightly or even significantly from one year to another, are we to respond to that in policy terms? I would have thought not. I imagine that we should consider a policy response only if we were able to detect and measure a secular trend one way or the other in these gases. What would our policy response be if there was a decrease? Would we congratulate ourselves, continue with the policies that we believe contributed to that, and tighten them or loosen them, or, as my hon. Friend suggested, would we have some regard as to whether they play, in a different way, a vital part in our economy—transport, in this case? All that would have to be taken into account.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend has referred to methane: UK methane emissions have dropped by 50 per cent. since 1999 and now form only 7 per cent. of total UK emissions—agriculture and landfill are the main methane producers. Will my right hon. Friend accept that that is another area in which the figures have decreased significantly? The Government seem to want a global figure rather than considering each greenhouse gas separately.

Mr. Forth: My hon. Friend's point raises the question of the sectoral effect—in other words, which sectors are producing those gases and what the effect might be sector by sector if we sought to reduce such emissions. There is a real debate about the global versus the particular, which the next group of amendments will allow us to explore. We should always consider the particular as well as the global.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby) (Con): On the particular, has my right hon. Friend seen the amusing photograph of the Secretary of State for Health's car stuck on the blocker in Downing street? It is approximately 125 yd from Downing street to Richmond terrace. Does he think that the Government are showing leadership on reducing carbon emissions when the Secretary of State for Health could have walked those 125 yd?

Mr. Forth: That point relates to the remarks by my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch about catalytic converters and nitrous oxide. My hon. Friend the Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan) has referred to a very particular effect, and we are getting down to the level of individual vehicles. I hope that we can debate whether the much-vaunted hybrid vehicles are as environmentally beneficial as has been claimed—I wonder how the battery is disposed of when a hybrid reaches end of life and whether that gives rise to greenhouse gases. We tend to get drawn into examining narrowly focused matters that should be broadened out. Few Ministers walk, while many of them have several cars or use a hybrid without having asked serious questions about the effect on the environment of the large battery at the end of life. Perhaps the Minister will tell us his views on that matter at some point, but an annual report on a global increase or decrease in those gases will not take us very far in terms of policy.

I shall end as I began by recommending the House of Lords report, to which I hope to refer much more extensively on Third Reading, when we debate the general impact of the Bill. For the time being, I am happy to support my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch and eager to hear the Minister's response.

Mark Lazarowicz: No one has suggested that different greenhouse gases have different impacts, although the rate of emission obviously varies from greenhouse gas to greenhouse gas. The greenhouse gases specified by the Bill are those that we are signed up internationally to monitor and seek to reduce.

Once again, the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) seeks to broaden the debate beyond what the Bill is intended to do. Indeed, he has challenged the basis on which we have signed up to the Kyoto protocol. He may agree with the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) that we should not be signed up to the Kyoto protocol but we are and we have commitments. It is therefore only fair to ensure that we have mechanisms in the UK to monitor our performance on them.

Mr. Chope: Rather than generalising about Kyoto, does the hon. Gentleman believe that we should outlaw catalytic converters to reduce nitrous oxide emissions in accordance with Kyoto?

Mark Lazarowicz: Of course not. The hon. Gentleman should tackle the issue more constructively. I appeal to him not to press amendment No. 29 because it contributes nothing positive to the Bill or to our international obligations.

Gregory Barker: As one who gave up chemistry at 14 and Latin even earlier, I have struggled at times to keep up with the learned debate and the well informed points that my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) made. However, given that the Minister had the benefit of a large body of scientific opinion, not least that of the chief scientist, in drafting the Government amendments, which appear reasonable, I have no problem with them.

[Gregory Barker]

As the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz) said, nitrous oxide is, legally, a Kyoto treaty gas. Its reduction must therefore be reported. That is not to negate the interesting points that my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch made, but all of us who support the Bill do so because we recognise the genuine danger that climate change poses and the contribution that $CO_2$ makes to climate change. Amendment No. 29 is unhelpful because it would convey a mixed message about our commitment to Kyoto and do nothing to strengthen our international reputation.

Conservative Front Benchers therefore support Government amendments Nos. 35 and 50 and decline to support amendment No. 29.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 3

NATIONAL TARGETS FOR MICROGENERATION

Mr. Forth: I beg to move amendment No. 7, in page 2, line 20, at end insert

', and after consultation with such public and private sector bodies as he considers appropriate'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following: Amendment No. 8, in page 2, line 21, leave out 'national' and insert 'regional'.

Amendment No. 9, in page 2, line 27, leave out 'national' and insert 'regional'.

Amendment No. 10, in page 2, line 29, leave out 'England and Wales' and insert

Amendment No. 17, in page 2, line 36, leave out 'number' and insert 'numbers'.

Amendment No. 18, in page 2, line 36 [Clause 3], leave out 'England and Wales' and insert

'Wales and the regions of England'.

Amendment No. 19, in page 2, line 43, leave out 'number' and insert 'numbers'.

Amendment No. 20, in page 2, line 44, leave out 'England and Wales' and insert

'Wales and regions of England'.

Amendment No. 30, in page 3, line 6, leave out subsection (7).

Government amendment No. 36

Amendment No. 31, in page 3, line 9, leave out subsection (8).

Government amendments Nos. 37 and 38

Amendment No. 12, in page 4, line 20, clause 6, leave out 'appropriate' and insert

'efficacious, cost-effective and environmentally beneficial'.

Mr. Forth: I want to promote a debate about whether it is more sensible for us to adopt a national approach or whether a regional basis would be more practical and workable. Usually the word "regional" is unpopular on the Conservative Benches, but there are occasions when it is relevant and this is one of them. I say that for several reasons, which I shall try to explore.

Proceeding on a regional rather than a national basis would create the possibility of conducting pilot schemes. One aspect of our approach not only to the Bill but to related measures that worries me is the assumption that if we simply go ahead with all the splendid schemes, ideas and projects on a national basis, they will work and be beneficial. However, a cautious and focused approach to microgeneration might be more worth while. The amendments suggest that a regional rather than a national basis would give us the facility to pilot effectively whatever we believe will be beneficial and ascertain what works and what does not. That is the first reason for my approach.

The other, quite different, reason is that, even in this small nation of ours, there are enormous variations in climatic conditions. Surely we should take account of that when considering the feasibility of different sources of energy, not least microgeneration. It does not require a great deal of imagination to understand that there will be an enormous difference in the contribution that solar panels or windmills are likely to make in a coastal area as opposed to an inland one, in the south of our country as opposed to the north, or in a city as opposed to a rural area.

Mr. Chope: Is my right hon. Friend familiar with the concept of microclimates? Even within his own constituency or mine, for example, there will be different microclimates. They might be similar to microgeneration, in that they ought to be considered in their own context.

Mr. Forth: Of course that is the case, but we have to strike a balance to find the most sensible and workable way forward. We could range from a national approach all the way through to a very local or individual approach. We could consider operating these measures along the lines of local authority areas—indeed, I considered that when I was formulating the amendment—or operating them even more locally. I concluded, however, that it would be more realistic to do so at regional level, as that would make more sense in regard to the setting of targets and the assessment of the results.

Mr. Chope: Does my right hon. Friend accept that one of the problems regarding regional issues relates to the regional boundaries? For example, my constituency is right on the edge of the south-west region, yet it looks more to the south-east. Is my right hon. Friend suggesting that we should have a totally different approach in Christchurch from the one taken in the New Forest?

Mr. Forth: I have to concede to my hon. Friend that, whenever we draw boundaries and delineate areas, there will be anomalies. However, I am suggesting that national targets—particularly in the area of climate, microgeneration and the like—would probably be relatively meaningless, and that a regional approach would be much more sensible. I understand that anomalies could well arise in regard to the boundaries between regions, as my hon. Friend suggests, but I think that we shall just have to accept that that might, on occasions, be somewhat misleading or take us in the wrong direction. On balance, however, a regional approach would be preferable to a national one.

Mr. Chope: How does my right hon. Friend envisage the calculations being made to form the basis for the regional targets?

Mr. Forth: That raises an important point. We could, and should, equally ask how we would set about formulating a national target? In the light of the different profiles, demographics and geographical locations of the different regions, we are more likely to be able to set sensible targets for microgeneration and its outcomes at regional level than on a national basis. For example, we should be able to make an assessment of the likely efficacy of domestic windmills or solar panels depending on whether they were on the west coast or the east coast, or in the north of the country or the south. That would be more practical than setting a national target. It could also lead to a more focused approach to policy development.

There are huge variations in housing in this country. For example, if we compare the north of Scotland with Greater London and the south-east of England, a number of important variations spring immediately to mind. Surely domestic windmill or solar panel installations would be far more practical in scattered rural areas than in dense urban areas containing rows of terraced houses. Establishing targets, measuring them and then drawing the appropriate policy conclusions would be done much better on a regional than on a national basis.

Mr. Chope: I take my right hon. Friend's point, but might it not have been better to differentiate between rural and urban areas, as that is where the big divide is found?

Mr. Forth: That would certainly be an approach, but in the light of the local authority provisions in new clause 4 it is probably better in policy terms to target a regional area within which there are identifiable local authorities, to which we have now devolved some of the responsibilities for microgeneration, than simply to differentiate between rural and urban areas. That, hopefully, will provide a continuum from the setting of the target on a regional basis, through the—now—responsible local authorities, to the most local level—the parish or community level. My hon. Friend and I tried to prevent that arrangement, but sadly the Bill now provides for it.

If that approach were adopted, data would have to be compiled, targets would have to be set, and the resultant data would have to be monitored and interpreted. It would also make more sense for interpretation to take place regionally, because of the variations that I have mentioned.

Let me return to the issue of piloting. A regional approach would make it possible to select one or more regions—perhaps very different regions—to establish the way in which targets should be set. It would then be possible over a period—not more than five or 10 years—to establish how much sense the targets made, and, by means of decisions made by Government, by local authorities and at other levels, to establish how they could best be used to promote the Bill's objectives. Targets are only of any value and validity if they make sense, and lead to policy decisions that allow the promotion of policy objectives.

I do not think that operating at national level makes much sense in this context, because of the variations to which I have referred. We need a more focused approach based on one or two regions. There might be enormous variations between the regions. One might be a dense urban area—the west midlands spring to mind, if not London, which always seems to be cited as an example—while the other might be much more rural. In the south-west of England, for instance, the climate is different, the wind patterns are different and the days of sunlight are different. Such an approach would enable us to establish much more meaningfully the possible effects of solar panels and windmills as a viable source of alternative energy in, for example, a dense urban area. I remain to be convinced on that point.

What happens will of course depend on decisions that we make on later parts of the Bill, which involve the interesting and complex issue of the planning regime that we intend to introduce, as against what are perceived to be environmental or energy-related imperatives. There is a potential for conflict that we may not be close to resolving.

Mr. Chope: Does my right hon. Friend envisage competition between the different regions over targets, over which of them had met their targets or exceeded them, or over the margins by which the targets had been exceeded?

Mr. Forth: That is always a possibility, but my initial reaction to my hon. Friend's suggestion is that I am unsure how productive that approach would be, given the variation between regions. Indeed, if he and I are to follow our own precept—the importance of local decision making—we need to be cautious about taking a competitive approach to target setting at regional level. We expect a lot of the heavy lifting to be done by local authorities, so although my hon. Friend's suggestion is intriguing, for the moment, I would probably set it to one side.

I hope that the Minister and the Bill's promoter will give serious thought to my suggested approach. I am genuinely trying to make the Bill more workable, and I have doubts about a blanket, national approach. If we are to remain focused, we need to work our way carefully through—

Mark Lazarowicz: I appreciate the right hon. Gentleman's close scrutiny of the Bill, but it might have been a little more helpful had he accepted my invitation to serve on the Standing Committee. He could have pursued these points in detail in that Committee, and we might have been able to satisfy his concerns and to reach a consensus.

Mr. Forth: That is a possibility; on the other hand, it might have prolonged consideration in Committee.

[Mr. Forth]

Rather than consisting of a happy band of like-minded people involved in a rubber-stamping exercise, the Committee might have had to debate these issues at length. I accept that there is a trade-off and that the hon. Gentleman is entitled to take the view that, instead of having enthusiasts on such Committees, we should have people with seriously opposing views who participate in serious debates. Had that happened, we would probably barely have dealt with the first group of amendments before us in one average Standing Committee sitting. However, I accept that there is a plus and a minus.

Mr. Chope: Does my right hon. Friend accept that if he and, say, I had been serving on that Committee, it is most unlikely that the Bill would have reached consideration on Report today, and that the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz) would have missed his slot for this Friday?

Mr. Forth: Yes, but the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz) is in a very fortunate position—he and I have discussed this, in the friendliest possible way—in that, because the House has sensibly progressed and passed so few Bills this Session, which gladdens my heart, he has a vast array of Fridays ahead of him on which he can bring the Bill back to the House. So we can take a leisurely view: there is no time pressure at all and wherever we may end up today, the hon. Gentleman can happily bring the Bill back next Friday, or on a subsequent Friday, and we can continue our debate. We may or may not finish it then, and if not, he can bring it back again. In my experience, that is a very fortunate, if not unique, position for such a Bill to be in. So we can take a much more relaxed approach than might otherwise be the case, and the 99 happy souls who have just gone through the Aye Lobby can come back on other Fridays and express their support for the Bill. I am sure that they will be delighted to do so. I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on his good fortune, and he is quite properly able to take advantage of his prominent position in the private Member's Bill ballot.

I return to the regions, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as you doubtless want me to do. I hope that the House begins to see my thinking. A regional approach would be uniquely appropriate to the subject of this Bill, given the variations in housing density that I have mentioned. In that context, we have yet to explore the viability of a target-based approach. The assumption is that targets are the way ahead, and we all know how fond this Government are of targets, but what will be the policy outcome if they are not met? There is the interminable argument as to whether one should pitch targets at a low or realistic level in the expectation that they will be met, or at a deliberately much higher level in the hope that they will be met, while fearing that they will not. That is a separate issue. The more important issue is what happens if, the targets having been set and measured, we find that we are failing to meet them? We would probably be able to respond much better, in a more focused and practical way, at regional level than we would be able to do at national level, for a variety of reasons. We could then bring to bear the combined resources of the Government and local authorities, and if appropriate regional authorities, in so far as they are relevant, rather than attempting to deal with the matter nationwide.

Mr. Chope: Given, for example, the recent national target to reduce poverty among children, the Government missed that target by 300,000 children. Would that have had the same prominence in the media if a series of individual regional targets had been missed?

Mr. Forth: I am sure that my hon. Friend is right in that. That is one of the trade-offs or balances that we inevitably have to strike in these matters. There is the impact that the figures might have. I concede to my hon. Friend that there is a risk that if we went down the regional approach that I am suggesting there might not be the impact that the national figure might have. That is a presentational impact, with, perhaps, policy repercussions on Government. Against that, I am prepared to trade off what I believe would be the benefits of a more focused and a more regional approach.

Subsection (5) states that if "a target is designated under subsection (1)"—

at the moment, we are talking about a national target, but this would apply equally to my regional targets—

"the Secretary of State must take reasonable steps to secure the target is met."

I do not know what that means. I hope that the Minister will sum up this part of the debate. He might tell us what he envisages would be the departmental or governmental response to a failure to meet a target, be it national or regional, not least bearing in mind that new clause 4 appears to have placed much of the responsibility for the delivery of this policy on local authorities rather than on national Government. It says, interestingly—here is the escape hatch—that if

"the Secretary of State does not designate a target under subsection (1) he shall publish forthwith a statement of his reasons."

If we take the regional approach that I am suggesting, and if we were to undertake what amounts to a pilot scheme in one of the regions, the Secretary of State might want to return, having conducted that pilot project, to say, "I do not think that the target approach will work in this case," for whatever reason. He might say that the Government were not able sensibly to formulate a target or that they fell so far short of it that the outcome demonstrated that the targeting approach, in this context, did not make very much sense, or whatever.

The let-out, if we want to put it that way, is interesting. Funnily enough, I rather welcome it. I do not see any point in a Bill such as the one that is before us trying to shackle any Secretary of State so much, and certainly not to oblige him to provide targets, either national or regional, to such an extent that if, for some reason, they were not met, we would then have to continue to produce endless revised targets—something that the Government have often done in the past—that is, to set a target, fail to meet it and so change the target downwards so that it is then more easily achieved. That does not get us anywhere. In a funny way, the let-out, if I may call it that, in subsection (6), probably makes a degree of sense.

Mr. Chope: Is my right hon. Friend not concerned that the let-out is linked into a specific date, which is 1 November 2008, as set out in subsection (2)? Does not that make him rather suspicious?

Mr. Forth: I am a naturally suspicious sort of person. It does not take my hon. Friend to encourage any suspicion in me. That part of the clause gave me some cause for thought. I do not know what the significance of 1 November 2008 is—it may be of some magical or mythical significance in government, in the environmental lobby or whatever. It is something that escapes me.

Mr. Chope: Is it around the time at which, if the present Prime Minister is still in office, he will have been so for longer than Baroness Thatcher was?

Mr. Forth: I can hardly bear to contemplate that thought. If the Prime Minister is simply hanging on to office in order to exceed the magnificent achievements of Baroness Thatcher, it would be very sad indeed. We will pass on from that thought.

Clause 3(7) would, sensibly if ominously allow the Secretary of State to "review the target"—

or, in the case of my amendment, the targets—

"and, if he considers it appropriate to do so, revise the target."

Of course it does, but it brings into question the whole benefit, if any, of the target-based approach. I gave the Bill the benefit of the doubt, because I could have tabled an amendment to remove clause 3 completely and I was tempted to do so. Instead, I decided to be, as ever, positive and helpful in my approach and to seek to make the clause more workable, despite my doubts about it. That led to my attempts to recast it on a regional basis. However, when one realises that the Secretary of State may revise the targets and that, indeed, he does not need to designate any at all, one begins to wonder what the Government and the promoter of the Bill have in mind.

What would happen if the targets were not met? My hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch mentioned an important target on child poverty that has just been sadly and dramatically missed. What would be the policy response if insufficient numbers of people put little windmills on their roofs to boost the energy input to their home and, by implication, help to save the planet? Would the Government undertake to subsidise the installation of little windmills, or would they provide tax relief on them? I do not know what would happen and we have had no hint on it. Nothing that I have heard so far has explained to me what will induce people to put solar panels or little windmills on their roofs, where—I hope—they would not disturb their neighbours or destroy the visual impact of their community.

If we were to have a regional approach, which was well defined and set up, properly focused and monitored, and the target were not met, we would have the opportunity on a regional basis to ask where we should go from here. Why is it that the expectation of lots of windmills in East Anglia or lots of solar panels on the Isle of Wight or in the south-west of England has not been met? Why have the ambitious and optimistic targets that we have set not been met? What do we now have to do? Do we have to give people incentives? Do we have to introduce penalties? Do we have to try to shame people?

There is any number of possible approaches, but at the moment all we seem to have is wishful thinking. We have endless stories about how climate change is the greatest threat to mankind, but that is so nonsensical as to be hardly worth contemplating. I would have thought that terrorism, war, disease, lack of clean water or avian flu are much more immediate threats to mankind than a rather dubious change in the climate in 50 or 100 years' time. That is just my view and I hope that we will have a chance to explore it in much more detail on Third Reading and if we ever reach the Climate Change Bill.

Mr. Chope: It is not clear to me whether my right hon. Friend supports amendments Nos. 30 and 31, which would remove subsections (7) and (8) from clause 3.

Mr. Forth: Sadly, I do not, because—as I have tried to explain—I have a jaundiced view of targets and I favour the idea that if a target is set, but turns out to be so wide of the mark that it is useless, it makes sense to give the Secretary of State an escape hatch. If the Secretary of State were honest, he could say, "I have tried this approach. It patently did not work, so I shall not indulge in this pretence or self-delusion any longer." I do not want to force Secretaries of State to have meaningless targets. That is what I am trying to say. From that point of view, perhaps to my hon. Friend's surprise, I accept that these provisions should remain in the Bill. I do not think we should get ourselves so caught up in this frantic frenzy of people falling over one another to say, "I believe in climate change more than you and I am going to do more than you to solve it." It is a problem that we cannot measure, that may or may not happen, and that is so far in the future that it is of little or no relevance to this generation or the next. To start to formulate policies to try to meet—

Mark Lazarowicz: I am somewhat surprised at what the right hon. Gentleman has to say. His own party leader has publicly indicated that he is going to install a wind turbine on his house, which I welcome, so I am surprised at the right hon. Gentleman's line. I suggest that he has a chat with his party leader before next week, if the Bill comes back then, listens to what he has to say on the matter and follows a slightly more constructive approach than the one he is adopting today.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's advice that I have discussions with my party leader, but ours is a wonderfully democratic party that believes in the right of individual members to have their own views, to account to their electorate and to participate in debate, which is what I am doing. I believe in the conclusions of their lordships' Economic Affairs Committee. I am trying to paraphrase its report. I am sure the hon. Gentleman has read it; I hope he has. I agree with their lordships, and if I have not exactly reflected the conclusions that they came to, I will try to do better next time when we have a more extensive debate about climate change in the round—I know that

[Mr. Forth]

Mr. Deputy Speaker would not want me to engage in that now. As for whether I must slavishly follow what my party leader or, indeed, anyone else says, the hon. Gentleman obviously does not yet know me very well. We will become better acquainted as these debates go on. I have my own views on these matters and I am prepared to account to my voters for them and to set them out whenever I have the opportunity to do so.

Mr. Chope: Does my right hon. Friend accept that by 1 November 2008 the leader of our party, our right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron), may be Prime Minister?

Mr. Forth: Would that that were so, but I shall not explore that matter any further, because if I did Mr. Deputy Speaker would be on his feet and I shall allow him to keep his seat on this occasion. So I must go on to subsection (8) and follow the point that my hon. Friend made earlier. It is rather comforting and states that if the Secretary of State revises a target,

"he must publish a statement of that fact together with a copy of the revised target".

Here again I believe that the regional approach that I am suggesting would enable the Secretary of State to focus much better on the target, its accuracy or otherwise, and whether it was met, nearly met or completely wrong. Almost inevitably, that would allow much more sensible policy conclusions to be drawn than if we were to attempt to do so at a national level.

Mr. Chope rose—

Mr. Forth: I am about to conclude, because I sense that my hon. Friend has a contribution to make and I would not want the discussion of this part of the Bill to run out of time before he does so, but I shall give way.

Mr. Chope: Does my right hon. Friend share my concern that subsection (8) does not include any requirement for the Secretary of State to give any reason for revising a target? Does he think that that is a real weakness?

Mr. Forth: Yes, it is. It reflects the soft approach that the Bill takes. On reflection, I would have preferred what my hon. Friend has just said. I believe that the Secretary of State should be able to say that the target approach has not worked, but it would be much better if the Secretary of State were obliged to say why. This clause is a mixture of the good and not so good. Targets are worth trying, but my firm view is that they would be much better done on a regional basis rather than a national one. A national basis would conceal far too many variations to make the policy conclusions that might come from targeting of any use at all. I hope that serious thought will be given to my amendments, because otherwise we will be embarking on another useless round of aspirational target setting with very few policy outcomes.

2 pm

Gregory Barker: Microgeneration is at the heart of the Bill. It is an essential element of a decentralised energy policy, which could provide a substantive part of the answer to the challenges of climate change in the United Kingdom. My party, under the leadership of—[Interruption.] I paused because I was about to mention the Christian name of my right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron), which would obviously have been out of order. Under my right hon. Friend's leadership, my colleagues are considering what substantive part we can play in future energy policy.

We take microgeneration extremely seriously, and it forms an important part of the Bill. However, the amendments tabled by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) add nothing to the Bill; they cloud it. I always thought that the Conservative party was sceptical—to say the least—about anything that could be seen as a regional solution. In England we are not a nation of regions, but of counties and cities, and steps towards regional government have been firmly rebutted, so I am surprised that my right hon. Friend vests so much faith in regional solutions. They are costly, bureaucratic, opaque and, given that we have no democratic structures at regional level, undemocratic and unaccountable.

Regional targets are no good. Industry needs national targets to spark investment, and such a target could include a breakdown of how much each region should do to promote microgeneration.

Mr. Chope: Does my hon. Friend accept that my amendments Nos. 30 and 31, which would remove subsections (7) and (8), would be good for industry by introducing a degree of certainty to the clause?

Gregory Barker: The Bill is sufficient as it stands. Amending it at this stage would not be helpful to the central purpose that the overwhelming majority of us support—to pass the Bill. I see nothing in the amendments that is designed to be constructive in achieving that end. My right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst said that he had the right to disagree. Of course he has. We are a broad church in the Conservative party.

Michael Fabricant: And tolerant.

Gregory Barker: Indeed, but no one can doubt the new direction that we are charting in putting issues such as climate change at the top of our political agenda. The amendments are not supported by Conservative Front Benchers. We oppose them, and we wholeheartedly support the Bill.

Malcolm Wicks: Clause 3 was the subject of much debate in Committee. When developing our views on the need for microgeneration targets, we will consult a wide range of people and organisations as a matter of course. That makes amendment No. 7 superfluous.

Regions will be able to set their own targets for microgeneration within any national target that we may set, and it would be more appropriate for them to do so, rather than central Government setting them. On those grounds, I oppose amendments Nos. 8, 9, 10, 16, 18 and 20.

Amendments Nos. 30 and 31 would remove the provisions that give the Secretary of State the ability to revise any target that may have been set. Given that the microgeneration industry is in its early stages, it is important to have the flexibility to ensure that targets remain realistic but challenging.

Amendments Nos. 17 and 19 appear to be drafting amendments, for which I find no need, but Government amendments Nos. 36, 37 and 38 improve the Bill, and I hope that they have hon. Members' support.

We support the retention of clause 6 as drafted, without amendment No. 12. The word "appropriate" is deliberately broad, whereas amendment No. 12, tabled by the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), might be too prescriptive, as we may wish to consider other things when making such a decision. However, I assure him that when considering whether to use the powers in clause 6, we will, as always, ensure that we do so in a way that is effective and cost-effective, as well as environmentally beneficial.

In summary, I support amendments Nos. 36, 37 and 38, and I oppose amendments Nos. 7, 8 to 10, 12, 16 to 20, 30 and 31.

Mr. Chope: I shall speak to amendments Nos. 30 and 31, which I tabled, and express my disappointment that the Minister feels it necessary to take the power to review a target and, if he considers it appropriate, to revise it. That is about the Government moving the goalposts—to use a different analogy—and the danger is that once the microgeneration industry begins to grow, the Government will change the targets by revising them downwards, or eliminate them altogether.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker) says that such targets are needed nationally to give confidence to the industry. Surely the industry would have more confidence if it knew that a cynical Government, who have already changed any number of targets and definitions in their time in office, could not come along and say, "Well, we had this target but we don't think it's right now, so we're going to revise it."

Of course, as I pointed out in an intervention on my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), the Government could revise the target under clause 3(8), without the need to give any reason why they wanted to review it or to engage in any consultation on their proposals to do so. That would be a matter for the Secretary of State.

I am pretty sceptical about all this, as I think is apparent, but if clause 3 means anything, it is designed to try to promote mirogeneration. However, it is hedged around with caveats and exceptions and gives too much power to the Minister. It will enable him not to announce a target until 1 November 2008, and then perhaps to decide that he does not want to do so after all. If he chooses to announce a target, he can revise it without giving any information on why he wishes to do so.

If, as the Minister says, what he has in mind is that the revision should always be upwards, why did he not say so? Significantly, he omitted to say that. If the Government were saying, "We'd like to revise targets to make them more demanding, but we'll never revise them just because it's apparent that we can't meet our objectives," I would have a little more confidence. However, the Minister does not want to do that, because the Government have set targets just as the old Soviet empire used to set lots of targets—targets that are abandoned as soon as the date at which the measurement should take place approaches.

I am sure that many people throughout the country realise that targets are just a device used by the Government, and have no point unless sanctions can be imposed for failing to reach them, and no discretion is left to the Government to revise them to suit their own objectives. I will not dwell on what we have referred to briefly, but this week's news that the child poverty reduction target has not been met is a supreme example of how worthless targets are. The Government are not prepared to accept that there are now 300,000 more children living in poverty, and they are not explaining why the target has not been met, or apologising. That just shows the worthlessness of such targets.

If we are going to have targets, they should be robust ones. The Minister, or the Secretary of State, should be forced to stick to them. That would be no big deal, because if they miss them there is no sanction—only the sanction of being held up to ridicule in the court of public opinion. I suppose one could say that has happened with the failure to achieve a reduction in child poverty, which we have heard about this week.

If the Secretary of State is going to revise a target, why should he not give reasons for revising it? I cannot understand why my hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle does not think that that is a reasonable safeguard or requirement. I must leave him to make his own points about that. However, I agree with him in his suspicion about the whole regional agenda.

Mr. Forth: Before my hon. Friend embarks on this part of his analysis, may I point out that I am fairly certain that the Conservative party has just been reorganised on a regional basis? I hope that the chairman of the party does not read the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker) about that being bureaucratic, costly and useless. If that happens, my hon. Friend will be in a bit of trouble, and I will be marching in lockstep with the chairman of the party.

Mr. Chope: I hope that our party has not been reorganised on a regional basis. My understanding is that although people called regional directors have been appointed, they are not responsible for areas coterminous with—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Fascinating though this subject may be to detached observers, I honestly do not think that it can be brought within the framework of the amendments that we are dealing with.

Mr. Chope: I am sure that is right, Mr. Deputy Speaker. On the Government's regional agenda, my right hon. Friend is suggesting the incorporation of regional targets. Therefore, he is effectively referring to the seven Government regions in England.

Mr. Forth: I carefully avoided referring to the Government regions; I do not think that I made any reference to them in my amendment or my remarks. I was trying to suggest that in the context of climate, windmills and all the other things, a breakdown by region—using regions that might be completely different from Government regions—would be more sensible. I hope that I avoided any suggestion that I was picking up the Government's regional structure and seeking to use that; I was not.

Mr. Chope: In that case, I shall criticise my right hon. Friend for tabling amendments that might result in unintended consequences. As soon as we refer in legislation to regions—particularly given the Government's attitude to regions and the Deputy Prime Minister's promotion of them even when they have been rejected by regional referendums—that will be used to bolster the regional agenda. The next development will be the idea that in order to police the regional targets, or even determine what they should be, it we need an elected regional assembly of people who are accountable to the region. One can imagine just such an argument developing. That is why I am instinctively against such a provision.

My right hon. Friend and I were members of a Government who naively thought that devolving some Government offices to the regions would bring the administration of government closer to the people, without setting up regions within the context of the European Union regions. I am afraid that however well intentioned that proposal was, it has resulted in a regional culture developing. My constituency is right on the border between one region and another, and is closer to the London region than to the centre of the south-west region, let alone the south-east region, and we feel strongly there that regionalism and all that it involves is bad news rather than good news. That is my concern about the regional targets, although I accept that my right hon. Friend says that regions could be defined in another way. I suppose that he has in mind an area larger than an individual local authority area.

2.15 pm

Mr. Forth: I confirm that I have in mind East Anglia, for example, or the south-west: in other words, large geographic—or, dare I say it, climatic—regions in which the distinctions that I was suggesting would make sense. I am avoiding Government administrative regions, and even worse, European regions, and am trying to avoid the constraints of even local government boundaries. I am thinking more of the sort of regions that would make sense in the context of the Bill and its objectives.

Mr. Chope: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for clarifying that. During his clarification, he referred to the south-west, which is a region. Those of us who live in the south-west and are concerned about regionalism are at pains to point out that the most westerly part of the south-west, far from being the south-west region, is the west country. That is how true people from the west country refer to their area. If he had referred to the west country rather than the south-west, I would have had a little more confidence in his approach to regionalism.

Mr. Forth: In that case, may I recant and move an amendment to what I said, to delete "the south-west" and insert "the west country"?

Mr. Chope: I am sure that my constituents will forgive my right hon. Friend for having referred inadvertently to the south-west in that context. If one is based in central southern England—as you will know from your geography, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that is where Christchurch is located—it is hard to regard it as being the south-west. That is the problem with the regional concept that my right hon. Friend has introduced with his amendments.

The substance of our debate is about microgeneration and the targets for it. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle, I believe that if we are to have targets for microgeneration, it is probably better to do that on a national basis, and ideally on a United Kingdom basis—but I understand that that is not possible. Then we could work back from there.

I do not wish to detain the House much longer. All I really want to do is put on record my high degree of scepticism about clause 3: the Government have any number of let-out provisions. If my amendments Nos. 30 and 31 were agreed and subsections (7) and (8) were deleted, that would add significantly to the ability of the clause to achieve what is meant to be the avowed objective of the Bill—to encourage microgeneration and encourage people to invest in it. People are not going to invest in microgeneration if they can see that the whole concept could be disregarded by the Government should they so wish, although in the present climate of opinion it seems like a good thing.

I have no doubt about the commitment of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition to microgeneration, and in that respect he leads by example. However, he does so without the need for any targets. He is not waiting until 1 November 2008 to act, and there is no reason why anyone else who wants to engage in microgeneration needs to wait until then. I strongly advise people who are thinking of investing in microgeneration equipment to go into the marketplace and seek it, irrespective of any targets—whether national or regional—laid down by the Government. If microgeneration is a good thing and people are prepared to invest in it, we should let that happen, but we should not pretend that clause 3 will make any significant difference.

Mr. Forth: I was of course disappointed, although not surprised, by the Minister's reaction, which illustrates the problem that we have with our procedure to which the promoter of the Bill, the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz), referred a short while ago. It is rather assumed that amendments made in Committee in a friendly way when people all agree with each other are okay, but that if people have the gall to table amendments on Report, it is somehow outrageous or unacceptable. That is a rather sad comment on the parliamentary process.

The Minister said two interesting things, one of which was encouraging and another that was rather intriguing. He might regret giving the usual consultation undertaking. He said that the Government will consult before they set the targets, but there would be a problem if the responses received from those who were lucky enough to be consulted were somewhat at odds with the Government's intentions. It is not unknown for political parties to undertake consultation. If the answer to the consultation is not what was expected, the party can try to go off in a different direction, although that would be very rash. I remain to be convinced that the consultation exercise will be in any way meaningful, and it remains to be seen with whom there will be consultation.

I was intrigued that the Minister said—I tried to write it down, but I am sure that he will correct me if I have got it wrong—that we should not worry about the regional point because the regions will be able to set their targets within any national targets. That does not make sense. How could we ensure that the regional targets that were set would sum to a national target? If there was a difference, how would we explain and deal with it? The proposal would be a rather odd way of going about things. After the Government have undertaken their consultation process with people as yet unidentified, presumably they will come forward with simply a national target for microgeneration.

I suppose that we would be considering the government regions—what else could they be—to which the Government seem still to cling. I am happy to say that we still oppose the regional bodies—that is one of the things that we have not yet changed. Each region would set its own target, but what would happen if the sum of the regional targets fell far short of the Government's national target, or, even more surprisingly, exceeded it? How would the regional targets fit into the subsequent monitoring of the national target? If there was a shortfall, or—surprise, surprise—the national target was exceeded, what would be the policy outcome for the regions in which the targets had been set?

We all look forward with great anticipation to finding out how the mechanism will work. I assume that the Minister was reading from a brief when he made his intriguing comment. If not, when he goes to his officials and says triumphantly, "Now look, I want you to set about erecting the procedures and mechanisms whereby this will happen," they will all have a merry time doing it. I await the outcome with some interest.

Mr. Chope: Does my right hon. Friend envisage the Government introducing the regional breakdown of a national target in their regional planning guidance?

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that, and I am sure that the Minister is as well. Our old friend guidance is something that any Minister can reach for with a sigh of relief and in a relatively unconstrained way. Guidance does not require any parliamentary process. Unlike primary or delegated legislation, it can be issued at the whim and fiat of the Minister. It is then increasingly held to have the force of law.

My hon. Friend is correct that it is entirely possible that guidance could be issued to the regions on how they might go about setting the targets that the Minister said they will be allowed or, indeed, encouraged to do. However, that still does not get around the problem of the regions' targets not summing up to the national target that the Government set. Guidance would not solve that unless there is an iterative process between the Government at a national level and the regions as to how, on the one hand, they allow the regions to set their own targets and, on the other, they square it with the national targets. We do not know whether that is the case, however, because we have not heard from the Minister. Sadly, these debates are not structured in that way. We will not hear from him unless he wants to intervene, and there is no sign that he does because he has not thought about any of this.

I do not know whether my hon. Friend, with his extensive ministerial experience, finds that convincing, but it is the only explanation that I can offer to get around the problem that the Minister has set for himself and his officials. I am not sure whether it would work.

Mr. Chope: I am becoming persuaded of my right hon. Friend's opinion on the matter. If the regions do a bottom-up exercise, the totality of what they consider to be their targets could become the national target. I think that is the point that he had in mind when referring to regional targets.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. That was indeed my approach, but the Minister has reversed all that. I am trying to study the Minister's body language, but he is remaining sphinx-like. He is probably regretting what he said and wondering desperately how it is all to be done. The truth is that we are completely in the dark. I laid all my cards on the table in my usual open, helpful and co-operative way, seeking to add to the lustre of the Bill, but, rather disappointingly, that has been rejected by, well, virtually everybody. However, in rejecting my helpful and co-operative suggestions, the Minister came up with his policy, which he did either on the hoof or because it was offered to him by his officials as something that would sound reasonably emollient and fit in with the spirit of the Bill. My suspicion now, however, is that he has given himself a real difficulty.

When we conclude this part of the Bill in just two minutes' time, the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz) will tell us when he is going to bring it back to the House. That will give us all time to reconsider the problem and, if it is in order, to table further amendments. The Minister might table an amendment which tells us how he proposes to honour his undertaking.

Mr. Chope: My hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker) and I are suspicious of the regional agenda. Does my right hon. Friend agree that it would have been more logical for the Minister to say that the national targets will be broken down at local government level, especially if the Bill refers to lots of individual local authorities?

Mr. Forth: There may be an anomaly there as well, but we do not know whether that is the case. We are now caught in a trap between the certainty of the national target, which is in the Bill—the Minister said that he wants to keep it, so that is pretty much that—his hint about the possible involvement of the regions, about which we know no more, and the impact of new clause 4, which gives an unequivocal position in the mechanism for local authorities at all sorts of different levels. I hope that the Bill's promoter is as worried about that as he should be, although he does not look worried; he looks happy, because we have made splendid progress on his Bill.

Mr. Chope: How does my right hon. Friend think that the possible inclusion of the Greater London authority fits in?

Mr. Forth: Frankly, that is for the Minister to say. He should come back to the House, perhaps when we next consider the Bill, with an amendment that sets out how he will honour his new commitment—

Domiciliary Oxygen

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Watson.]

2.31 pm

Sandra Gidley (Romsey) (LD): I welcome an early opportunity to highlight problems with the new contract for delivering oxygen to people's homes, which was the subject of heated debated in Health questions. It is nice to see the Under-Secretary of State for Health, the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Byrne), but I regret that he does not have direct knowledge of the subject or responsibility for overseeing the implementation of the new service which the Minister of State, Department of Health, the right hon. Member for Liverpool, Wavertree (Jane Kennedy) described, perhaps inadvertently, as a shambles. I therefore hope that the Under-Secretary is well briefed.

It is worth setting out the background to the problem. For many years, community pharmacists supplied oxygen cylinders, and that service was supplemented by other companies supplying oxygen concentrators. In a response to a parliamentary question that I tabled, the Minister of State said:

"For many years, patient organisations have sought improvements in the domiciliary oxygen service, which has seen little change over the past 50 years."—[Official Report, 27 February 2006; Vol. 443, c. 435W.]

That is not exactly inaccurate, but the bulk of those concerns centred on the old-fashioned nature of the equipment, rather than on the suppliers.

The Department asked the Royal College of Physicians to lead a multi-disciplinary working group in a review of the clinical assessment and prescribing of oxygen in the home. That group reported in 1999. I have been unable to clarify the composition of the group, so I would be grateful if the Under-Secretary would do so, as it has been suggested that there was not a proper consultation, which prevented full consideration of the benefits of retaining a supply from pharmacies. In 2003, the hon. Member for Tottenham (Mr. Lammy), who then had ministerial responsibility for pharmacies, stated in a written answer:

"Although the working party's terms of reference precluded making specific recommendations about alterations in service provision, a number of the guidelines had implications for the content of the existing domiciliary oxygen service and for the way in which the service is delivered."—[Official Report, 12 June 2003; Vol. 406, c. 1075W.]

He then mentioned that as a result of the exercise, a review of the domiciliary oxygen service had taken place and he would announce the results. It may have been at this stage that the Department of Health issued a questionnaire. A joint response by the pharmaceutical services negotiating committee and the National Pharmaceutical Association made a strong case for cylinder oxygen to continue to be supplied by community pharmacies and proposed a beefed-up monitoring role.

The then Minister announced that the new model would transfer responsibility for ordering oxygen for long-term oxygen therapy from GPs to specialist consultants in hospital. The idea was that this was a specialist service and that many patients would benefit from having oxygen available in different forms. GPs could continue to prescribe oxygen for patients who required relatively small amounts. So far, so good. However, he went on to say that specialist contractors would provide the service, and that a specification for the provision of the service would be drawn up. He anticipated that the new service would be fully operational early in 2005.

Not everybody was happy. The pharmaceutical services negotiating committee lodged an official protest with the Department of Health that the domiciliary oxygen service was to be swept aside and replaced by a secondary-based system. The main strands of the complaint were that it had been launched without proper consultation and put at risk the provision of oxygen therapy to patients. Those proved to be sound words.

However, when the details of the invitation to tender were announced, it was clear that pharmacy was out of the picture. Despite ministerial protestations to the contrary, because the Government required a one-supplier-fits-all approach, and pharmacy expertise did not extend to fitting the concentrators, pharmacy was effectively excluded.

Initially, the service was supposed to start on 1 October 2005. That deadline was not achieved because of legal action by one of the potential suppliers. Throughout this period, pharmacy contractors remained keen to help, and despite the fact that pharmacies had already begun to run down the stocks and infrastructure, such as the vans and storage equipment, they all did what they could to keep the service going. The PSNC tells me that efforts were made to find ways of transferring pharmacies' valuable knowledge about patients to the new suppliers, but the Department of Health and the primary care trusts believed that they did not need that help.

As February 2006 approached, some patients were transferred to a concentrator service but, as the Minister acknowledged in health questions on Tuesday, that was only about half the patients who were receiving oxygen. What she did not acknowledge was that on 1 February there were effectively 30,000 patients without an oxygen service. Those had been relying on the local pharmacy network to supply their oxygen.

Prior to 1 February it was clearly understood by pharmacy contractors that they would not be able to supply oxygen after 1 February other than on a pre-dated prescription, so I was somewhat surprised to read in The Times a letter from the Minister with responsibility for public health stating:

"The service was always planned to be phased over a six month transition period and not suddenly switched".

Such assertions have been repeated by the Minister with responsibility for pharmacy, and they are misleading. That was not the impression given by the NHS in the run-up to the 1 February deadline. If the Minister disbelieves me, I refer him to the primary care contracting NHS website.

In 2005 some frequently asked questions were produced. One was how suppliers would receive their orders. Under the old system, GPs wrote a prescription, called an FP 10, and pharmacists supplied against that. The answer is interesting. It clearly states that doctors would have to use the home oxygen order form—HOOF—and submit it directly to the oxygen service provider. It continues categorically:

[Sandra Gidley]

"The FP 10 will no longer be used for prescribing oxygen, as it is not a prescribable medicine".

As there was no clear cut-off point, it would be helpful if the Minister could explain what the Minister meant when she stated in her letter that the service was to be "phased in", and what phasing was planned for after 1 February. Any phasing should have taken place before that date, when a complete switch-over was planned.

What happened? Within a few days of 1 February, I received complaints from a local hospital doctor that he was unable to discharge patients into the community because of difficulties in obtaining oxygen. He also claimed that many doctors had raised concerns about the transfer to the new system. In addition, I received calls from pharmacists highlighting the long delays experienced by patients receiving oxygen from the new suppliers. Many GPs did not transfer patients as anticipated, and it would be helpful if the Minister were to explain how that process was monitored during the lead-up to 1 February.

Much of the information supplied by GPs was inaccurate or incomplete, which compounded the demand on the inadequate resources of the new suppliers. Air Products, which is one of the new suppliers, claims that 80 per cent. of the HOOF forms that it received had been filled in incorrectly. It would be useful to know what guidance was issued to GPs on the changes and the extra information required on the new forms.

The four main suppliers had insufficient telephone line capacity, and it is interesting that they passed the buck to GPs and patients and blamed them for contacting helplines with general queries about future supply orders. In many parts of the country, the February transfer can only be described as "chaotic". One supplier, Allied Respiratory, was moved to issue a press release stating:

"DoH and NHS had discussed the transitional arrangements, and it had always been anticipated that a gradual change would take place, phasing the transfer of existing cylinder patients from their current suppliers"— namely pharmacies—"to the new suppliers", but that did not happen. Instead supply from the existing network ceased abruptly, leaving patients with no choice other than to pursue the new suppliers for their oxygen from 1 Feb 2006. As I have said, that situation involved some 30,000 people.

It seems clear that the much quoted "phased transfer" was supposed to occur before 1 February and that the scheme was badly managed by the NHS. The original intention was to pass regulations to prevent doctors from using prescription forms after 1 February, which would effectively have curtailed supply from community pharmacies. We have to be hugely thankful for yet another piece of Department of Health mismanagement, which meant that those regulations were never actually passed. That effectively threw the Government a lifeline, because GPs continued to prescribe as they always have done and pharmacists continued to supply and bail out the failing service. Despite the fact that many pharmacies had run down their stocks of oxygen, they rose to the occasion, and many were happy to do so, because they did not want to let down the many patients with whom they had formed close relationships.

That action serves to underscore the importance, resilience and flexibility of the pharmacy network and its commitment to patient care, but the Government clearly fail to appreciate that point. A letter to me from Lord Warner dated 27 April 2005 stated:

"As you will appreciate more is required of the service providers under the new service contract than the delivery and collection of oxygen cylinders".

That statement displays a complete lack of understanding of the role of pharmacists, who, when they delivered oxygen, were on hand to advise on and monitor use. Furthermore, they would often deliver medicines and advise on their usage at the same visit. In fact, that arrangement provided a fully integrated medicines management approach delivered into the heart of the community and reaching some of those in society with the poorest health, which is just the sort of thing that the Government claim they want to see much more of in their latest White Paper.

What of the future? Local arrangements are being implemented to sort out the problem in the short term. I pay tribute to the local practitioner committee in Hampshire and Isle of the Wight, which has been proactive and negotiated arrangements with the primary care trust to ensure that patients receive supplies and that pharmacists are not left out of pocket for helping out.

We must ask ourselves whether it is right to keep the service in the hands of three large suppliers—the number has decreased from four to three because of a takeover—which are likely to struggle with the peaks and troughs of demand. In the past, if a local pharmacist could not supply oxygen, there was usually one not very far away who could step into the breach very quickly. In an emergency, most pharmacists were keen to supply within an hour. The current target is four hours, which is too long for some people to wait for oxygen, and it has been missed in the first month of the introduction of the new contract. There have been reports of people having to wait until the next day for what has been deemed an emergency supply of oxygen. That never happened with pharmacies, because of their individual professional responsibility and commitment to patient care.

On Tuesday, I was disappointed when the Minister of State, Department of Health, the right hon. Member for Liverpool, Wavertree seemed to suggest that because only half of the pharmacy network supplied oxygen, the system was not good enough. In reality, in any local neighbourhood, everybody knew where the oxygen was and worked together to ensure that the patients received a decent supply. Again, there has been a lack of understanding about the system's flexibility and the way in which it worked on the ground.

The Government say much about patient choice and it is a shame that that commitment did not extend to oxygen supply. I therefore read with some interest in Chemist and Druggist about their new campaign for choice in oxygen, which pharmacy trade bodies, multiple wholesalers and individual contractors back. I do not believe that they have got around to asking patients yet, but my feedback and postbag lead me to believe that they would also support it. The National Pharmaceutical Association suggested that the service could be reintroduced as a beefed-up, enhanced service. I hope that the Government will consider that proposal.

When the Under-Secretary responds, I hope that he will be open and candid about the faults and problems that have arisen. Warm words about those who have bailed out the system are not enough. Patients and their relatives have experienced stress, and deaths have been attributed to the failure of the service during the handover. Only an apology will be sufficient.

2.45 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Liam Byrne): I congratulate the hon. Member for Romsey (Sandra Gidley) on securing the debate. She is well qualified to speak about the matter. I thank her for her welcome and assure her that I shall pass on her comments to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

I do not trust The Guardian for much but I relied on it for the hon. Lady's biography. I noted that she spent a long career as a pharmacist, starting in 1979, and that she became a pharmacy manager, a locum pharmacist, and a pharmacy manager with Safeway and then with Tesco. I therefore appreciate that I am up against someone who understands the existing system inside out.

On 1 February, we introduced new arrangements for the supply of oxygen to patients at home through a contract with regionally based suppliers. We did not make those changes for their own sake but because of the benefits that we believed that a new way of doing things could have for patients and health-care professionals alike. They want changes to a service that has remained much the same for 60 years.

Some of the ambitions of the new contract are to replace fragmented delivery and, most important, the limited choice of oxygen equipment available to patients. Again, that is not some sort of fanciful notion. We have done it because we want to support developments in best clinical practice and other changes in the way in which we deliver health care to patients, especially those with long-term conditions. We also wanted to give patients and clinical staff the opportunity to shape a contract themselves. That has been a key driver in ensuring that NHS patients have access to the most modern equipment available. The change is therefore about the future of the service.

As the hon. Lady knows, some of the modern equipment that will be available in the not-too-distant future could change many patients' lives immeasurably for the better, through, for example, devices that resemble a laptop, take oxygen from the ambient environment and channel it to the individual. That also applies to new ways of rendering oxygen equipment and therapy far more portable. Those services can improve quality of life, thus allowing those who can to continue to attend school or work, go on holiday or live life as they see fit.

Improvements in patient care and choice have driven the changes. Patients will no longer have to rely on repeat prescriptions or visiting their GP to obtain oxygen at home. Hospital staff may now order oxygen from suppliers for delivery direct to the patient's home. We believe that health-care professionals can now concentrate on the patient's clinical needs, leaving it to the supplier's expertise to determine the equipment that will best meet their patients' individual needs.

Hon. Members' attention was drawn to the implementation of the contract on Tuesday. Let me begin with some history. In June 2003, the Department announced plans to modernise the home oxygen service. In preparation for that modernisation, it spent about a year developing a service specification with people whose input was important, not least patient representatives, clinicians, experts in the safe use of oxygen systems, and representatives from the industry, in order to improve the care of patients with respiratory and other conditions. This included close working with the British Thoracic Society, which updated clinical best practice guidelines on oxygen therapy. The contract requirements support and reflect those guidelines. Importantly, the service specification also set out measures that would structure the implementation of the changes in two phases.

Information on the competitive tendering requirements and the tender documents were made widely available, including to pharmacy businesses. The market structure of the pharmacy business in this country means that companies such as Safeway and Tesco are heavily involved in it. Some very big organisations are involved; indeed, they are more than big enough to enter into regional contracts, if that is what interests them. In fact, one pharmacy company did put in a bid, although it was unsuccessful. Under the public service procurement rules, regional contracts were awarded to four suppliers, each of which is required to meet all the home oxygen needs of all patients in the region in which they hold a contract.

The service specification highlighted the number of players who needed to be involved in planning and managing the changes. This involved primary care trusts leading implementation locally, in discussion with GPs, pharmacists, hospital trusts, new suppliers and outgoing contractors. Perhaps more importantly, those discussions also involved people representing patients using the service. The PCTs worked hard with GPs and new suppliers to check patient data during the first phase, including securing consent for transfer of personal patient information, to ensure that new suppliers had details of patients receiving this service. Most importantly, we identified many patients who were highly dependent on oxygen therapy, to prioritise their early transfer to the new system. As my right hon. Friend said on Tuesday, more than 30,000 patients using the oxygen concentrator service transferred to new suppliers before 1 February 2006.

The second stage of the transition plan started on 1 February with the intention of managing the transfer of the remaining patients over a six-month period to August 2006. Stage one went without a hitch. In stage two, however, suppliers experienced a very high volume of orders in the first few days of February, and many of the new order forms did not include sufficient information to support delivery of the required service. The need carefully to check these resulted in time being spent prioritising orders for immediate or emergency needs and delivering supplies to new patients.

Sandra Gidley: It surprises me that alarm bells did not immediately ring at that point, with 30,000 patients having switched over. The Minister has mentioned a transition period. He must acknowledge, however, that if the system had gone according to plan there would have been no let-out clause, because GPs would have been unable to prescribe oxygen in a form that pharmacists could supply. That means that, as of 1 February, the system transferred completely to the new suppliers. I am not quite sure where the idea that there has been a transition period comes from, because it has certainly not been the perception of anyone who works in the industry.

Mr. Byrne: I understand from the officials with whom I spoke this morning that a great deal of work went into communicating with GPs and PCTs before the switchover. However, a number of other issues complicated the transition, including the high volume of orders sent to suppliers on the same day, even when patients still had supplies of oxygen at home. Also, a very large number of patients contacted suppliers with queries about the new service. All those factors account for some of the delays in receiving and delivering orders for oxygen.

Action was quickly taken to address the problems. I want to pay tribute here to the tremendous response from the community pharmacists—these are not mere warm words—many of whom will have been the hon. Lady's former colleagues. The part played by many pharmacists in coming forward to ensure that patients' needs came first was magnificent. Both the Department of Health and the NHS greatly appreciate their professionalism and commitment to patient care, which they have displayed in spades over the past few weeks.

We identified the transition issues very quickly and took action to return to plans for a phased transfer. Our key message is that the existing cylinder service should continue to be run through pharmacies to support the managed transfer of patients to new suppliers. GPs and their patients have been advised to use prescriptions in the usual way until they have a date on which a patient will transfer to a new supplier.

Oxygen cylinder suppliers are restocking pharmacies quickly, but as we continue to monitor the service we will reserve the right to take any further action. We are discussing with all cylinder suppliers how best to maintain supplies. New suppliers have taken on resources to prioritise orders and help maintain their delivery schedules.

Implicit in what the hon. Lady said were some questions about pharmacy. She mentioned that my right hon. Friend had said that only 55 per cent. of pharmacies provided cylinder service. As she will know, under the new contract many pharmacists want to expand different parts of their business. Interestingly, a limited number of bids were submitted by what are very big suppliers. The new White Paper sets out a wide range of ambitions for community pharmacists, and during the public consultation in which I participated when drawing up the White Paper we were repeatedly struck by the praise that the public had for community pharmacists. People often said that they would rather go to a community pharmacist for advice because they did not want to trouble a doctor. Many pharmacists recognise that, and feel that it provides exciting opportunities for the future—perhaps more exciting than supplying oxygen therapy.

A number of specific pharmacy concerns have arisen, not just in the House but in the wider world. There has been concern about lost cylinders, for instance, and about financial costs falling on pharmacists when cylinders supplied to them go missing. We know that the issue must be tackled, and we have already facilitated discussions between pharmacy representatives and gas suppliers. That dialogue will continue, with the aim of achieving a resolution as quickly as possible.

There have also been concerns about redundant equipment. We have been discussing with the Pharmaceutical Services Negotiating Committee plans for the payment of a decommissioning fee to pharmacists who have purchased headsets or regulators for use by patients supplied with cylinder oxygen. I understand from officials that those discussions are nearing completion.

I was glad that the hon. Lady mentioned the campaign of Chemist and Druggist, not a magazine that I have had much opportunity to read but one that is, I am sure, read regularly in the hon. Lady's household. The campaign claims that the patient's right to choose has somehow been reduced. We agree that many pharmacists have excellent relationships with patients using the cylinder service, but this is not about suppliers; it is about how we give patients far greater choice, and the chance to take advantage of significant technological advances that have resulted in much better and more modern equipment.

Sandra Gidley: Will the Minister at least admit that the provision of choice is not exclusively linked to the supplier, and that that choice could have been extended if pharmacy contractors had been kept in the loop and incorporated in the system?

Mr. Byrne: With only 55 per cent. of pharmacists supplying the service, there has been a degree of fragmentation in the industry. The question chewed over by the advisory groups that considered the service specification in the first instance, which included patient representatives, is "How can we best secure a wide diversity of modern equipment for patients as quickly as possible?" That will inevitably involve substantial infrastructure and significant research and development. It may well involve global operations so that best practice can be sourced from any part of the world. The question for us is how to ensure that there is a rapid feed-through of modern technology to enable patients to lead the lives that they want to lead. That is why the service specification ended up in its present form. It was drawn up not on the basis of a whim, but on the basis of wide consultation, not least with patients.

In conclusion, we believe that the new contract will help to deliver an improved oxygen therapy service to patients at home. We value the important contribution that pharmacists have made, and continue to make, in supporting the transition to the new arrangements. I appreciate that not all pharmacists will want or need to be involved over the coming months; none the less, we will work with them to help manage the changes. Indeed, doing so is an essential part of updating plans to manage the transition.

Child Support Agency

1. Mr. David Jones (Clwyd, West) (Con): If he will make a statement on the recent performance of the Child Support Agency. [57316]

The Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. John Hutton): Although there have been recent improvements in some areas, the overall performance of the agency is not acceptable. The operational improvement plan that I published in February sets out the immediate priorities for improvements in administration and enforcement. Sir David Henshaw will report his proposals to me for a new system of child support later in the summer.

Mr. Jones: The Secretary of State will recall that on 9 February he told the House that he proposed to make an additional £30 million available to enable the agency to use the services of private debt recovery agents. What progress has he made with that proposal, and will the cost of recovery by those agents be recoverable from the defaulting parent, or will it be an additional charge on the public purse?

Mr. Hutton: The £30 million is available to the agency now to use for that purpose. I understand that it is making progress in deploying the resource for the purposes that I have outlined. It is important that the agency should improve its performance in that regard. As I said on 9 February, relationships end but responsibilities do not. If we are to ensure that the CSA discharges that important aspect of its responsibilities, it will need to redouble its efforts. I am happy to keep the hon. Gentleman informed of progress in that area, and if he has any particular concerns about how those resources will be deployed in his constituency, he is welcome to raise them with me.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend accept that there is widespread agreement on both sides of the House with the efforts that he is making to try to improve the performance of the agency? Will he share with the House the major lessons that he draws from our failure to have a more effective CSA? Might one of them be that, for good reasons, we have kept access to children separate from payment for children? While there are of course noble exceptions to the general rule, is it not the case that it is mostly men who are unwilling to pay up for their children and women who cease to allow the fathers of their children access?

Mr. Hutton: My right hon. Friend speaks with much authority on this issue. We have all known where the difficulties of the CSA have lain in the past 13 years. We should never lose sight of the fact that we are often dealing with chaotic relationships that do not fall within even a broad definition of what we understand a family to be, and that has made it difficult for the agency to make the progress that we wanted it to make. I agree with my right hon. Friend that we should keep the issue of financial support for children separate from the issue of access. Whatever the disputes between partners about access to a child, there can be no lawful reason or excuse for the non-resident parent not to meet his or her financial responsibilities to that child. I hope that as Sir David Henshaw completes his work, none of us loses sight of that important principle.

Mr. David Laws (Yeovil) (LD): Does the Secretary of State agree that the persistent poor performance of the CSA over a long period must have contributed in some way to the poor performance on the issue of child poverty? I acknowledge the progress that the Government have made in reducing child poverty in recent years, but is he disappointed by recent figures showing that they have missed the target by a third of a million? What policy action is he taking to get back on target?

Mr. Hutton: I dispute the observation that the hon. Gentleman made at the beginning of his question. When we came into government, we found that child poverty had doubled. It is now falling significantly, and falling faster here than in any other country in the European Union. We want to make further progress, and if we could ensure that child maintenance was paid more regularly and reliably to lone parents, it might act as an encouragement for more of them to take a job and return to the labour market. That in turn would allow us to make more progress in tackling our child poverty targets. They are ambitious targets, and we will need to do more over the next few years if we are to reach them. Some have said that we should not have attempted to reach that target. Indeed, the hon. Gentleman's party has not committed itself to reaching it, and that is something for him to consider. For all my right hon. and hon. Friends, it is not acceptable for any child to grow up in poverty in this country in this day and age. That is why it is right that we set ourselves the objective of eliminating child poverty, and we remain absolutely committed to it.

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): Like most hon. Members, I suspect, I cannot get through a surgery without at least one or two CSA cases. It seems as if the CSA does not use sensibly the enforcement powers that it already has. I had a case a week ago in which the absent parent owned a property in the constituency, the address of which was given to the CSA by his partner. Not only did the agency fail to get any order over it that could have delivered her some cash, but the notice was served on the wrong address. What is going on?

Mr. Hutton: I do not know the details of that case, but if my hon. Friend would like to raise it with me, I shall be happy to look into it. To be fair to the Child Support Agency—someone needs to be—it is true to say that the number of enforcement actions is increasing substantially at the moment. I said to the chief executive that I wanted to see a significant improvement in that area, and I am glad to say that we are now seeing it. For the future, that is clearly something on which Sir David Henshaw will be focusing his attention: It is crucial that the CSA should do better, and that any successor should do better still. I hope that we can all look forward to surgeries with fewer such cases.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): The Opposition wish Sir David Henshaw well with his mission. Will he consider the background of 800,000 calls to the Child Support Agency going unanswered in one year, and the continuing delays with cases in both the old and new systems? What is the Secretary of State's reaction to the cut in training days and staff trained that is planned for the next financial year? How does he imagine that that will improve staff morale or the performance of the agency?

Mr. Hutton: On the last point, we are recruiting a significant number of additional staff for the Child Support Agency so that it can deliver on the objectives that we set out in the operational improvement plan. I hope that that will contribute to tackling the morale issues to which the hon. Lady referred. I welcome her support for the review that Sir David Henshaw is about to initiate. I understand that he is seeing her hon. Friend the Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) tomorrow to discuss how it can be progressed.

Incapacity Benefit

2. David Wright (Telford) (Lab): What changes to benefit rules he plans to make to encourage more incapacity benefit claimants into work. [57317]

The Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. John Hutton): We set out our proposals for reforming incapacity benefit in the welfare reform Green Paper in January. These changes will help provide more support for more disabled people to return to work, while offering more financial support to those who are unable to do so.

David Wright: If there are to be significant changes in the incapacity benefit system, can we ensure that they are dealt with sensitively and that we have a speedy appeals process, so that if people are asked to move back into work and off incapacity benefit they have an opportunity to appeal against that decision and have it reviewed quickly?

Mr. Hutton: Yes, I can give my hon. Friend that assurance. I agree that we need to improve all aspects of the decision-making process for incapacity benefit. The Green Paper set out proposals in two important areas where that will be possible: first, by redesigning the new personal capability assessment test, and secondly, in relation to the conduct and organisation of the appeals process.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): In 1998 the Secretary of State's predecessor—the present Secretary of State for Transport, the right hon. Member for Edinburgh, South-West (Mr. Darling)—said:

"1 million . . . people say that they want to get back into work but are not being given the chance".—[Official Report, 28 October 1998; Vol. 318, c. 340.]

In 2005 the Prime Minister said that there were 1 million people on incapacity benefits who wanted to get back into work and the Government were determined to get them there. Did the right hon. Member for Edinburgh, South-West fail?

Mr. Hutton: No, he did not. We have seen the number of people claiming incapacity benefit falling very substantially for the first time—it is down by a third—and the first recorded fall in the overall number of people claiming incapacity benefit. All I would say to the hon. Gentleman is that when his party last had its hands on power, the number claiming incapacity benefit doubled.

Tom Levitt (High Peak) (Lab): I am sure that my right hon. Friend will agree that a large proportion of those who might be hoping to get off incapacity benefit and back into work have mental health difficulties, and will face particular problems. Will he assure me that he will have early discussions, particularly with voluntary organisations representing the interests of people with mental problems, so that they can be reassured at an early stage and any period of uncertainty is as short as possible?

Mr. Hutton: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for those comments. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Employment and Welfare Reform has already begun the process of dialogue with organisations representing mental health concerns, and we will continue to make them a priority in the months ahead.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): A constituent came to my surgery on 4 March. Clearly disabled, and on disability living allowance and incapacity benefit, she had been encouraged to take a cleaning job with just two hours' work a week. She found it difficult, but she agreed to do it—and lost £82 disability living allowance and gained a salary of £12. Can the Secretary of State tell the House today whether the changes that he is considering will assist such people so that my constituent will not lose £82 when she gets only £12 in salary?

Mr. Hutton: If that has happened, clearly that lady received some very poor advice. I do not understand on what basis that advice was given to her. If the hon. Gentleman would like to raise that particular case with me, I will certainly look into it. The whole point of the reforms is to make work pay and to help people who are disabled to get back into work. I believe that the right to work should apply both to people who are able-bodied and to those who are disabled, and that is what underpins the Green Paper.

Mr. Pat McFadden (Wolverhampton, South-East) (Lab): What assessment has the Department made of the more personalised, one-to-one support offered by pathways to work and Jobcentre Plus, including the excellent Jobcentre Plus office in Bilston in my constituency, in helping incapacity benefit claimants back into work?

Mr. Hutton: The pathways to work scheme is the most successful back-to-work scheme that any country has developed for people who are disabled. That is not my view but that of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, which praised the work that we have done. If one looks at the evidence from my hon. Friend's constituency and elsewhere, one sees the striking result of our having introduced pathways to work: in areas with the scheme we are twice as successful in getting people back to work as we were before, which is why we are now committed to extending it to every part of the United Kingdom in the next two years.

Mr. Mike Weir (Angus) (SNP): Although the pathways to work scheme has generally been recognised as fairly successful, those working with persons with mental health and learning difficulties have expressed concern that the existing schemes do not adequately deal with those problems. Will the Secretary of State give us an assurance that as pathways to work is rolled out across the country, due cognisance will be taken of that concern and the new schemes will take account of the particular difficulties of those people?

Mr. Hutton: Yes.

Pension Credit

3. Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney) (Lab): What recent assessment he has made of take-up of pension credit. [57318]

The Minister for Pensions Reform (Mr. Stephen Timms): In November there were more than 2.7 million households in Great Britain receiving pension credit—about 1 million more than received the minimum income guarantee that preceded it. New figures on Thursday showed a further sharp fall in the number of pensioners living below the poverty line as a result of the introduction of pension credit.

Mr. Blizzard: Earlier this year I carried out an exercise for Anglia television, living on the minimum pensioner income of £109.45. An overwhelming majority of the pensioners whom I met felt that they were much better off with pension credit and all the other things that this Government have done for them. However, I urge my hon. Friend to continue to raise pension credit each year in line with average earnings. Thanks to council tax benefit and housing benefit, I did just manage on £109.45, but it was a little tight.

Mr. Timms: I congratulate my hon. Friend on his experience. It is certainly right to say that pension credit is helping a large number of pensioners. Last week's figures showed a fall of 1 million—from 2.8 million to 1.8 million—in the number of pensioner households living below the 60 per cent. of median household income threshold since 1997. That is a remarkable achievement at a time when median incomes have been rising quickly thanks to the success and stability that we have seen in the economy. My hon. Friend will be pleased to hear that pension credit will be uprated to £114 from next month, and uprating will continue to be in line with earnings until at least 2008.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): On the subject of take-up of pension credit, on Thursday the Department for Social Development published figures showing that annually £221 million of pension credit goes unclaimed by up to 60,000 pensioners in Northern Ireland. Reasons outlined by those who work in this area are confusion and lack of information. Will the Minister tell the House that more will be done, targeting information at those who are entitled to claim but do not?

Mr. Timms: Yes, I can certainly tell the hon. Gentleman that we are doing a great deal to increase the take-up of pension credit. As I said, there are now more than 2.7 million pensioner households in Great Britain receiving help from pension credit. The Pension Service has sent out 1.5 million mail shots in the past six months and attracted a good response. This year, Pension Service staff will have made 800,000 home visits. I have no doubt that similar arrangements are being made in Northern Ireland, and the figures released on Thursday showing a sharp fall in the number of pensioners living below the poverty line, just in the year following the introduction of pension credit, show how successful the policy has been.

Michael Jabez Foster (Hastings and Rye) (Lab): Scaremongering reports in the press recently suggested that as a result of mistakes that have happened in the system, pensioners will be asked to pay back money. Does my hon. Friend agree that, if they have not made mistakes in their submissions, no one will be made to pay back money as the result of official error?

Mr. Timms: Nobody can be compelled to pay back money as the result of official error. As my hon. Friend rightly suggests, the Conservative party, I am afraid, has been guilty of irresponsible scaremongering, and I hope that we will hear the Conservatives make an apology today to pensioners who have been unduly alarmed. Based on what Conservative Members said, it was reported on Friday that millions of pensioners were being written to, whereas the actual number last year was 76. If it is now Tory policy to frighten pensioners with false claims of that kind, it is just as well that we have found out.

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge) (Con): In the hon. Gentleman's judgment, would a long, complicated and intrusive application form, low levels of take-up, poor understanding of entitlement by claimants and high levels of error in payment constitute the elements of a well-designed benefit?

Mr. Timms: The hon. Gentleman will have seen the figures on Thursday, showing a further sharp reduction in pensioner poverty as a direct result of pension credit. I am pleased that he has not sought to defend the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Ruffley), whose claims were indefensible, but there is no doubt that we have seen a very sharp reduction in pensioner poverty as a direct result of pension credit. That is what it is for, and that is what it is successfully delivering.

Mr. Hammond: I am interested to hear the Minister of State's response. Lord Turner has calculated that 70 per cent. of pensioners will come within the pension credit means test by 2050 if nothing changes. Does the Minister agree that a halt to the spread of means-testing is an essential prerequisite to an effective reform of the pension system—and if so, can he tell the House whether, as far as he is aware, his right hon. Friend the Chancellor now shares that analysis?

Mr. Timms: Of course, Lord Turner drew attention in his report to the success of pension credit in reducing pensioner poverty. He also said that a large future expansion of means-testing could have a damaging effect on incentives to save. My view is that he made a strong case, and the hon. Gentleman will see the Government's response to those points in our White Paper in the spring.

Asbestos

4. Mr. Stephen Hepburn (Jarrow) (Lab): If he will make a statement on asbestos exposure in the workplace. [57319]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mrs. Anne McGuire): The use, importation and supply of asbestos has been banned since 1999. However, building and maintenance workers are still at risk, as they are often unaware that asbestos is present in the fabric of buildings. Consequently, a duty was introduced in 2002 to require employers to identify and manage asbestos. Any work with asbestos must be carefully assessed and planned. Employees carrying out work must be properly trained and work in accordance with plans of work. The Health and Safety Commission has recently consulted on proposals to strengthen worker protection further and implement amendments to the asbestos worker protection directive.

Mr. Hepburn: Is it not a disgrace that employers are yet again trying to renege on their obligations to their ex-employees who worked with asbestos? Will the Minister confirm whether, if the Law Lords up the corridor determine against common decency and fairness, and against the welfare of workers, in a case over the next few days, we will intervene?

Mrs. McGuire: Although I understand my hon. Friend's concerns, it would be inappropriate for me to make any comment on the case now before the Law Lords.

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): Does the Minister agree with the hon. Member for Jarrow (Mr. Hepburn) that another disgrace is what is happening now with regard to asbestos-related diseases in the workplace—not least with those thousands of personnel who served with the Royal Navy pre-1986 who are unable to get compensation? Is it not a strange idea of fairness when the Royal Navy and the Ministry of Defence will pay people compensation for what happened post-1986, but not for exposure to asbestos pre-1986?

Mrs. McGuire: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that the Ministry of Defence has previously considered some of the issues that he raises—but I will, of course, draw his concerns to the attention of my colleagues in the MOD.

Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone) (Lab): I can tell my hon. Friend that before coming into the Chamber, I joined a demonstration of people outside the Lords involving asbestos groups and widows from all over the country who have lost husbands as a result of mesothelioma. Her Department is to undertake a review of the industrial injuries scheme later this summer. Will she make it part of that review to look at the possibility of introducing a scheme, financed by insurance companies, to pay compensation to mesothelioma sufferers and their widows?

Mrs. McGuire: I know of my hon. Friend's deep concerns. Only a few weeks ago we had a debate in Westminster Hall highlighting some of the concerns that he has raised again today, which other hon. Members on both sides of the House share. The Health and Safety Commission is consulting on new guidance. I appreciate the fact that my hon. Friend will work to ensure that every effort is made to secure justice for asbestos workers and their families. I assure him that we will look at all ways in which we can make that happen.

Benefit Payment Methods

5. Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): If he will make a statement on the future arrangements for paying pensions and benefits at post offices. [57320]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. James Plaskitt): The Government are committed to ensuring that benefits and pensions are paid in the most secure and efficient way. That is why we made the successful switch from order books to direct payment. The Government have always said that we will make it possible for anyone who wishes to collect their benefit from the post office to do so. We will fund the Post Office card account until 2010, as was always planned. Anticipating what should happen thereafter, we have been having discussions with Post Office Ltd. for a number of months. I understand that Post Office Ltd. is developing new banking and savings products.

Andrew Selous: In 2004, the Prime Minister said that direct payment customers would still be able to collect their cash from the post office. Given that the Post Office card account is to be scrapped, that high street banks are threatening to kill off the basic bank account, and that not all banks allow their customers to withdraw cash from the post office, will that continue to be the case, and what effect will the current changes have on post offices?

Mr. Plaskitt: As I said, we stand by our commitment to enable those in receipt of benefits or pensions who wish to collect them from the post office to continue to do so. The Post Office card account is one way to do that, but there are 25 other accounts that are also accessible at post offices. As I have said, we understand that the Post Office is developing new products, which may well serve as successors to the POCA when it expires in 2010.

Huw Irranca-Davies (Ogmore) (Lab): The Minister will recall that when the POCA was introduced, it was much derided; however, it has served a useful purpose through its simplicity as an in-and-out account in the post office. Does he share my frustration at the slow speed of development of alternative products that will not only allow in-and-out cash transactions of benefits and pensions but, for example, give people the benefit of standing orders, thus making their bills cheaper? What can we do to put more pressure on Post Office Ltd. and the banks to introduce a far better product when POCA is phased out?

Mr. Plaskitt: My hon. Friend makes an important point. He is right to say not only that POCA has served a useful purpose, but that its functionality is limited. One cannot, for example, attach a direct debit to the account. All of us have pensioner constituents expressing concern about increasing bills for gas and electricity, and one way to reduce that cost is to pay those bills by direct debit, but that cannot be done through a POCA.

Mr. Philip Dunne (Ludlow) (Con): Is the Minister aware of the Post Office's reaction to the Government's unilateral decision? I have a letter from Mr. Alan Cook, the managing director of the Post Office—a letter that I believe several other hon. Members have received today—in which he points out that the Post Office is "disappointed" at the decision and that the Post Office currently loses £2 million a year, after a £200 million revenue contribution, from the POCA. The consequences will be extremely damaging, especially in rural areas. Last week I surveyed the 42 post offices in my constituency, and 100 per cent. of those who responded said that the change either would or probably would jeopardise the viability of their business. Will the Minister respond to that?

Mr. Plaskitt: The Government have not made a unilateral change. I draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to the jointly signed contract between the Government and the Post Office, the introduction to which says:

"A POCA will complement the range of Bank Accounts available to customers; in particular, to promote a service to those who do not have or cannot otherwise obtain a Bank Account."

It goes on to say:

"The POCA is intended to be an interim step for Account Holders who will be encouraged by both Parties to migrate to Bank Accounts which provide services and opportunities not available through the POCA."

The Post Office and the Government have both honoured that contract. If the hon. Gentleman is concerned about rural post office closures he should note that the Government have made available £700 million to support the rural network, and the rate of rural post office closures has slowed considerably from the rate under the previous Administration.

Contracted-out Rebates

6. Mr. Andrew Slaughter (Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush) (Lab): What his proposals are for contracted-out rebates from April 2007. [57322]

The Minister for Pensions Reform (Mr. Stephen Timms): The proposals are set out in the draft order laid before Parliament on 1 March. They include an increase in the flat-rate rebate for defined benefit schemes from 5.1 per cent. to 5.3 per cent., and an increase in the rebates for defined contribution schemes together with a reduction in the cap.

Mr. Slaughter: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that reply, but as he knows, the contracted-out rebate that he has announced is less than the sum recommended by the Government Actuary. Many of us have received representations from the pensions industry and others about that sum. Is that my hon. Friend's final offer, or is he prepared to look at it again?

Mr. Timms: The proposals keep the cash value of the contracted-out rebate broadly unchanged. We are required to review the rebate at least every five years, so we had to make an announcement this month to take effect from April next year. However, we need to look at the rebate again, as my hon. Friend suggested, in the light of the pensions White Paper. We would not need to wait another five years if we decided to make a further change, as it would be possible to change rates again from April 2008 if we thought that it was right to do so.

Benefits System

7. Greg Clark (Tunbridge Wells) (Con): If he will make a statement on the complexity of the benefits system. [57323]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. James Plaskitt): We recognise that over time successive piecemeal changes to benefits have led to undue complexity in the system, but unlike previous Administrations we are addressing that. We have already introduced major design reforms such as easements for the poorest pensioners to claim housing and council tax benefits and the piloting of the local housing allowance. From this April, we will simplify the social fund budgeting loans scheme, making it easier to access, more transparent and more responsive. Longer-term proposals for more radical simplification were set out in the welfare reform Green Paper published in January.

Greg Clark: Is the Minister aware that the National Audit Office says that the complexity of the benefits system has deterred people from saving for retirement? That was illustrated graphically to me on Saturday, when a constituent told me that for 15 years he had saved 10 per cent. of his modest salary for retirement, but has now stopped doing so, because he understands that the impact on his income in retirement will scarcely be worth while. Does that not illustrate that the real problem is the message sent out to our constituents across the country, and is the Minister happy to preside over a system that causes people to behave in that way?

Mr. Plaskitt: First, we should put the record straight about what the National Audit Office said about the Department's record on tackling complexity in the benefits system. It recently published a report on the matter, in which it said:

"Overall, the Department has made some progress in tackling the complexity of the system and in designing ways of managing it to protect staff and customers, but it recognises that there is considerably more to be done."

We accept that there is more to be done. That was addressed in the White Paper, and of course there will be more to say when we respond to Lord Turner's report.

Mr. David Ruffley (Bury St. Edmunds) (Con): Because of the Government's confused and confusing benefits system up to 340,000 vulnerable people who are entitled to income support do not receive it, and up to 500,000 people entitled to jobseeker's allowance do not receive it. At the same time, however, existing claimants are overpaid those benefits by nearly a third of a billion pounds a year because of official error, fraud and incompetence. Are not vulnerable people and the British taxpayer the victims of simple ministerial incompetence?

Mr. Plaskitt: Levels of error and fraud in the system are falling. The Conservative Government did not even attempt to measure fraud and error, but this Government do. I do not know why the hon. Gentleman continues to scaremonger and dig away at the issue. He needs to explain matters to the pensioners he has frightened over the weekend with his stories. He is trying to suggest that, because of overpayments, somehow hundreds of thousands, or millions, of pensioners will have to hand money back. That is not the case. As was explained in answer to an earlier question, we are not clawing the money back. We have contacted only the small number of pensioners—76—to whom duplicate payments of pensions were made. He really should desist from scaremongering.

Unemployment

8. Helen Goodman (Bishop Auckland) (Lab): What steps his Department is taking to assist unemployed people over 50 back into work. [57324]

The Minister for Employment and Welfare Reform (Margaret Hodge): New deal 50-plus provides help and support for people aged 50 and over who have been out of work for six months or more. That successful programme has helped more than 150,000 people into jobs and, as a result, we have helped to increase the employment rate for older workers to more than 70 per cent. Older workers who take up employment can also receive financial support through the 50-plus element of the working tax credit. We have also set out a number of further proposals designed to help older jobseekers into work in our welfare reform Green Paper.

Helen Goodman: I am grateful to the Minister for her response. This is a problem that I have to address in my constituency surgeries from time to time. It is a problem when people are not just capable of working, but enthusiastic about it. Will she explain what the Government are doing to combat age discrimination in the workplace?

Margaret Hodge: The Government have introduced legislation. I think that regulations were laid before the House last week to take further our steps to combat age discrimination. If they are approved by the House, they will come into force this October. We also run a range of campaigns, from the age positive campaign, for which the Department for Work and Pensions has responsibility, to a campaign that we run in partnership with all stakeholders—trade unions, businesses and particular interest groups—to ensure that employers recognise the benefits of employing older workers.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): Who gives advice to people over 50 about those various schemes? Jobcentre Plus in Bicester has closed altogether. Jobcentre Plus in Banbury seems to have become a call centre somewhere in Hampshire that no one can get through to. It is all very well having such schemes, but it is no good if no one knows about them. In days gone by, the jobcentre did two things: it gave people advice on benefits and helped them into work. Jobcentre Plus no longer seems to perform that second function of helping people into work. If the Minister is simply relying on newspaper campaigns, such things are not going to work.

Margaret Hodge: I am happy to correspond with and talk to the hon. Gentleman about the problems that his constituents are experiencing, but I do not recognise the picture that he paints. Jobcentre Plus innovatively brings together support and access to benefits with advice for employment. People access that advice in a variety of ways. Some will access it through the internet and the telephone and those sorts of mechanisms, hence the development of a number of call centres that people can ring. Others will access it by walking into their local Jobcentre Plus office.

In pursuing efficiency, which I hope the hon. Gentleman supports, we have ensured that our network of offices is such that everybody can access an office within a reasonable distance. It is better that we put our money not into offices but into advisers, who are there and capable of helping people. We are also providing outreach services in places such as local town halls and libraries to support people if they want advice about getting back into work.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): May I congratulate my right hon. Friend on last year reaching the Lisbon agenda target for older workers in employment? The Government reached that target six years before they should have done. However, one of the main issues is how we will ensure that older workers can be retrained in new technologies. The challenge of globalisation is to use the full potential of those workers for the benefit of the country as a whole.

Margaret Hodge: I thank my hon. Friend for his congratulations. Our record on getting people into work is now the best not only among many of our European colleagues, but among any of the G8 countries. He is right to draw the attention of the House to ensuring that older workers get skills in new technology. So far, to be honest with him, the training grant available in the new deal 50-plus has not been effective in attracting older workers to undertake further training. We are therefore talking to our colleagues in the Department for Education and Skills to find out whether we can better reach older people through the new deal for skills so that they can take up the skills that will enable them to stay in work, or return to work.

Carers

9. Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): What steps his Department has taken to support carers of people with disabilities through the benefits system. [57325]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mrs. Anne McGuire): Depending on their personal circumstances, carers have access to the full range of social security benefits. Those who provide regular and substantial care for at least 35 hours a week for a severely disabled person receiving attendance allowance, or the highest or middle rate of the disability living allowance care component, can be entitled to carer's allowance and, if on a low income, to the carer's premium in income-related benefits such as income support, housing benefit and council tax benefit, or the carer's additional amount in the pension credit.

Mr. Bone: Does the Minister agree that respite care is both important for carers and cost-effective? Will she consider making respite care a statutory responsibility for local authorities?

Mrs. McGuire: I suspect that that might fall under the responsibility of the Department of Health, but, across Government, we are constantly looking at how we can improve the lot of carers. The Government have a proud record of trying to improve the situation of carers, not least by ensuring that women—they are mainly women—who look after people are entitled to class 1 national insurance. We have increased the earnings limit and are constantly seeking ways in which we can help carers who undertake substantial work on behalf of the whole community.

Miss Anne Begg (Aberdeen, South) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend examine the level of the carer's allowance? On Friday, I met a constituent who looks after a severely disabled daughter. The money that the daughter receives through the disability living allowance goes to buy in respite and extra care, but the mother still spends a lot of time looking after her daughter, so obviously the main household income is the carer's allowance. That is really not a supplement to what someone who was in full-time work would get.

Mrs. McGuire: I fear that my answer might be a bit disappointing to my hon. Friend inasmuch as we are not looking at increasing the level of the carer's allowance. However, we must realise that that allowance can be supplemented by accessing other benefits. We are constantly working with the representatives of carers organisations and carers to examine ways in which we can improve the general support network for carers, several of which have already been indicated, and I hope that in the circumstances that my hon. Friend has highlighted her constituent would be able to look for other ways in which she could, as an individual, increase her income.

Mr. Jeremy Hunt (South-West Surrey) (Con): Given the vital role that the parents of severely disabled children play as carers, is the Minister worried that, according to a Mencap survey, 37 per cent. of such families have to deal with eight or more professionals from different services? Will she considering introducing a simpler system similar to that used in parts of Austria whereby families can be assessed and supported by a single integrated mobile support unit consisting of child doctors, physiotherapists, psychologists and information specialists, thus greatly reducing both bureaucracy and stress?

Mrs. McGuire: I welcome the hon. Gentleman to the Dispatch Box for his first contribution. I see that his Front-Bench colleagues also welcome him. The Austrian experience is particular to the Austrian environment, and I am always reluctant to assume that one can necessarily import a system from another country, because circumstances are different. The hon. Gentleman knows, I trust, that the Government are examining ways in which we can provide joined-up support for disabled people and reviewing our policies across the piece, to try to break down some of the silos created by local and national Government. That is why we have established the Office for Disability Issues, and why the Prime Minister's strategy unit report, which recommended a more cohesive and coherent approach to support for disabled people—children and adults—was so widely welcomed among the disability lobby.

Disability Living Allowance

10. Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): What assessment his Department has made of the effectiveness of its policy on paying disability living allowance to parents of children with disabilities. [57326]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mrs. Anne McGuire): Disability living allowance provides the families of disabled children with some £900 million a year, and up to £102.90 per week in individual cases, to help with the extra costs of their children's disabilities. Some 284,000 children, including 300 in the hon. Gentleman's constituency, are receiving the benefit—an increase of 11 per cent. in the past three years.

Mr. Harper: The Minister will know that there is a 12-week waiting period for disability living allowance. In cases of cancer in children, it is often clear from diagnosis whether they face a long period of chemotherapy or radiotherapy. Will the Minister consider whether, in those specific cases of childhood cancer, it would be possible to waive the 12-week wait, if they face that long period of treatment?

Mrs. McGuire: There are issues about when a benefit can come into force following a diagnosis, but I will reflect on what the hon. Gentleman says. We appreciate that in cases involving children we must try to develop a system that responds sensitively to children's disabilities or health conditions. There is always some disconnect between the point of diagnosis and the commencement of the benefit, but I will consider the hon. Gentleman's comments.

Pensions

11. Mark Tami (Alyn and Deeside) (Lab): If he will review the criteria for entitlement to back payment of pensions. [57327]

The Minister for Pensions Reform (Mr. Stephen Timms): The rules were changed in July 2005 to permit state pensions to be backdated for up to 12 months. People who defer claiming their state pension now receive a larger increase in its value than used to be the case, and there is a lump sum option for those who defer for at least a year, so nobody should now lose out if they do not claim their state pension as soon as they reach state pension age.

Mark Tami: As my hon. Friend knows, I have written to the Department on many occasions regarding the case of Mrs. Lalek, who was underpaid pension for almost 10 years. Under Department for Work and Pension rules, she could receive only a small amount in back payment, despite the fact that she is sure she never received any notification or correspondence from the Department about her entitlement. Should the system not be more flexible, to take account of such cases?

Mr. Timms: I have had the chance to look at some of the correspondence that my hon. Friend sent the Department. I understand that for a number of years his constituent has been receiving the full amount due. The issue in this case was adult dependency increases, which provide additional income-related financial support to the household. The support is income related, so it is not appropriate to encourage deferral, as it is in the case of the basic state pension and state second pension. According to the Department's records, forms were sent out, but in the end it is for people to check what their entitlement is and to submit a claim for benefits to which they are entitled. That appears not to have happened in this case.

Incapacity Benefit

12. Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, South-West) (Lab/Co-op): When he next plans to visit Glasgow to discuss incapacity benefit reform. [57328]

The Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. John Hutton): At the invitation of my hon. Friend, I visited Glasgow last Friday to discuss the Government's proposals for welfare reform.

Mr. Davidson: I am grateful that the Secretary of State visited Glasgow on Thursday, when he met some 60 people for a two-hour discussion. On Friday, he met the city council, around 70 people from the voluntary sector and around 80 employers. Then he went to my constituency, where he met a host of other people, but that was last week: what has he done for me recently? In particular, when does he expect to announce that Glasgow will be one of the pilots for new invalidity benefit roll-out proposals?

Mr. Hutton: My hon. Friend is obviously a hard man to please, so I shall have to return to Glasgow, if he will have me.

Mr. Davidson: Thursday?

Mr. Hutton: I had better bring my cheque book this time.

My hon. Friend has raised a serious point about the city strategy, which is outlined in the Green Paper. We will organise a subsequent event in London later this spring, when we hope to set out further details of our proposals for taking forward that important and innovative part of the welfare reform Green Paper. I hope that that will provide another way to make further progress on getting people off benefit and back into work, which is where they want to be not only in Glasgow, but in all parts of the country.

13. Mr. Robert Goodwill (Scarborough and Whitby) (Con): If he will make a statement on his Department's plans to reduce the number of people claiming incapacity benefit. [57330]

The Minister for Employment and Welfare Reform (Margaret Hodge): Our successful pathways to work pilots have shown that many people on incapacity benefit can move back into work with the right help and support, which has reinforced our view that labelling people on incapacity benefits as "incapable of work" is wrong and damaging. Our reforms will focus as much on how we can help people back into work as ensuring their entitlement to benefit.

Mr. Goodwill: In the Yorkshire region, there are three times as many people out of work and claiming incapacity benefit as there are people claiming unemployment benefit. In the borough of Scarborough alone, more than 5,600 people are on the sick, which is more than 9 per cent. of the work force. Why does the Minister think that, despite record health spending, there are record levels of incapacity in Yorkshire?

Margaret Hodge: I think that I know the answer to that one: the numbers started rocketing upwards when the hon. Gentleman's party was in government, and the unemployment figures appear to have been massaged during that period. In the nine years in which we have been in government, the number of people starting to claim incapacity benefit has decreased by one third, and, for the first time ever, the total number of people on incapacity benefit has started to fall—the total has decreased by 58,000 in the past year, which is a move in the right direction. Our further reform proposals will provide many people in the hon. Gentleman's constituency with the opportunity to work, which is an opportunity that they did not have under the Conservative Government.

15. Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North) (Lab): whether he plans to permit those on incapacity benefit to undertake voluntary work; and if he will make a statement. [57332]

The Minister for Employment and Welfare Reform (Margaret Hodge): People receiving incapacity benefit are already able to undertake voluntary work without affecting their entitlement to benefits, and we do not intend to change the situation when we introduce the new employment and support allowance.

Mr. Allen: As the Minister knows, the city of Nottingham is keen to pursue a city strategy on invalidity and incapacity benefit to get some of the 18,000 people on incapacity benefit back into work. Many people who have been provided with cognitive behaviour therapy, which gives people the morale boost that they need to try to get into work, find their first bridge into work through voluntary work. Will the Minister ensure that people continue not to lose benefit for engaging in voluntary work? Will she also consider giving people who engage in voluntary work a small amount of extra money to encourage them to take the first step on the long road to getting full-time work?

Margaret Hodge: I congratulate my hon. Friend on his work as chair of One Nottingham in tackling some of the issues raised by worklessness in his constituency. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, who gets around the country, visited Nottingham on a previous Thursday and Friday, when he was impressed by the ongoing work. My hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) is right to stress that undertaking voluntary work is central to building the confidence of people who are locked into dependency on incapacity benefit. The rules are flexible, which enables incapacity benefit claimants to earn some money—for one year, they can earn up to £81 a week—and we constantly reflect on how we can build people's confidence.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): As the Minister is probably aware, because she knows my constituency quite well, many voluntary groups there rely on volunteers who are on incapacity benefit. Is not there an argument that some of those volunteers should be paid expenses for the work that they do?

Margaret Hodge: I am slightly puzzled by the hon. Gentleman's question. If there is a problem with expenses being paid, he should write to me about it. As I understand it, under the current rules there is no cap at all on the number of hours of voluntary work that those on incapacity benefit can undertake. Clearly, they need to be covered for the expenses that they incur in undertaking that valuable work in their communities.

Unemployment

16. Mr. Robert Flello (Stoke-on-Trent, South) (Lab): What progress he is making in supporting the hardest to help into employment. [57333]

The Minister for Employment and Welfare Reform (Margaret Hodge): We are committed to supporting the hardest to help into employment, including people on incapacity benefit, lone parents, older workers and people from black and minority ethnic communities. Many of our programmes are targeted at providing support for the most disadvantaged. Our new proposals in the welfare reform Green Paper suggest further radical measures to break down barriers and to enhance opportunities for those who find most difficulty in getting a job.

Mr. Flello: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that reply. She will be aware that industry in north Staffordshire has been particularly hard hit over the past 20 or 30 years. The pottery industry continues to be very hard hit. What steps does she intend to take to engage with city councils—for example Stoke-on-Trent city council—the voluntary sector and employers who are still in north Staffordshire to help those who are the hardest to help to get back into work?

Margaret Hodge: One of the propositions in the Green Paper on which we are consulting is that we must tackle the worklessness that often gets concentrated in cities. We are talking to, among others, the mayor of Stoke-on-Trent city council, who came down and joined a group of people at No. 10 Downing street in the run-up to the publication of the Green Paper. We wish to bring together, under the city strategy banner, all the players from the local authority, the voluntary sector and the statutory sector and its agencies, together with employers, to make a concerted effort to brigade all the resources that go into cities and to be effective in tackling the worklessness that too many of my hon. Friend's constituents have experienced over too many years.

Mental Health (Employment)

17. Alison Seabeck (Plymouth, Devonport) (Lab): What steps are being taken to overcome employer resistance to employing people with mental health problems. [57334]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mrs. Anne McGuire): People with mental health conditions have much to offer, but we recognise that they often face a range of barriers preventing them from getting employment, one of which is employer resistance. That means that we must work in partnership with employers, employees, health professionals and insurers to develop a comprehensive package of support that develops healthy workplaces, retains employees in work, and maximises the effectiveness of health care in rehabilitating people.

Alison Seabeck: I thank the Minister for her response. She knows that mental illness can be very difficult to diagnose, not least because of its volatile nature. What discussions is she having with employers' organisations and the Department of Health on how we can reduce prejudice, improve early diagnosis, and facilitate and fund more effective intervention and treatment, including cognitive therapies and counselling in and out of the workplace?

Mrs. McGuire: A great deal of what my hon. Friend says has an echo in the consultation that we are carrying out under the Green Paper on welfare reform. I hope that that reassures her that some of that work is already happening. There is a partnership between the health authorities and the Health and Safety Executive. We recently published a paper, "Health, work and well-being—Caring for our future", which is groundbreaking in the approach that it promotes. We also need to ensure that employees who develop a mental health condition are given the appropriate support and rehabilitation, recognising, as my hon. Friend says, that mental health conditions can fluctuate and that we need a greater understanding of some of the difficulties that those with such conditions face on a daily basis.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): Does the Under-Secretary agree that those with mental health problems are not helped by ignorant gimmicks? Is not it appalling that, in Norwich, a statue in a straitjacket has been erected to the greatest Englishman of the past millennium? Is not that an insult to his memory and to those with genuine mental health problems?

Mrs. McGuire: I am not aware of the specific incident to which the hon. Gentleman refers. However, anything that denigrates people who have any form of disability cannot be condoned. I hope that that satisfies him.

Iraq: Roulement

3.30 pm

The Secretary of State for Defence (John Reid): With permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I should like to make a statement about our operations and force levels in Iraq.

First, let me express my sincere condolences to the families of Captain Richard Holmes and Private Lee Ellis of 2nd Battalion the Parachute Regiment, killed in Iraq on 28 February, and to the family of Trooper Carl Smith, who died on 2 February. I am sure that the whole House wishes to be associated with those condolences.

We express our sympathy, too, for all those families of the forces of other nations and of the many innocent civilians who have died or been injured as a result of terrorist activity in Iraq in recent months.

Hon. Members will have followed the situation carefully, and will, like me, have been concerned about events, especially those following the disgraceful bombing of the al-Askari shrine in Samarra. Some commentators have suggested that that act of terror will lead to a slide into civil war. Those acts of terrorism are cruel and barbaric but they are not mindless. They have a purpose: to undermine the efforts of the vast majority of the Iraqi people who seek peace, stability and democracy in their country, and to try to break the will of the coalition forces supporting them in that quest.

Despite the ferocity of the terrorists, the Iraqi people will not be defeated and our will to see the job done will not be broken. Our analysis is that civil war is neither imminent nor inevitable. However, in some areas of Iraq, including in Baghdad, there has been an increase in sectarian violence. That is abhorrent and plays to the aim of the terrorists.

However, in the face of the cynical targeting of the Samarra attack, the aftermath has been characterised more by calls for restraint by Iraqi politicians and religious leaders, the calm reaction of the vast majority of Iraqis in all the circumstances, despite their natural revulsion and anger, and the mature response of Iraq's new security forces. In the middle of all the problems, those are encouraging signs in a very difficult and delicate situation.

Our respect and admiration for the men and women of our armed forces remains undiminished. The truly magnificent work that they are doing there is having a positive effect and they have played a vital role in helping Iraq come a long way in a short time. Suffice it to say that the Iraqis have clearly shown us what they want, and it is not a return to fear and oppression. They showed us that most impressively in December when, despite the threats of death and destruction, some 12 million of them voted in free and fair elections. That represents a turnout of about 75 per cent. of the electorate.

The present political wrangling over the formation of a new coalition Government is perhaps natural, but it is also contributing to uncertainty and fuelling speculation. As that process moves forward, the Iraqi politicians must not forget the commitment of the Iraqi people who voted in large numbers to bring order and fair government to a unified Iraq. However, there has been a continual and considerable advance in the numbers, capability and morale of the Iraqi security forces, which have developed as democracy has developed. It is in that context that I turn to our United Kingdom troop presence.

When I announced the last changeover in October last year, 190,000 members of the Iraqi security forces were already trained, capable and equipped. Today there are about 235,000—which is 45,000 more than when I announced the last roulement deployment—and others are joining them at the rate of about 5,000 every month. It is against that background that we assess our own force levels. I can therefore tell the House that, as a result of this roulement changeover, there will be a reduction of British forces in Iraq of about 800 personnel. That reflects the completion of our security sector reform tasks to develop the capability of the Iraqi forces, including training the trainers and those involved in guarding their own institutions. The reduction also reflects improvements in the way we configure our own forces. Our force levels reflect the in-theatre assessments in the south-east of Iraq. Today's announcement marks a reduction from the high point of some 10,000 UK personnel in October 2003 to just over 7,000 from May this year.

The lead formation in Iraq, currently 7th Armoured Brigade, will be replaced in early May by 20th Armoured Brigade. The following major units will be deployed to replace those in theatre today: 1st The Queen's Dragoon Guards; The Queen's Royal Hussars; 12th Regiment Royal Artillery; 33 and 35 Engineer Regiments; 1st Battalion Grenadier Guards; 1st Battalion The Princess of Wales's Royal Regiment; 2nd Battalion The Royal Regiment of Fusiliers (Reserve-Cyprus); 2nd Battalion The Royal Anglian Regiment; 1st Battalion The Devon and Dorset Light Infantry; 1st Battalion The Light Infantry; and 3 Logistic Support Regiment, Royal Logistic Corps.

A number of reserve personnel will accompany this deployment, including soldiers from The Lancastrian and Cumbrian Volunteers, and The King's and Cheshire Regiment. Aviation support will continue to be provided by five Merlin, eight Sea King support helicopters, and four Lynx. In May, there will be a reduction of two Sea King helicopters. Our support to the Iraqi navy and our contribution to the coalition taskforce in the north Arabian gulf will continue unchanged.

Let me stress that the reductions that I have announced today are not part of a handover of security responsibility at operational level. They have not been caused by, nor are they the cause of, changes in troop levels of other coalition allies. In the next few weeks, the joint committee to transfer security responsibility—a body made up of Iraqi ministers, military staff and senior coalition figures—will start the assessment phase to determine whether conditions have been met for some provinces in Iraq to begin the handover process. Today is not that stage of handover. When the committee has reached conclusions, I will of course come back and update the House on the implications of that assessment.

In closing, I would like to reiterate that we continue, amid the struggle in Iraq, to make progress. Of course, much remains to be done there, but let me stress again today that the significant reductions that I have announced are not part of a handover of security responsibility to the Iraqis themselves, although they do reflect the completion of some of the security sector reform tasks that we set ourselves some time ago in developing the capability of the Iraqi forces—in particular, training the trainers and guarding institutions.

Our commitment to the Iraqi people and their Government remains total and steadfast. Our commitment to the coalition is certain. We will stay as long as we are needed, and wanted, and until the job is done. Today marks another significant step in that direction.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot) (Con): I thank the Secretary of State for letting me have advanced sight of his statement, although I note that the BBC had some knowledge of it before noon today.

I am responding on behalf of Her Majesty's Opposition because my hon. Friend the Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox), the shadow Secretary of State for Defence, is, as we speak, en route to Washington to give evidence to the Senate inquiry on the joint strike fighter, where he will be making common cause with Her Majesty's Government on the vital issue of technology transfer.

First, may I associate those on the Conservative Benches with the condolences expressed by the Secretary of State to the families of those servicemen recently killed in Iraq? It is important that the lives of those and the other members of Her Majesty's armed forces are not to be given in vain. To that end, the transformation of Iraq into a functioning democracy must be the goal before us.

Having been in Basra last week, I can readily join the Secretary of State in congratulating the armed forces on the magnificent job they are doing. It is, unfortunately, one of our national scandals that, while the media accord page after page to any failures, real or invented, they give so little coverage to the hard work our troops carry out on our behalf in the process of reconstructing Iraq.

While we welcome any reduction in Britain's military presence in Iraq, if the military conditions so dictate, we take the view that it would be folly to withdraw hastily, before the Iraqi forces can provide adequate security in place of British troops.

Will the Secretary of State confirm that the reductions he now proposes are not dictated by the need to find extra forces for Afghanistan? When does he expect the Iraqi police and army to be sufficiently trained, in number and competence, to enable them to assume control across Multinational Division South-East? What impact will the troop reduction have on the ability of UK forces to deliver essential training to the Iraqis?

Towards the end of the statement, the Secretary of State referred to an assessment process due to get under way shortly "to determine whether conditions have been met for some provinces ... to begin the handover process." Is it Government policy, if conditions are right, to hand over parts of MND South-East in advance of the Americans so doing in central Iraq? What discussions has he had with Washington about that process?

Finally, the Secretary of State referred to aviation support. He will know that our helicopter and transport aircraft fleets are operating at a frenetic tempo, well beyond what was expected. How on earth can he justify the withdrawal in May of two Sea King helicopters? I was in a Sea King helicopter on Thursday, flying out to HMS Bulwark, and heard from the Royal Navy the difficulties it is having in getting hold of aircraft today. He well knows that helicopters are the preferred means of transport.

What is the Secretary of State doing to address the critical problem of inadequate lift across the board? Does he not accept that the TriStar and VC10 fleets are past their sell-by dates, that some of them cannot be used in theatre because they lack the requisite defensive aids and that the C-130 Hercules fleet is so overworked that it has no capacity to train paratroopers? As a result of all that, the Secretary of State must rely on chartering holiday airliners which are simply not designed to transport troops.

Is the Secretary of State aware that it is utterly demoralising for our troops to have their leave cut thanks to delays in the availability of the transport fleet for which the Royal Air Force is unjustly blamed? In the early hours of Friday morning, I was with 300 soldiers who were delayed by three and a half hours following an engine malfunction on a C-130. We then flew for eight hours from Qatar in a chartered airliner with a seat pitch designed to take holidaymakers on a two-hour trip to Ibiza. Soldiers had to endure intolerable cramped conditions because no TriStars were available.

This is an issue that the Secretary of State can and should address now. I hope that he will have some answers to give the House today.

John Reid: I thank the hon. Gentleman for the condolences that he sent to our troops and I thank the shadow Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox), for his support on technology transfer. It seems that those are matters on which we can agree across the party spectrum, and in so far as we can do that in relation to defence, I think it is worth doing.

I also thank the hon. Gentleman for his accolade for the troops, and for his lack of accolade for sections of the media. To be fair, I think that there are exceptions. I think that there are people who are judicious in what they print, and there are newspapers that give consistent support to our troops in Iraq. Nevertheless, the hon. Gentleman is right: there is a tendency in many quarters of our media to illustrate only that which goes wrong, rather than remembering the marvellous work done by our troops in the most difficult conditions imaginable.

Let me now deal with the questions that the hon. Gentleman asked about the reductions in our forces that were announced today. He asked for an assurance that they were based on the merits of the case for an in-theatre assessment, and not on any obligations to find troops for other areas such as Afghanistan. I can give him that guarantee. Indeed, one of the prerequisites that I specified before deciding to deploy troops to Afghanistan was that we would not become dependent on troop reductions in Iraq. We have made it plain all along that our troop deployments there will be based on conditions on the ground, and on the assessments of our commanders in theatre. I can confirm that that applies in this case, and that there is no connection with Afghanistan.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the timing of the operational handover. I have been careful today to insist that this does not mark a decision on operational handover—the handing over to the Iraqis of lead political and operational responsibility for whole swathes or provinces. What it does mark is an indication of the incremental and increasing participation of Iraqi forces in counter-terrorism in our operations, which at this stage has allowed us to reduce the number of our troops. The assessment of when the process will have reached a point at which a province, or more than one province, could be handed over to the Iraqis will be made when the conditions have been met. The conditions have been publicised, and I think that the hon. Gentleman is well aware of them.

The method of assessing the conditions will be specified by the joint committee that is led by the Iraqis themselves, although it includes coalition forces. That too has been made public. The process will start in April. It may or may not start in any areas over which we have control, but there will be a province-by-province assessment throughout Iraq. The decision will be made following the assessments in April of the conditions on the ground, as was today's announcement.

We have been able to implement the reductions because many of the trainers for the Iraqi forces, themselves Iraqis, have now been trained. Some training capacity will be left, however, and if there are gaps, we will fill them.

As for the Sea Kings and air transport, we do whatever we can. The reductions that have been announced here, and the configuration, are a result of the in-theatre assessment. I note the hon. Gentleman's statement that the Sea Kings are very hard pressed and short of flying hours. I also note that they were flying him around during his visit, but I will examine the position as he requests.

The hon. Gentleman rightly observed that it was prejudicial to good morale when, because of engine breakdowns and so on, the rest and recreation or short periods out of theatre enjoyed by troops, in particular, were reduced. I agree with him entirely, and that is one reason why we tried to ensure that where necessary, we purchased, leased or in some way hired aircraft from outside. It is not possible to guarantee that such things will never happen—as the Prime Minister found only three weeks ago, engines can go wrong in even the best hired planes—but we do what we can. Finally, the hon. Gentleman mentioned demoralisation but the morale of troops in theatre is very high.

Mr. Michael Moore (Berwickshire, Roxburgh and Selkirk) (LD): I echo the condolences expressed by the Secretary of State and the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) to the families and friends who have lost loved ones in Iraq. I also endorse the tributes paid to the bravery and professionalism of our armed forces, who continue to operate in Iraq in very difficult circumstances indeed.

Today's statement has mixed elements. On the one hand, the Secretary of State acknowledges the danger of civil war, although he says that it is not imminent or inevitable; on the other, the planned reduction in personnel is due to the completion of some security sector reform tasks. Nearly three years on from the invasion and with things so finely balanced, is he saying that there is now to be a reduced British focus on training Iraqi forces? Is he confident about full co-operation from the Iraqis, particularly in the Basra and Maysan provinces? How many troops from other countries are currently assigned to Multinational Division South-East under British command, and does he expect that number to fall over the coming weeks and months? Finally, given his clear frustration with Iraq's politicians, how confident is he that the joint committee will be able to make proper plans that will allow the coalition to form a clear exit strategy from Iraq?

John Reid: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his remarks about our troops. I should make it clear that my frustration with Iraqi politicians is no greater and no less than my frustration with British politicians. It is the nature of democracy that we do not always agree, but in the midst of the coalition negotiations, all of us should remember the risks that the Iraqi people themselves have taken in coming out to vote in these elections. Ultimately, the salvation of the Iraqi people and their democracy, stability and peace will lie in the hands of Iraqis themselves. It has never been our intention to stay there indefinitely through some imperialist presence. We have said that we will stay until the job is done, that the job will be done when the Iraqis themselves are capable of defending their own democracy and of defending themselves against terrorist activity, and that that will be a process.

Today, I have announced another part of that process—not the end of it by any means. In a sense, this is not even the beginning of the end, but, to quote our most famous politician, it is perhaps the "end of the beginning." This is a significant reduction based largely on the ability of the Iraqis themselves to participate, and to defend themselves against counter-terrorism. There is a very long way to go, and I have been absolutely clear that we are not yet at the stage where the Iraqi security forces can take responsibility for whole provinces. We will continue to assess the situation and when the conditions are met, I will make another announcement to the House.

As far as other coalition troops are concerned, nothing that I have said today about the British disposition of troops—as part of the normal six-monthly announcement of roulement deployment—causes, or is caused by, troop dispositions, reductions or increases among any of our allies in the coalition. So the announcement stands on its own, but we have of course informed our Japanese, Italian and Australian partners in Multinational Division South-East—I spoke to the Australian Minister this morning—and we have informed our other allies, including the Americans.

Dr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the Brookings Institution estimates that between 12,000 and 21,000 Iraqi civilians have died in the violence since the start of the war, in addition to the deaths of more than 1,800 coalition troops and more than 4,000 Iraqi police and military personnel? Does he agree that our most important objective in Iraq should be bringing about an end to the killings, whether of civilians or of service personnel?

John Reid: When discussing deaths in Iraq, we should recall that in history the price of establishing, fighting for, maintaining and struggling for democracy has sometimes involved sacrifice. It is nothing compared to the hundreds of thousands of deaths under the tyrant Saddam Hussein. I agree entirely that a benchmark of our progress is in the treatment of civilians. I regret whenever civilians suffer as a result of actions that fall beneath civilised standards, whether performed by our troops, anyone else's troops or the Iraqis themselves. But I would point out the watershed of difference between what happens now and what happened 10 years ago in Iraq. Now, if there is maltreatment of civilians, it is exposed, whereas under Saddam it was covered up. It is exceptional now, and under Saddam it was institutionalised. The perpetrators are penalised, prosecuted and—I hope—incarcerated, but under Saddam they were honoured and promoted. That is not an insignificant difference.

Mr. James Arbuthnot (North-East Hampshire) (Con): What the Secretary of State has told us about the training of an extra 45,000 security forces in Iraq is very good news. The achievements of our British forces there have been very significant indeed. Was the reduction of 800 troops that he has announced discussed with the Iraqi authorities, and what is the general state of discussions between them and British troop commanders, especially in Basra?

John Reid: In answer to the first question, it was discussed with the Iraqi authorities insofar as it could be, given that there is no national Government formed at present. We keep in touch with our Iraqi colleagues inside the security forces and so on. As regards the second question, the short answer is that they are better than they were a few weeks ago. As the hon. Gentleman knows, several events—not just the video, which was wrongly portrayed as the main reason for the breakdown in communications in several areas—including in the Basra area, our arrest of certain policemen whom we regarded as being involved in nefarious activities, led to a breakdown in communication in that area, but in all of the areas where there was non-co-operation we have either re-established co-operation or are moving towards doing so.

Paul Flynn (Newport, West) (Lab): Would not the best way to pay tribute to the 103 bereaved families and to those still serving so splendidly in Iraq be to have a proper inquiry into the reasons why we involved ourselves in the war in the first place? We have had four inquiries, all based on out-of-date information, two of them conducted by committees that were well disposed towards the war anyway, and two that considered only partial aspects of the war. Is it not now time for an inquiry that would be comprehensive, rigorous and genuinely independent?

John Reid: Well, the facts of the matter are that there have already been four inquiries. Notwithstanding what I thought was a rather misleading slur—I hope that my hon. Friend was not referring to Members of Parliament when he referred to two of the committees as being prejudiced—

Paul Flynn: I did not say that.

John Reid: I did not say that he said that: I said that I hoped he was not saying that. However, two of the committees that conducted inquiries were Committees of this House and I accept their opinion and that they were not prejudiced in their approach. I do not know whether the other two, one of which took place under Lord Hutton, can be regarded as prejudiced, but if I were my hon. Friend, I would be careful about what I said. All of the committees approached their specific task with a commendable degree of open-mindedness and scrutiny. The fact that we have had four inquiries and they have not reached the conclusion that my hon. Friend wanted them to reach may be unfortunate, but perhaps it is statistically relevant. I can only suggest that what he is actually asking for is an inquiry that agrees with him, rather than one that discovers the truth.

Sir Malcolm Rifkind (Kensington and Chelsea) (Con): I declare an interest in a company that works in Iraq. The House will have noticed the Secretary of State's very careful words that the slide towards civil war is neither imminent nor inevitable. However, he did not say that it was unlikely. Does the Secretary of State agree that Donald Rumsfeld's remark that if there is a slide into civil war it must be dealt with by Iraqi security forces conceals a fundamental problem in the whole of coalition policy, because a very high proportion of those security forces is drawn from the Shi'a and Kurdish communities, and it has been elements of the security forces, particularly the police, that have been responsible for many of the killings and atrocities that have been committed against Iraqi civilians? Can the Secretary of State say what Her Majesty's Government are doing to impress upon the Iraqi Government that not only must the armed forces be drawn substantially from the Sunni as well as other communities, but much more must be done than is being done to prevent atrocities by rogue elements within the security forces themselves?

John Reid: I hope that the right hon. and learned Gentleman will accept that, without necessarily agreeing with all his premises, I entirely agree with both his conclusions. First, not only must there be a competent Government in Iraq but it must be non-sectarian in character and must reach out to the Sunni section of the population as well as to the majority Shi'a or the Kurd section. That means that the analysis of the violence must be more sophisticated than it sometimes is in some quarters. It is not the case that everyone who is opposed to the Government or to our troops is on the other side of the international war on terrorism. Many young Sunnis are dispossessed, unemployed and alienated—there are 200,000 of them in the Euphrates valley—and may drift in and out of violence for reasons unconnected with fanaticism or extremist ideology. I agree that if they are to be brought into ownership of Iraq, the Government have to reach out to them. Secondly, where there is evidence of bias, ranging from a natural bias towards one's own community through to the intentional infiltration of the security forces by militias, it has to be rooted out in practice, ideology and theory as well as in operational terms. Both of those things are essential if Iraq is to build national unity.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): If commentators are right that the Milosevic regime should have been dealt with earlier, is there not a strong argument for what happened over Saddam Hussein's tyranny, because he was a far worse tyrant in every way? While deploring the horrifying killings that are committed daily, is there not a responsibility on everyone, including those who opposed the war, to condemn the gangsters and criminals who are responsible for such actions and who have no concern to bring about democracy in that country? The sooner such condemnation comes from the critics, the better.

John Reid: That is the second consecutive question that I can answer by saying that I entirely agree with the conclusions and with many of the premises on which those conclusions were based. I hope that everyone in the House, even those who disagreed with the original decision to intervene, now understand that we are operating in Iraq with the full support of the Iraqi democratic majority, the sanction of the United Nations and under United Nations Security Council resolutions. That is the status of what we are doing in Iraq at present. It ill behoves those who normally demand that we adhere to every aspect of United Nations resolutions to say that on this occasion in Iraq, because they did not agree with the position several years ago, they will depart from the United Nations at present. Whatever views we took in the beginning, it is now our job to help the Iraqi people build their democratic Government through their own democratic processes, build their economy, build their security forces and ultimately rule their own lives.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex) (Con): I declare an interest—[Interruption.]

While entirely endorsing the Secretary of State's tribute to the work of British forces of all three services in Iraq—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman but the remarks being made from a sedentary position by the hon. Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Harry Cohen) are offensive. I suggest that he withdraw them.

Harry Cohen (Leyton and Wanstead) (Lab): They are true, but I withdraw them, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Soames: Given the astonishing skill and triumph of British troops on the ground in Iraq, and in welcoming back the 7th Armoured Brigade when it returns and noting the powerful deployment of the 20th Armoured Brigade, will the Secretary of State nevertheless consider the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) about the increased efforts that need to be made so that people understand the breadth and scale of the work of British troops on the ground in Iraq, and what a tremendous contribution they have made in the most difficult circumstances in a harsh and unforgiving environment? Will the Secretary of State consider what more can be done to ensure that greater opportunities are made available for the press to see the great scale of what is being done and not just to report on the inevitable disasters in a deployment of that type?

John Reid: Yes, but first the hon. Gentleman should have given us the full truth about his interests. I do not know what he declared, but he should also declare that he served this country both as a Defence Minister and as a member of Her Majesty's armed forces, so he truly has an interest in the conduct and safety of our armed forces that we should respect.

Secondly, the hon. Gentleman is absolutely correct in saying that sometimes there is a complete lack of understanding of the difficulties under which our troops now operate. It is almost as though they are fighting a 21st-century war in which people expect them to apply 20th-century regulations, international laws and conventions. We may not have all the answers on those matters, but we should certainly face the fact that they create huge problems. Our enemy is less constrained by international conventions, legality, morality or anything else than ever, yet the scrutiny that we constantly place on our soldiers and the international conventions and laws that we expect them to maintain mean that they are more constrained than ever. I do not complain about that, but I ask the public to be a little slower to condemn, a little quicker to support and not to believe everything as represented by the commentariat, because at the end of the day published opinion is not always public opinion.

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): I do not think that the Secretary of State fully answered the point raised by the hon. Member for Berwickshire, Roxburgh and Selkirk (Mr. Moore) about provincial governments in Iraq who are refusing to have any contact whatever with British occupying forces. Will the Secretary of State tell us what the current situation is in relation to those provincial governments? Is he aware that a large number of Iraqi people, including those who voted in the election, actually want British and American troops withdrawn, and that this weekend the Basra oil workers union will be organising a demonstration in Basra calling for the withdrawal of all occupying forces from Iraq the better to bring about peace there?

John Reid: I think they probably also wanted Saddam removed as well. I do not remember my hon. Friend expressing his fraternal solidarity—

Jeremy Corbyn: Yes I did.

John Reid: —when the troops went in to achieve that objective.

On the position of local government, to be serious, it is not true, as my hon. Friend inadvertently seemed to suggest, that local government in areas of the Multinational Division South-East wanted a complete and total boycott of relations with the British authorities there. At various times recently, two of them wanted a temporary boycott—on one occasion in one province when the governor was out of the province—for a period of between a week and two weeks. That is not to diminish the seriousness of the situation, but nor should we exaggerate such things as some of the anti-war press do.

My hon. Friend said that there were people who wanted the coalition forces out of Iraq. I want the coalition forces out of Iraq, and as soon as the conditions are met they will come out. We have no long-term imperialist ambitions in Iraq, but when people have given their lives for democracy in Iraq it would be an absolute tragedy if we were to leave before people were ready. If British troops are helping Iraqi democrats establish democratic control over their own lives we should be proud to stay in Iraq until the Iraqi people decide in their democratic opinion that it is time for us to go. When they say that, we will go.

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): I join the Secretary of State in expressing condolences to the members of the 2nd Battalion of the Parachute Regiment who lost their lives a fortnight ago. Colchester is their home base.

I endorse the comments made by the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth). Like him, I was in Iraq last week as a member of the Armed Forces Bill Committee and found that the flights returning our brave men and women home to the UK were not of the quality to which they are entitled. I ask the Secretary of State to give that serious consideration.

Will the right hon. Gentleman also clarify the reduction of 800 troops? Will that bring the total down to 7,000, or will the 800 come from the 7,000, bringing the figure down to 6,200?

John Reid: On the first point, I will look into the specific case. I know that there have been general problems, and it is perfectly legitimate to raise them because that is in the interests of everyone in the House. I think that everyone here wants our troops to be given the conditions that they ought to have.

On the second point, the figure of 800 is approximately a 10 per cent. reduction on 8,000, which will reduce our total presence to 7,200. I hope that the 7,200 who are there will continue to do the job that they are doing, and in due course we will assess whether Iraqi security forces have the numbers and capability for a handover, in operational terms, of any of the provinces. At that stage, the official handover would begin.

Harry Cohen: The Defence Secretary still has not explained why the elected authorities of Basra and al-Amara do not support the British forces. Of course, the British presence has the support of the Americans—an SAS man this weekend described some of their forces as viewing the Iraqis as sub-human—of the Iranians, who have benefited from the mess that we have got into, and of the Ministry of the Interior, which has been running death squads and sees the British as too toothless to deal with that. If huge mortgages can be raised and paid off quickly, surely we can get out of Iraq quickly too.

John Reid: I quite like my hon. Friend so I will try to take him through the illogicality of what he is saying. On the one hand, he is saying that we must maintain a position in which the governor and authorities in Basra never fall out with the British, and on the other hand he is saying that the British have to take action against some in the police force in Basra who are corrupt, even if that means that the governor or the local authorities may break off relations with the British. The relationship between ourselves and the local authorities in Basra broke down, we suspect, precisely because we acted against and arrested several members of the local constabulary, exactly as my hon. Friend would have wanted us to do. That has implications because of course local politicians then say, "We're going to break off relations with you." However, I think that arresting those people was the right thing to do. We believe that they were involved in activities that resulted in people being attacked and killed.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. There has been a tendency to stray outside the strict terms of this statement. If I am to try to call as many as I can of the other right hon. and hon. Members standing, bearing in mind that there is important business to follow, may I ask for brevity, both in question and in answer?

Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): Much of the remarkable reconstruction work in Iraq, of which we have heard so little for one reason or another, is carried out by the civilian contractors and non-governmental organisations who rely on British forces for protection to do their work. Has the Secretary of State made an assessment of the impact on such reconstruction work of the downsizing of the British commitment?

John Reid: I can assure the hon. Gentleman that in general terms we have taken into account the very points that he raises. Perhaps I can write to him in detailed terms, but I reassure him that the reduction in the forces that I have announced today does not mean a withdrawal and handover to the Iraqis in this or that province. That may or may not come, depending on the assessment of their capability, on their willingness and on their decision to take on the overall control of various provinces, at which stage we would withdraw from them. Today's announcement is not of that nature. Today's announcement reflects the increasing participation of the Iraqi security forces across the board and the completion of a number of our tasks across the board, which means an across-the-board reduction, but not a withdrawal for this or that area.

Rev. Ian Paisley (North Antrim) (DUP): I associate myself and my colleagues with the condolences that the Secretary of State for Defence has passed to the families of those who laid down their lives in Iraq. I and my colleagues agree with the praise that has been rightly passed on the gallantry and bravery of the members of the British Army, in which the Royal Irish Regiment has a part. The right hon. Gentleman is aware of what they did when they served there, and I just ask him one question: how will they be affected by some of the announcements about south Iraq that he has made today?

John Reid: To the best of my knowledge, there is no direct effect on the Royal Irish Regiment. If that position is incorrect, I will, of course, write to the right hon. Gentleman, but I think that the regiment is not affected by the statement. Of course, he, among others, has recently discussed with us the future of the Royal Irish Regiment and so on. I understand that, by and large, the announcement about redundancy terms that we made last week has been found acceptable to a cross-section of the Royal Irish Regiment and the people of Northern Ireland, and I am very glad about that because, given all their sacrifices and hardships, they are entitled to be treated with fairness, dignity and honour.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): The right hon. Gentleman has spoken about a reduction in personnel of 800 individuals. Would he be kind enough to tell the House more about the nature of those reductions? It is clear that there will be a reduction in the number of personnel associated with the training of Iraqi forces, but it is not clear from the right hon. Gentleman's statement where else the reductions will fall. Will he please tell us?

John Reid: Let me give an example that will have quite a big impact on the numbers that we need to send to Iraq. As the right hon. and learned Gentleman suggests, not only do we have a diminished number of and need for trainers, but in the guarding of installations, which is quite an onerous task that takes up quite a number of infantry right across all the battalions that we have sent there, the Iraqis are now able in terms of training, capability, weaponry and morale to defend their own barracks, installations, arsenals or police stations, for instance. That has quite a significant effect on the numbers that we are able to draw down.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate) (Con): The Secretary of State may recall the evidence that the Chief of the General Staff gave to the Defence Committee at an earlier stage of our deployment in Iraq, when he said that, although we may operate with the Americans, we do not operate as the Americans. The potential full import of those words seemed to bear out the account of former SAS trooper, Ben Griffin, in The Sunday Telegraph yesterday, which I am sure that the Secretary of State will have read. That would imply that the mistreatment of civilians and operations towards the civil population in the American areas appear to be somewhat institutionalised to a degree. Has he seen any evidence of a change in the manner of American operations in his time as Secretary of State?

John Reid: The remarks made by General Jackson took into account the fact that the Americans were dealing with different conditions and circumstances in different parts of Iraq, and with different ethnic groups, from those circumstances, environments and groups with which the British had to deal. It was therefore not just a matter of a will on the part of the British to act differently from our United States colleagues, but circumstances permitted that to be the case. Nothing that he said would suggest, nor have I heard anything to suggest, that wrongful behaviour on the part of the Americans is institutionalised. Certainly, whenever any wrongful behaviour is identified, to the best of my knowledge it is dealt with in a pretty quick and robust fashion.

Angus Robertson (Moray) (SNP): I associate myself and my hon. Friends with the condolences that have been expressed and with the praise for the service personnel serving in Iraq.

On behalf of the Scottish National party and Plaid Cymru, I welcome the troop reductions and hope that they are the first step in complete withdrawal from Iraq. Has the Secretary of State had a look yet at the online discussion board used by service personnel to see their comments on today's announcement? The first reaction is:

"Great, get them all home."

When will that happen?

John Reid: I have not been able to have a look at that discussion board this morning, although I look at it from time to time. If the hon. Gentleman is in correspondence with those who run it, will he thank them for the many plaudits they gave me for the speech that I made a couple of weeks ago defending our troops? I have not seen such a defence made by or plaudits given to his own party, but I am sure that they will come. I have not seen the piece of correspondence that he quotes, but perhaps if he sends it to me in the form of a letter, I shall reply to it.

Mike Penning (Hemel Hempstead) (Con): May I ask the Secretary of State to convey to the commanders of all our troops in Iraq how proud we are of them? They should never be described as toothless, because the last person who described a Grenadier as toothless lost his teeth. I am proud that the 1st Battalion Grenadier Guards, in which I served, is going to Iraq. Can we make sure that we look after the returning troops as much as possible, so that they do not come back, become disillusioned and leave the armed forces, and so that we do not lose the skills that we so desperately need?

John Reid: The hon. Gentleman speaks with some authority, having served his country with the Guards. We are working on housing—single housing accommodation is a disgrace in many areas and we are trying, through a long-term project, to improve that. There is an above-inflation pay increase—slightly bigger for the lower ranks than for others—and we are working to improve the welfare package. I hope that all of that will encourage people to stay in the British armed forces, which offer a fantastic career to young men and women and in which we have vacancies every single year.

Mr. Mark Lancaster (North-East Milton Keynes) (Con): Given that there is no connection to the deployment in Afghanistan, presumably the Secretary of State will be able to assure the House that the 800 troops who are coming back will be allowed to have their 24 months back at home, as outlined in the harmony guidelines, before being sent to Afghanistan.

John Reid: I am probably over-sensitive, but I noticed a hint of cynicism there. All I can tell the hon. Gentleman is that there is no connection between the deployments. [Interruption.] Actually, to jump from the first to the second is a non sequitur, because, as the hon. Gentleman knows, even before Afghanistan, the harmony level was 21.4 months, rather than 24. However, I repeat what I said at the beginning: the drawdown in Iraq is not dependent on the deployment to Afghanistan, or vice versa. In the next few years, as ever, we shall strive to make sure that we approximate as closely as possible the satisfactory harmony levels for all our troops—not just those coming back from deployment in Iraq, but those coming back from deployment anywhere.

Points of Order

4.23 pm

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. During questions on the statement, two Members—the hon. Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames) and the right hon. and learned Member for Kensington and Chelsea (Sir Malcolm Rifkind)—mentioned that they had interests to declare. I have just been to look at the Register of Members' Interests, and it is extremely unclear what interest the hon. Member for Mid-Sussex has in Iraq, because he claims to be a director of a restaurant company and of an investment company. If hon. Members say that they have an interest in a subject of such importance as the presence of British troops in Iraq, we need to know what it is and how much money they are making from it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): The requirement is that hon. Members make as clear as possible to the House the relevance of their interest to the matter on which they are seeking to address the House. The hon. Gentleman has made that point and I am sure that it will be noted. I suspect that one of the difficulties is that a great many hon. Members have interests that they feel obliged to declare and we could spend a lot of the day on prefaces to questions making such interests known. However, it is helpful to be as specific as possible, so that the House is properly informed.

Pete Wishart (Perth and North Perthshire) (SNP): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Have you received a request from the Secretary of State for Defence to come to the House to make a further statement in response to the results of the inquest into the death of Private James Collinson at Deepcut barracks? One of Her Majesty's coroners has called for a public inquiry into the unexplained deaths of four young recruits, saying that we must "restore . . . confidence in the recruitment and training of young soldiers whether at Deepcut or elsewhere."

Surely, therefore, we are entitled to hear the Secretary of State's views.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have not received such a request from the Secretary of State, although I did receive a request from the hon. Gentleman to accept an urgent question. Under the rules on such questions and given today's business, however, I felt unable to grant his request.

The Secretary of State for Defence (John Reid): May I respond to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker? At our request, the coroner clarified the fact that he was not calling for a public inquiry, nor was that what he said. We all sympathise with the feelings of the family in this case and the other cases, but we have already set in motion an independent inquiry led by Nicholas Blake QC, which should report in the not-too-distant future. It behoves us all to await the outcome of that inquiry before we start to run across Nicholas Blake's decisions by announcing or seeking another inquiry.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am grateful to the Secretary of State for amplifying my response.

Orders of the Day

Northern Ireland (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

4.26 pm

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Peter Hain): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

It is in the nature of adversarial politics that the emphasis is on difference and the focus on disagreement and division. Few places have been more adversarial than Northern Ireland since the latter third of the last century, but finding consensus does not mean losing integrity, and moving forward towards accommodation does not mean turning away from principle. It is my firm conviction that we can find that consensus and reach that accommodation—not an impossibly naive hope, given the years of experience since the peace process began in Northern Ireland. There is agreement on the principle of consent. There is agreement that Northern Ireland is served best when governed locally. There is agreement that Northern Ireland is served best when governed on the basis of fair and equitable power-sharing. There is agreement that Northern Ireland is served best when the police service has the whole community behind it because the whole community is in it. There is agreement that Northern Ireland must be free from the fear of paramilitary activity and criminality and that the rule of law must apply. There is agreement that common-sense north-south co-operation is of great mutual benefit. There is agreement that the current political impasse cannot continue.

It is crucial for Northern Ireland that 2006 be the year of progress in which Northern Ireland politicians, locally accountable and operating on an inclusive basis, once more take responsibility for the things that matter in people's daily lives. It is clear, too, that there cannot be elections to an Assembly that does not exist. Members of the Legislative Assembly cannot continue to be paid salaries and allowances while the Assembly stands idle and there is no prospect of its restoration. No one can seriously contest either assertion and, to be fair, no one has done so. As the House will know, both Prime Ministers are focused on the way forward. With the Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office, my hon. Friend the Member for Delyn (Mr. Hanson), and the Minister for Foreign Affairs in the Irish Government, I have been talking with the parties in a series of meetings. We are all determined that devolution should be restored to the people of Northern Ireland, and I know that that determination is shared by the House.

Before I move on to the detail of the Bill, I wish to inform the House that I have today announced the reconstitution of the Northern Ireland Policing Board with effect from 1 April 2006. The cross-community board is one of the great successes flowing from the Patten recommendations. I pay tribute to all the current members, particularly the hon. Members for East Antrim (Sammy Wilson) and for South Down (Mr. McGrady), for their considerable contribution to the Policing Board over the past four and half years. The Bill covers a number of policy objectives which, for the most part, have a single unifying theme—preparing Northern Ireland for the many and various challenges that lie ahead, particularly the fact that there should be no legislative obstacles in the way of devolution. The Bill will chiefly allow maximum flexibility in the arrangements for the future devolution of policing and justice functions to the Assembly, as was envisaged at the time that the Northern Ireland Act 1998 was passed.

Ultimately, responsibility for policing and justice in Northern Ireland should lie with Northern Ireland Ministers, accountable to a local Assembly elected by the people of Northern Ireland. That was envisaged in the Belfast agreement and the structure of the devolution settlement set out in the Northern Ireland Act 1998. Our Government have repeated on many occasions their clear commitment to devolve those functions when the time is right. An effective, independent and impartial criminal justice system is fundamental to a properly functioning society. Before the Government can devolve their responsibilities, we must be satisfied that the system will function effectively and that arrangements are in place to ensure, for example, the continued independence of the judiciary and prosecution system and the effective administration of justice.

The independence and impartiality of the prosecution system and the judiciary are fundamental principles of the UK justice system. The existing legislation places a duty on Northern Ireland Ministers to uphold that. In addition, I intend to put forward concordats between our Government and the Northern Ireland Executive, to be agreed before the devolution of policing and justice, setting out the core principles of the independence and impartiality of the Northern Ireland judiciary and the public prosecution service.

The Bill does not devolve policing and justice. Instead, it supports the framework that we need to put in place to devolve policing and justice by order when—not before—the circumstances are right to do so. That was the intention of the 1998 Act. Section 4 of that Act gives me the power to transfer any reserved matter to make it the responsibility of the Assembly, subject to certain important safeguards. Those safeguards remain, and nothing in the Bill undermines them. Most importantly, the Assembly must agree that the time is right for policing and justice to be devolved and must vote for it on a cross-community basis. That is set out clearly in section 4 of the 1998 Act and nothing in the Bill alters that position. The Assembly must also agree what arrangements it wants to put in place to receive the new functions—whether to have one ministerial Department or two, for example. The Government must be convinced that the proposed arrangements are robust, workable and broadly supported by the parties.

Finally, when the time comes, the order that effects the transfer of functions will need to be agreed in Parliament. There is more work to be done before we reach that point. On 16 February, alongside the Bill, I published a discussion paper that set out what the Government believe is a sensible and pragmatic framework for policing and justice in Northern Ireland. As I said then, the document is not a blueprint, but a basis for discussion. We look forward to beginning those discussions, especially with all the Northern Ireland political parties.

In preparing for the devolution of policing and justice, it will be particularly important to ensure that the Assembly and Executive have all the tools that they need to manage the functions transferred to them. One of those tools is an arrangement whereby the Assembly will raise money specifically for policing. The policing precept in England, Scotland and Wales allows money for policing to be raised from council tax. In my constituency of Neath, for example, the precept is £126.42. We believe that it will be useful for the Assembly to have a similar power to raise additional money for policing in Northern Ireland from the regional rate. As that power can be created by an amendment to the Northern Ireland rates legislation, it does not require provision in the Bill. We will legislate for the detail of the precept in planned amendments to the Northern Ireland rates legislation. The power in clause 22 of the Bill will ensure that those changes to rates legislation cannot be amended by a future Assembly, although the level at which the precept is levied, or whether it should be zero-rated, will be matters for the Assembly. I emphasise that that will be additional money to provide enhanced levels of policing to meet Northern Ireland policing priorities and the Assembly will not have to use the power unless it wishes to do so. Equally, if it does not, there may be implications for other spending.

I know that some hon. Members have expressed concern that we will undermine national security by devolving responsibility for policing and justice. Others have suggested that the switch in primacy for national security matters from the Police Service of Northern Ireland to the Security Service represents a sinister plot to undermine policing in Northern Ireland. Both sets of fears are completely without foundation.

Constitutionally, central Government have responsibility for national security, whether relating to international or domestic terrorism. We cannot and will not abdicate that responsibility. Integrating the Security Service's lead and the police's operational response in the way proposed will bring Northern Ireland into line with the rest of the United Kingdom, where the Security Service has had lead responsibility since 1992.

Let us be clear about what this change will mean in practice. The Security Service has no executive policing responsibilities, even in countering threats to national security. Such responsibilities rest now and will remain with the police, under the oversight of the Policing Board and the police ombudsman. In future, although the Security Service will gather intelligence and provide the strategic direction, it will be the police's role to mount related policing operations.

The main reason is that we cannot address national security on a regional basis anywhere in the United Kingdom. Events have demonstrated that it is vital to provide a consistent and co-ordinated response right across the United Kingdom. International terrorists do not confine their activities to the mainland of the United Kingdom. The recent arrest in Belfast and subsequent conviction of Abbas Boutrab for terrorist-related offences of the kind associated mostly with al-Qaeda shows that. We should all be aware that modern terrorism is an international phenomenon from which Northern Ireland needs to be protected. The changes that will take place during 2007 constitute a part of the fight against international terrorism, and they are another vital step in preparing Northern Ireland for the challenges ahead.

Rev. Ian Paisley (North Antrim) (DUP): I do not know whether I caught the Secretary of State's language. If I mistook what I thought he said, he will tell me. I thought he said that security rested with the police and the police ombudsman. Will he clarify that?

Mr. Hain: What I said, and it is helpful to clarify it for the right hon. Gentleman, is that security matters will remain with the Security Service, but operational matters that might or might not flow from intelligence, or advice from the Security Service, or a recommendation from the Security Service, will be for the Police Service of Northern Ireland. The Chief Constable has supported these arrangements and the integration of the two—that is, the operational matters carried out by the PSNI and the intelligence and security matters carried out by the Security Service. Those can work very effectively together, and that is indeed planned.

Mr. Jeffrey M. Donaldson (Lagan Valley) (DUP): We understand what the Secretary of State is saying in relation to the integration of national security and dealing with the terrorist threat in Northern Ireland. Nevertheless, the Security Service is already stretched by coping with the threat to national security from international terrorism. How will it manage to take on the additional role in Northern Ireland with its existing resources?

Mr. Hain: These are matters that have been worked through with the Security Service. It is a fair question, but I notice that the hon. Gentleman is not disputing the principle, which springs from the fact that we are dealing with an international terrorist phenomenon which knows no boundaries. That is demonstrated by the arrest of that individual in Belfast of all places, which was connected not with domestic terrorism, but with the international phenomenon. That is the key point.

Lady Hermon (North Down) (UUP): Can the Secretary of State clarify who will adjudicate on what is a matter of national security and what is strictly an operational matter for the Chief Constable? I know that the Chief Constable welcomes some of the proposed arrangements, but he is concerned about who makes that final decision? Will it be a tussle in public or in private? Who will adjudicate?

Mr. Hain: I do not envisage any tussles in public. I think that the situation will bed down quickly, as it has done in Great Britain, where there is a similar division of responsibility between the chief constable, the relevant police force and the Security Service. The change reflects the increasing normalisation of life, security and politics in Northern Ireland.

Sammy Wilson (East Antrim) (DUP): Does the Secretary of State accept that the relationship between the security services and the police in England will not necessarily be repeated in Northern Ireland, where much of the intelligence gathered will affect criminal investigations due to the close link between terrorists and criminality? How can we ensure that the flow of information about criminal activity from the intelligence services to the police in Northern Ireland is not hindered?

Mr. Hain: I have made sure that both the Police Service of Northern Ireland and the Security Service are satisfied that the overlap between pure gangsterism and paramilitarism can be tackled. If I use the phrase, "pure crime", I think that the hon. Gentleman knows what I mean, and it will continue to be combated effectively under the new arrangements.

Mr. Eddie McGrady (South Down) (SDLP): The Secretary of State has confused the issue. Given the complexity of intelligence gathering in Northern Ireland, intelligence gathering should surely be a unitary matter. Intelligence involves both criminal organisations and terrorist organisations, so it would be better to have one intelligence-gathering organisation, which should be the PSNI. The PSNI should communicate its intelligence on international terrorism and retain information on indigenous terrorism for prosecution. In the past, intelligence was not transferred from MI5 to the police, and people literally got away with murder as a result.

Mr. Hain: Due to the relationship between the PSNI and the Security Service, what might have happened in the past will not happen in the future other than for reasons of ordinary human failing, which could occur in any situation. When the hon. Gentleman examines the detail and discusses the matter with the Chief Constable—given his long experience on the Policing Board, where he played a valuable role, few people can do that better than him—he will be satisfied that that is the only way in which to proceed. As I have said, the measure concerns terrorism in its broadest context. In particular, we are dealing with the modern phenomenon of international terrorism of the kind which occurred in London on 7 July. Indeed, there were fingerprints—albeit isolated fingerprints—in Belfast, where the individual whom I have described was arrested.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): I am sure that the Secretary of State agrees that we will return to many of those points in Committee. Returning to today's Second Reading debate, however, can he not see that he is doing exactly what many hon. Members have always warned the Government not to do, which is to categorise terrorism in two leagues—international terrorism, which is a threat to state security, and domestic terrorism, which seems to have a more benign status? Will he assure hon. Members that paramilitary terrorism in Northern Ireland will be treated in exactly the same context as international terrorism?

Mr. Hain: I do not disagree with that proposition. I know that the hon. Gentleman agrees that it is difficult to say whether one form of terrorism is better or worse than another, because all terrorism is equally bad. All I am saying is that the modern form of terrorism that was identified in the arrest of the individual in Belfast is of an international character, and that it is as vital that the Security Service is able to tackle that if it surfaces in Northern Ireland as it is in the rest of the United Kingdom. I know that the hon. Gentleman will accept that.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): A few moments ago, the Secretary of State used the phrase, "pure crime", which is slightly strange, but we all know what he meant. It is clear from the evidence that the Select Committee has received in its continuing inquiry into organised crime that there is very little that can be described as "pure crime" in Northern Ireland. I think that he has to take that on board.

Mr. Hain: The Select Committee very appropriately made that point. We have recently seen events in the Republic of Ireland which indicate that. All paramilitary groups have criminal tentacles. It is difficult to see that some of the loyalist paramilitary groups have any political objective any more—it seems to be pure gangsterism—although it is not quite the same in the case of the dissident republicans. In answer to the question of whether dealing with day-to-day crime unrelated to paramilitary activity of the kind identified by the Select Committee would be hampered, I do not think that it would be at all. On the contrary, an enhanced capability could help in every respect.

Mr. Ben Wallace (Lancaster and Wyre) (Con): The Secretary of State said that no one had challenged the principle, but perhaps I may challenge the practicality. The strength of the Royal Ulster Constabulary special branch, and then the PSNI, was that it had intelligence-gathering networks and executive powers, and therefore worked in a joined-up way. In giving some of those powers to the security services, how does the Secretary of State hope to clarify the situation whereby very sensitive intelligence may be handed over to a police force when the Justice Minister in a Northern Ireland Assembly is from Sinn Fein? It is at those hand-over points that intelligence can sometimes break down. I urge him to consider whether, by losing executive powers in some of the intelligence network in Northern Ireland, he may be hampering counter-terrorism efforts.

Mr. Hain: I do not think that that will be the case; otherwise, neither the Chief Constable nor the Security Service would be satisfied, and neither would I. I remind the hon. Gentleman that the Patten report recommended that national security should not be devolved, and we are acting consistently with that. The Patten recommendations have been hugely successful in winning cross-community support for policing, so that in many respects the PSNI is now seen as a model for the rest of the world. The issue here is a switch in primacy, which should reside with the Security Service for the reasons that I have described.

Mark Durkan (Foyle) (SDLP): The Secretary of State said that the Patten report did not recommend that national security should be devolved. However, it clearly said that in areas of national security the PSNI would report to the Secretary of State, as opposed to reporting through the devolved mechanisms. It envisaged that issues of national security and intelligence policing at that level would be part of the responsibility of the PSNI. The Government are going against the grain of the Patten report in insisting that there should be ulterior policing and intelligence arrangements outside the PSNI—MI5.

Mr. Hain: I do not accept that interpretation. Paragraph 6.22 of the Patten report, although it did not go into as much detail as the Bill, made it clear that "the Chief Constable remains fully accountable for the involvement of police in matters involving national security, even though his or her main accountability in such matters is to the Secretary of State rather than to the Policing Board."

There will therefore continue to be a direct line of accountability by the police for whatever they do, including about matters of national security, ultimately to the Policing Board and through the devolved Ministers.

I understand the concerns of the Social Democratic and Labour party about the matter, given its wider long-term political objectives. However, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will understand that there is no way that the Security Service could continue to do the important job that it has done for a long time, especially now and in the foreseeable future, without the changes being put in place and consistency with the rest of the United Kingdom. I believe that the result will be to strengthen the overall imposition of security and policing in Northern Ireland rather than to undermine it. If there were any danger of undermining it, the Chief Constable would have been the first to warn against that. He most emphatically has not done so—indeed, he supported the changes.

Several provisions deal with the democratic process. There are concerns about taking a power to bring forward the May 2007 election, but I need to be ready to move quickly if the circumstances are such that an early election is needed to cement success on the political front. That is necessary so that we do not face any obstacle.

Lembit Öpik: Will the Secretary of State respond to the concern of Liberal Democrats about the opportunity to change the date of the election quickly? We will set a dangerous precedent if a Secretary of State can alter the date of such a profoundly important event as an election, effectively by decree.

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East) (DUP): What does the hon. Gentleman think has happened on previous occasions?

Lembit Öpik: Does the Secretary of State accept that if he and the Government are acting reasonably, they will get the support of the lower and the upper Houses, but that both Houses should have the right to approve any such recommendation?

Mr. Hain: I note the outrage that the hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) expressed when he said that Secretaries of State had adopted such a practice for some time. Rather than creating the obstacle of having to come back to both Houses of Parliament, it is better to get Parliament to agree now that, in such special circumstances, with the political process proceeding and the negotiations intensifying, we take a power, which may or may not have to be exercised, to bring forward the election date if, by agreement, we need to do that to make the progress that we all desire and that the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) has long supported.

Sir Patrick Cormack: Will the Secretary of State give an undertaking that he would not arbitrarily determine the date of an election if the democratically elected and participating parties in the House were all against it?

Mr. Hain: It is not something that I would want to do except with consent. The hon. Gentleman makes a reasonable point. We are not considering some diktat by the Secretary of State. It is crucial that that does not happen in the timing of elections, of all things. In practical terms, it is sensible to introduce the provision, whether or not it is exercised.

Rev. Ian Paisley: The Liberal Democrats previously supported the changes that were made to election dates. I do not remember any great tussle in the House, with a few Democratic Unionists fighting for their political lives and everybody else saying, "Yes. We mustn't let the Secretary of State change it." If it was changed before, I do not know why the Liberal Democrats have suddenly been converted. I would like to know the road that they travelled.

Mr. Hain: I shall leave the right hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) to sort out his differences with the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire in his usual peaceful manner.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): The assumption of an order-making power as a matter of prudent proportion is one thing, but the manner of its exercise is another. I was mildly perturbed—I put it no more strongly—by the Secretary of State's response to my hon. Friend the Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack) when he challenged the right hon. Gentleman about circumstances of resolute opposition by Northern Ireland parties to the proposed exercise of the power. The provision does not make it explicit, so will the Secretary of State clarify whether the order-making power would be exercised by the negative procedure or its affirmative counterpart?

Mr. Hain: I am taking a power to do this because it is important to have that option available. I am not planning to make such a change; this would be unlikely to occur unless it was part of some political negotiation to get a power-sharing Executive up and running. Frankly, there would be no reason for doing it otherwise.

John Bercow: I am sure that the Secretary of State did not mean to glide over the specific point of my question. I am still seeking to ascertain whether, in the event that he decides that going ahead with his order-making power has become unavoidable as the least worst option, would it be debated in a delegated legislation Committee upstairs for an hour and a half or would it not?

Mr. Hain: I am sorry if the hon. Gentleman felt that I had not answered his question. Of course this would be done by affirmative resolution, but special emergency procedures might also apply, and those procedures are in the Bill in case they are needed. That is the point that I am making.

The provisions on electoral registration and political donations, which form a large part of the Bill, are also key to moving Northern Ireland forward. We want to modernise still further the registration arrangements in Northern Ireland, safeguarding the dramatic improvements in the accuracy of the register while ensuring that as many people as possible are registered to vote. In allowing us to do this, the registration clauses of the Bill go to the heart of increasing trust and engagement in the political and democratic process.

The Bill will remove the requirement for the Northern Ireland electorate to register annually to vote. The Northern Ireland Electoral Office will therefore no longer conduct an annual canvass. Instead, in order to ensure that the register is updated and expanded, the chief electoral officer will be given enhanced powers to access data from other public sector bodies to help him to track when individuals change address or become eligible to vote. These reforms will allow resources to be diverted towards raising the number of people registered and, in particular, to targeting groups that are currently under-represented on the register.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): I understand the objective that the Secretary of State seeks to achieve, but I do not understand why a different registration mechanism from that of the rest of the United Kingdom should exist in Northern Ireland. Will he explain why it is not deemed necessary for the residents of Northern Ireland to register annually, as is required elsewhere?

Mr. Hain: This has arisen partly out of the consultation with the Northern Ireland political parties. It is designed to achieve the much more effective focusing of the electoral officers' resources on getting more people on to the register all through the year, including by accessing other databases, rather than putting all the resources into an annual canvass.

Mr. Peter Robinson: Is it not also the case that we are not comparing like with like? The registration process in Northern Ireland is different from that of the rest of the United Kingdom in that it is much more complex. There are many more questions to be filled in, for example, and applicants must supply their national insurance number. That makes the exercise much more difficult to repeat as part of an annual cycle.

Mr. Hain: Perhaps I should enlist the hon. Gentleman to help me on the Front Bench to answer these questions from his own political experience.

To underpin confidence in the register, the Bill gives the Secretary of State the power to conduct a canvass if the chief electoral officer thinks that it is necessary to refresh the register. A canvass is scheduled for 2010 as a safeguard, but it could be cancelled, with the consent of Parliament, if the chief electoral officer recommended that it was unnecessary. Otherwise, a full canvass will take place every 10 years.

In addition, the Bill provides for the introduction of an anonymous registration scheme and a new late registration window. The measures broadly mirror changes being introduced in the rest of the United Kingdom by the Electoral Administration Bill, as the Government believe that it is right that the citizens of Northern Ireland should enjoy the same rights as those of the rest of the UK. The measures will, however, reflect the differences in electoral law and practice between Northern Ireland and the rest of the UK, and the particular circumstances in Northern Ireland, including those highlighted by the hon. Member for Belfast, East.

The reforms to the rules on political donations will increase public confidence by injecting greater openness into party funding and setting Northern Ireland firmly on the road to complete transparency. It is right that donations to Northern Ireland parties should be subject to scrutiny, just as donations to other parties in the House are.

Lorely Burt (Solihull) (LD): Can the Secretary of State clarify the role of the Electoral Commission? Clarity would be appreciated on the extent to which the commission will be able to check political parties' compliance with the requirements on donations, whether it will be asked to give an opinion on the extent to which political parties are observing those requirements and what it is to do if it believes that one or more political parties have failed to comply with the law.

Mr. Hain: I can, as I will explain, give the hon. Lady a positive response to the questions she has asked. The Electoral Commission will be involved in detail on all that. Indeed, it plays a pivotal role. The chairman, Sam Younger, is content with the arrangements we have described.

For the reason I have just given, the Bill will require Northern Ireland parties, for the first time, to comply with the rules set out under the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000, which require donations over a certain amount to be declared to the Electoral Commission. However, to take account of the continuing concerns about the possibility of donor intimidation in Northern Ireland, for a transitional period, donations to Northern Ireland parties will be checked privately by the Electoral Commission. If the commission discovers that a donation has been unlawfully accepted, the donation will be made public. That period will run from November 2007 and pave the way for full transition to complete transparency, as in the rest of the UK, in October 2010, which remains the Government's goal.

Lady Hermon: Will the Secretary of State kindly elaborate on where he thinks that intimidation of legitimate and proper donors will come from, given that the IRA has given up its criminality and its weapons and done all the business, as we were told repeatedly last year? How can he stand there and justify the fact that donations will be kept private and secret right up until 2010? Where will the intimidation come from?

Mr. Hain: Concerns were expressed to me—not particularly in relation to the IRA, but generally—about the climate in Northern Ireland's political culture, because there has not been the openness to which we have become accustomed since we legislated to change the matter after we came to power. There has not been such openness to the same extent in Northern Ireland, so there was therefore a concern, as part of the consultation, that we should allow a period of transition for normalisation to settle in. It was not any particular paramilitary organisation that was a particular concern; it could have been any party or any individual.

Mr. Wallace: Does the Secretary of State accept that there is a principle incorporated in the Bill that will change significantly our relationship in that the rules on donations will also reflect changes in Irish legislation? No matter what the Irish Dail does, that will kick into the rules affecting parties in Northern Ireland and we will be powerless to change that unless we introduce primary legislation to follow the Bill up.

Mr. Hain: Not for the first time in being generous in taking interventions, a point that I was about to deal with has been raised, but may I make another point in relation to intimidation and the transitional period in general? This will allow the political parties in Northern Ireland to adjust to the new arrangements and become accustomed to them, rather than them simply kicking in late next year. A period of transition will be allowed for that to occur. That is right, and it came out of the consultation period.

The other major effect of these reforms will be to apply to Northern Ireland parties the ban on foreign donations that operates under the 2000 Act. However, to recognise the special position of the Republic of Ireland in relation to Northern Ireland's political culture, Irish citizens and other bodies will continue to be able to donate to Northern Ireland political parties, as defined by Irish law. That is consistent with the principles of the Good Friday agreement and reflects the unique relationship between Northern Ireland and the Republic.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): Does the Secretary of State accept that that provision will be seen, and is seen widely in Northern Ireland, as simply a benefit clause for Sinn Fein? Will he think again before inserting an exemption for foreign donors that is aimed specifically at assisting the republican movement in its fundraising efforts in America and elsewhere?

Mr. Hain: That is not the only issue, if it is an issue at all. Not only Sinn Fein was concerned with the issue. I think that this is a sensible step and I am sure that everyone will agree.

Clause 23, the decommissioning clause, is intended to take the peace process a step further. The full decommissioning of IRA weapons, independently verified, was of course welcome and highly significant, but there is more to be done. We want to see all loyalist weapons decommissioned, and also those of dissident republicans. The Bill will ensure that the amnesty scheme stays in place for a further three years to facilitate that process.

The Bill is not just about the political process. It contains important provisions on energy that are designed to help to put Northern Ireland on a new footing by creating a single wholesale electricity market on the island of Ireland. Compelling market-led arguments resulted in similar action in 2003 to enable the Scottish market to be integrated with the England-Wales wholesale electricity market. Now it is Northern Ireland's turn. The electricity industry and the business community in Northern Ireland support the move, for the simple reason that a single market makes sound economic sense. It will be both more sustainable and more liable to attract new investment. It is expected that the single market will bring consumer benefits by boosting economies of scale and creating fuel savings. Together with access to a larger marketplace, that should spur greater competition and provide for a more efficient pricing mechanism. Crucially, the new market will bring enhanced security and diversity of electricity supplies.

Renewable sources offer a further outstanding opportunity to secure our energy supply, while protecting our environment. That is particularly important for Northern Ireland, where more than 99 per cent. of our primary energy requirements come from imported fossil fuels. That is a worrying level of reliance in economic and environmental terms, and in terms of security of supply. Increasing sustainability is not just an option but an imperative. Developing renewable energy and renewable technologies offers us a way forward and we must grasp it with a sense of urgency.

Last month, I launched a £59 million package of assistance aimed at enhancing and accelerating the development and deployment of renewables in Northern Ireland. It is an initiative in which the public sector will lead by example and in which everyone will have a part to play, with the potential to lever in hundreds of millions of pounds in private investment. The Bill will enable that package of assistance to be effectively targeted at a wide range of renewable energy initiatives that will be critical to a more sustainable energy future for Northern Ireland.

Clause 24 increases the threshold on the amount that the Northern Ireland Executive can borrow from the national loans fund, in effect extending the Executive's overdraft limit. In particular, that will facilitate the massive increase in infrastructure investment that I announced in December.

Clause 27 and schedule 3 extend to Northern Ireland the provisions in the Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005 relating to the investigatory powers of the Director of Public Prosecutions. The purpose is to provide powers in investigations of serious offences that are undertaken in Northern Ireland equivalent to those available in the rest of the United Kingdom. The provisions will enable prosecutors and investigators to compel witnesses to provide information in serious organised investigations of matters that might otherwise have proved difficult to uncover. The creation of those new powers for Northern Ireland will give investigators and prosecutors additional weapons with which to tackle the major ongoing problem of serious organised crime on a UK-wide basis.

Clause 28 will provide corporation sole status to the office of the Chief Constable of the Police Service of Northern Ireland. It will extend to Northern Ireland arrangements similar to those that already exist for chief police officers in Great Britain, so that any prosecution relating to breaches of health and safety at work legislation will ordinarily be brought against the office of the Chief Constable, rather than against the individual office holder.

Clause 29 will place a duty on relevant Ministers to fill judicial vacancies in Northern Ireland, except where the Lord Chief Justice of Northern Ireland agrees that a particular vacancy may remain unfilled. That will bring Northern Ireland into line with the arrangements put in place for England and Wales in the Constitutional Reform Act 2005. The aim is to remove any perception that Ministers could use the filling of judicial vacancies to place pressure on the judiciary and influence its independence. The change does not disturb either the current arrangements for judicial appointments or the post-devolution arrangements already provided for in the Justice (Northern Ireland) Act 2002, as amended.

The Bill's reforms will help to sustain a different and welcome environment in Northern Ireland. The IRA's historic statement of 28 July last year—ordering an end to the armed campaign and the dumping of all arms, and instructing volunteers to engage in purely political and democratic programmes through exclusively peaceful means—has been the subject of independent verification. The Independent Monitoring Commission's reports of 19 October and 1 February show that the IRA has taken a strategic decision to turn its back on the ways of the past. In its most recent report, published on 8 March, the IMC said that, in its view, the IRA has taken a strategic decision to follow a political path, that it does not present a terrorist threat and that it is not a threat to members of the security forces.

Mr. Peter Robinson: I get the impression that the Secretary of State is bringing his remarks to a close, but he has not touched on an issue that I was expecting him to deal with. I know that, at one stage, he harboured the ambitious hope of introducing constitutional proposals on changing the way that the Assembly in Northern Ireland operates, by way of amendment to this legislation. Is that off the table or will it occur during the lifetime of this legislative process? If it will, can he assure us that there will be a proper debate on the key issues relating to how Northern Ireland is to be governed?

Mr. Hain: It certainly is not off the table and the Bill may well be a vehicle for addressing those issues, which we recently discussed with the hon. Gentleman's party and with the other parties concerned at Hillsborough castle and Stormont. They remain to be addressed and if we do decide to amend the Bill—as I have signalled that we might—we have provided adequate time for debate. There will be two full days of debate on the Floor of the House and if Government new clauses are tabled, they will be taken here and we will have adequate time to deal with them, as is obviously crucial. We would want to discuss such proposals with all the parties, including the hon. Gentleman's, before moving down that route.

The decommissioning of IRA weapons, which was independently verified and reported on by the Independent International Commission on Decommissioning and by witnesses, has also contributed positively to the new environment. The picture is not perfect but huge progress has been made: the situation in Northern Ireland is transformed from where we were. We need to step up to the challenges and opportunities that the new environment presents. Political leaders in all walks of life need to show vision, courage and commitment to these goals. Restoration of the devolved institutions remains the aim, and Northern Ireland's politicians need to take the next step forward. We need to restore devolved government on a stable and lasting basis, and this legislation will help to prepare the way.

5.14 pm

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury) (Con): The heart of the Bill is the section dealing with the proposed devolution of policing and criminal justice. The Opposition agree with the Government that it is right that such matters should in due course be devolved to politicians directly accountable to the people of Northern Ireland, but we need to be clear about the basis on which that will happen. Several interventions in the Secretary of State's speech showed that there is concern among Members on both sides of the House about precisely how the Bill's order-making powers might be applied in future.

I think that the Government are right to transfer lead responsibility for national security from the police to the Security Service, but it will not be easy to define the boundary between strategic matters and operational matters. By the time policing is devolved, the House will need to have a clearer view than we are able to take at present about matters of accountability and, in particular, the extent to which the Northern Ireland Policing Board and the police ombudsman are to have jurisdiction over matters that touch on terrorism or national security.

The details of secondary legislation on the devolution of policing must make it clear that, in performing their daily responsibilities, the Chief Constable and the Policing Board will remain independent of Ministers in the Executive. That independence is critical if the police are to continue to make progress in gaining cross-community support throughout Northern Ireland. As both the Secretary of State and I know from visits to cities in Northern Ireland, it is very impressive to hear from local commanders how they are gradually extending what we would regard as normal policing to parts of Northern Ireland that have not had anything remotely like normal policing for the past 30 years or longer.

We need to accept a third point. The devolution of policing and criminal justice is a desirable objective, but it cannot occur until every political party that appoints Ministers to a devolved Executive has accepted the legitimacy of the police and the courts and is prepared to support those institutions. Support for the police, the courts and the criminal justice system is not an optional extra, nor is it some magnanimous concession that should entitle those offering it to a political reward.

I want devolution to be restored in Northern Ireland and I want it to extend in due course to policing and criminal justice, but that cannot happen while the republican movement in particular denies the legitimacy of the courts and the police and is willing to let vicious crime, even murder, go unpunished rather than encourage its supporters to give evidence to the proper authorities.

In case anybody thinks that I am interested only in the misdeeds of republican paramilitaries, I should make it clear that I make no moral distinction between republican paramilitaries and their loyalist counterparts. The Ulster Defence Association and the Ulster Volunteer Force are the bane of the communities whose interests they claim to defend. Loyalist communities need investment, jobs and better education and training, and they need to be rid of drug dealing and the protection rackets. The grip of paramilitary groups is the biggest single deterrent to economic revival and urban regeneration. I welcome the effort being made by some men within loyalism to get the paramilitary gangs to decommission their weapons and put themselves out of business, and I am sure that the Secretary of State and I agree that the sooner that happens the better for everybody concerned, especially people on loyalist estates in Northern Ireland's cities.

Although I do not make a moral distinction, there is a key political distinction between loyalist paramilitaries and the Provisional IRA. The parties linked to the UDA and the UVF have minimal electoral support; they have no chance of holding office in any devolved Government. By contrast, the provisional republican movement, through Sinn Fein, would be entitled to ministerial office including, as things stand, the position of Deputy First Minister and in time, in all probability, some responsibility for policing or criminal justice. We all have to accept that we cannot have Sinn Fein back in government with their Ministers sharing in the administration of justice while the provisional republican movement refuses to recognise the courts or the police. Such a state of affairs would be grotesque.

Before the devolution of policing and justice can occur, as proposed in the Bill, we need to see tangible evidence that republicans have made a practical and an ideological commitment to support the rule of law.

Mark Durkan: The hon. Gentleman made a number of points about the parties related to loyalist paramilitaries and their lack of potential for ministerial office, but has he any comment to make on the fact that the Secretary of State has appointed to the Policing Board for Northern Ireland the chairperson of the Progressive Unionist Party, which is linked to the UVF? Its ceasefire is not recognised, it is a paramilitary organisation that the Secretary of State specified and it has not engaged in any decommissioning, yet under the decision that the Secretary of State announced today it finds itself on the Policing Board. Will he address that issue as well as the issues he has raised about the republican movement?

Mr. Lidington: The hon. Gentleman makes an important point. I had not been aware of it before he gave me news of it in his intervention. It raises a number of legitimate questions that we will wish to pursue in due course.

Mr. Hain: The matter has been raised with the hon. Gentleman rather than with me, but I would have been happy to respond if it had been raised with me. Dawn Purvis, the individual concerned, performed extremely strongly in the interviewing process before the panel, which had an independent member. She came with a very high recommendation. I think she will add to the effectiveness of the Policing Board in performing the job it has done so effectively in recent years.

Mr. Lidington: I am grateful to the Secretary of State for his comments. We will have opportunities to pursue the matter across the Floor of the House, perhaps in Northern Ireland questions this Wednesday.

Mr. Peter Robinson: The issue raised in the question asked by the hon. Member for Foyle (Mark Durkan) is not whether a candidate performs well but the suitability of somebody from that background. As the Secretary of State seems to be willing to intervene on this, was the hon. Gentleman seeking an assurance from him that it was clarified that the candidate concerned fully supports the police and criminal justice in Northern Ireland and opposes paramilitary and criminal activity?

Mr. Lidington: Given the background of the lady who has been appointed, I would hope that inquiries of that type had been made.

Mr. Hain: The hon. Gentleman is very generous in giving way. Perhaps I can take of advantage of him to provide that assurance. It is an elementary pre-condition for any applicant for membership of the Policing Board, including Dawn Purvis, that he or she signs up to that. That was made clear throughout. The panel was satisfied that she came with a very strong recommendation from the interviewers.

Mr. Lidington: I am grateful to the Secretary of State.

Rev. Ian Paisley: I should like to bring the hon. Gentleman back to his point that people with connections to terrorism could not possibly be involved in certain matters relating to the police, the law and the courts. Would he go further and say that it would not be in the interests of Northern Ireland to have people in government in that part of the United Kingdom who were still connected to terrorists and to terrorist violence?

Mr. Lidington: Yes. I was about to make exactly that point. The Secretary of State referred to the events of last year—to the IRA statement announcing the end of its so-called armed struggle and to the act of decommissioning in September, which General de Chastelain reported involved a very large quantity of guns and explosives. Both those IRA actions were of major significance, and had they happened five or six years ago, when they should have happened—when democratic politicians from both traditions had every right to expect them to have been taken—they might have been of decisive importance in building trust. However, and in response to the right hon. Gentleman's point, it is not enough simply to take the events of last year as conclusive. They marked significant steps in the right direction, but we need evidence to convince us that the republican movement's commitment to exclusively democratic and peaceful means of attaining its political objectives is both permanent and irreversible.

The type of comment that police officers and others in Northern Ireland have made to me is that although matters have undoubtedly improved hugely on the security and policing front, they cannot yet be certain whether we have reached the definitive end of an IRA campaign that has been going on since at least the early 1920s; or whether it is another lull in that campaign, such as occurred in the 1950s.

Mr. Dodds: The hon. Gentleman's approach is absolutely right. Whether or not the IRA is on a permanent and irreversible path to peace, the crucial question for many people is whether its members are prepared to disband their military organisation. If they will not, does not that indicate that at some point they would be willing to reconsider the use of violence?

Mr. Lidington: At one stage, Ministers in the Irish Government called on the IRA to disband—the Justice Minister did so recently. I agree that an announcement about disbanding would probably send a more powerful signal to the Unionist community and to democratic nationalists in Northern Ireland than any other single gesture. Instead, too much of the debate about the future devolution of policing has centred on whether, and if so when, Sinn Fein will take up its seats on both the Policing Board and district policing partnerships. Taking seats risks being an empty gesture unless it is a clear demonstration that republicans will henceforward support the PSNI as an institution and work for its success.

Ideology is important. We cannot have on the Policing Board members of a political party that will not accept either the police or the courts as legitimate, but instead looks to the army council of the Provisional IRA as the supposed source of legitimate authority not just in the north but throughout the entire island of Ireland.

Mr. Andrew Turner: I agree with every word that my hon. Friend says, but does he agree that although stated ideology is important, what is most important is practical, on-the-ground peace, which includes peace from punishment beatings and assaults, as well as from assaults and the threat of assaults on peaceful marches?

Mr. Lidington: My hon. Friend is right. Ideology is important because we are talking about an organisation that takes pride in asserting that it acts in accordance with a consistent ideological position, and a visible shift in ideology would have a very important symbolic impact on republicanism's own followers. However, my hon. Friend is right to say that that ideological change needs to have clear practical expression. That should not only be in the form of a cessation of punishment beatings, or paramilitary assaults, as they are more properly described; it means the cessation of involvement in criminality of all types.

Let us hear Sinn Fein members urge those of their supporters who witnessed the murder of Robert McCartney to go to the police with their evidence. Let us see republicans working with the police and the other agencies of law and order to make restorative justice a reality of the kind that we have seen elsewhere in the United Kingdom, rather than trying to operate community restorative justice organisations as a private judicial system and an instrument of intimidation and social control. Let us hear Sinn Fein's leaders saying openly that young men and women who believe passionately and honestly in a united Ireland can still find a worthy career in the police service, and that there is no contradiction in having that democratic political objective and having a clear civic duty to pursue criminals and enforce the law with rigour.

I hope that we can in due course look to the implementation of these clauses on the devolution of policing and criminal justice, but we still have quite a long way to go politically before that becomes a practical possibility.

I want briefly to touch on three of the other subjects included in the Bill, the first of which is electoral registration. I was concerned by the original Government proposal in the consultation paper to extend the deadline for electoral registration to just 11 days before the poll; and I noted the concerns of the chief electoral officer that such a tight deadline would make it difficult to carry out the checks that would be needed under the Northern Ireland system and might add to the risk of fraud. I therefore welcome the fact that the Government have now decided to introduce safeguards in response to those concerns. We will want to explore the adequacy of those safeguards in Committee.

That leads me to comment that the rigour not just of those safeguards but of the entire system for electoral registration and, indeed, the other changes in the Bill, such as doing away with the statutory annual canvass, depends critically on the integrity, authority and independence of the chief electoral officer. I have met the current office holder and was impressed by what he told me about how electoral registration is carried out in Northern Ireland. In the light of the importance of that office for the integrity of the entire registration system, I confess to being somewhat uneasy about the fact that the Bill makes the chief electoral officer's reappointment after five years subject to renewal by the Government, whereas at the moment, I understand, he is appointed indefinitely, subject only to good behaviour.

I am certainly not casting any adverse imputations at the Secretary of State or any of his Ministers if I say that I am uneasy about the prospect of any politician from any political party having it in his power to decide whether the chief electoral officer should or should not be reappointed after five years. One could see how the chief electoral officer might be subjected to a certain amount of political pressure in how he exercised his judgment because he would want to make sure that he got a second term in the job.

I cannot leave the subject of electoral registration, however, without expressing some regret—to take up a point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner)—that the Government are allowing a different system in Northern Ireland from that in the rest of the United Kingdom, or, more properly, that they are not applying the system of individual registration that is successfully guarding against fraud in Northern Ireland to the rest of the country. I am sorry that the Secretary of State was unable to persuade his Cabinet colleagues to benefit from the experience of Northern Ireland, and particularly sad that he was unable to persuade the Secretary of State for Wales to go down that route, and I still hope that, some day soon, the Government may understand that the Northern Ireland example is the one that England, Wales and Scotland should follow.

On the funding of political parties, my preference and that of my party is for Northern Ireland to be brought as soon as possible fully within the same system of checks and scrutiny as applies to any other part of the United Kingdom under the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000. We have accepted reluctantly that the fear of intimidation in Northern Ireland makes that final move impossible for now, and I support the Bill's compromise on the reporting of donations in confidence to the Electoral Commission.

The Bill touches on a further issue to do with party donations. The fact that a large minority of people in Northern Ireland consider themselves to be Irish in terms of both nationality and citizenship clearly has implications for party donations, but we will want to look very closely, in Committee and on Report, at exactly how the United Kingdom and the Irish Republic arrangements for party donations will intersect in the legislation. During the Bill's future stages, we will want some further information about exactly how the Irish Republic defines both Irish citizenship and Irish companies for the purposes of party donations. We will want to be certain that the system of checks that we provide for Northern Ireland is suitably rigorous.

I wish to say a few words about the proposals for a single energy market. Whenever I talk to those in business or to business representative organisations in Northern Ireland, it soon becomes apparent that they are very clear that they now operate simultaneously in a Northern Ireland market, an island of Ireland market, a United Kingdom market, a British isles market, a European Union market and, indeed, in many cases, a global market. If the proposal for an island of Ireland wholesale energy market involves lower prices and greater choice for energy consumers in Northern Ireland—there might be a particular advantage for business consumers of energy—it should be supported. It strikes me as a sensible step in practical co-operation across the United Kingdom-Republic of Ireland border.

This country and the Republic of Ireland should have the same close, interdependent economic relationships as now exist between any other two neighbours in western Europe and, increasingly now, in central and eastern Europe. I hope that, in due course, we will not rule out integrating that all-Ireland market with the energy market in Great Britain or, for that matter, its inclusion in what I hope will eventually become a genuinely liberal energy market throughout the European Union.

We welcome many of the proposals in the Bill. We shall not seek to divide the House on Second Reading tonight, but we will want to explore and test the Government's arguments on certain aspects in Committee and on Report, and I invite my hon. Friends to respond to the Bill on that basis.

5.39 pm

Mark Durkan (Foyle) (SDLP): The Bill before us is an odd one. It is something of a dog's breakfast in that it contains all sorts of bits and scraps, some not particularly substantive. Yes, there are important provisions and some welcome ones, but as we will show, the most significant feature of the Bill is what is not in it, rather than what is.

It is interesting that, introducing the debate, the Secretary of State took a lot of time to deal with the subject of MI5 and there were many interventions on the future of intelligence policing, when there is nothing in the Bill that deals directly with that matter. If the Bill made direct provision for the enhanced and expanded role that appears to be envisaged for MI5, that would be good cause to vote against it, even on Second Reading; however, it does not.

That does not reassure those of us who are concerned about plans for the future of intelligence policing—a point that will be developed by my hon. Friends when they speak. We cannot accept the Secretary of State's assurance in relation to MI5 that what has happened in the past will not happen in the future. What basis do we have for accepting such an assurance from a Government who are in denial about what has happened in the past and who, through measures such as the Inquiries Act 2005, have acted precisely and deliberately to make sure that the truth cannot emerge about things that happened in the past, courtesy of MI5.

In their interventions, hon. Members referred to various paramilitary organisations and terrorist groups. All the terrorist organisations in Northern Ireland have comported themselves as paramilitary organisations, but the sad and shameful reality is that military interests in Northern Ireland—namely, MI5—have in the past comported themselves as para-terrorists in their handling of and engagement, involvement, collusion and complicity in all sorts of crimes committed by terrorists. They did not share intelligence that could have been used to apprehend people, to alert people, or to save lives. Such was the nature of its operations that MI5 literally, as my hon. Friend the Member for South Down (Mr. McGrady) said, conspired to allow people to get away with murder. When the Government seem content to cover up those aspects of the past, I find it hard to accept their assurances about the future.

The suggestion made was that MI5—with its record in Northern Ireland—is to be some new feature. Listening to the Secretary of State talk about trying to bring Northern Ireland into line with the rest of the United Kingdom, one might think that Northern Ireland had never had MI5 and its intelligence operatives before. Well, we have, and we have had far too many of them. Trusting the future of intelligence policing to MI5 is like making Herod the children's commissioner—it goes against the whole record of experience and legitimate interest.

MI5 has not shown respect for the rights of the citizens of Northern Ireland, it has not respected life and it has not respected the duties and responsibilities of other law enforcement agencies, and I have seen nothing to tell me that that will change in future. That is why we have fundamental concerns about the plans for the future of intelligence policing. It is all very well the Secretary of State saying that the police service will have operational responsibility when the Security Service advises the police of something: the big question is what about the circumstances in which the Security Service does not advise the police of something, or deliberately misadvises them? All that has happened in the past, and there is nothing to assure us that it will not happen in the future.

In addition, as the Secretary of State has indicated, intelligence policing in the hands of MI5 will not be subject to any of the scrutiny, challenge or accountability available in relation to the police service in the form of appeals to the Policing Board or the ombudsman's office and, in the context of devolution, challenge in the Assembly. Legitimate national security issues will still have to be addressed but, as I said in an intervention, the Patten report clearly recommended that the Chief Constable report to the Secretary of State on such matters, rather than to devolved bodies and the Policing Board. That is the way forward—stick to the Patten path.

Mr. Hain: It is not clear whether the hon. Gentleman accepts my basic point that the Security Service needs to be able to co-ordinate its activities in every part of the United Kingdom mainly to fight the modern problem of international terrorism. Surely, the hon. Gentleman is not disputing that.

Mark Durkan: I have already said that we should stick to what Patten recommended, and Patten clearly envisaged the need for continued intelligence policing. The report also made clear both the changes that had to be made to the police service to accommodate that capacity and the issues on which the Chief Constable would report to the Secretary of State. There would be some issues of national security on which it would be appropriate for the Secretary of State, rather than the devolved authorities, to receive reports. I therefore do not accept the case that the Secretary of State made for an enhanced and expanded role for MI5 in future.

Mr. Hain: Perhaps I am trying the hon. Gentleman's patience, but we all do so to one another in the House. It is a question of yes or no. Does he think that the Security Service should have primacy when fighting terrorism and doing its work? He spoke about the role of the Chief Constable and so on, but we have made that role clear. I am not certain whether he agrees or disagrees that the Security Service should be able to operate in such a way that it can combat the problems of terrorism, particularly international terrorism, and protect the national interest? Does he agree with that or not, particularly the point about national security?

Mark Durkan: I should have thought that a comparison with Herod as children's commissioner indicated that I do not accept that the Security Service should be trusted with a role of such primacy, particularly given its record. It is not as if we have a figmentary concern about the future conduct and performance of MI5 and the quality of its relationship with the police service, as history shows the true and ugly face of such matters.

The Bill makes a number of provisions in several different areas, and my hon. Friends will deal with political donations, electoral registration and the creation of a single energy market throughout the island of Ireland. Those are important provisions, but there are other things that the Government could have included in the legislation but which they have chosen not to include. As long ago as 2000, the British Government agreed to review whether the Human Rights Commission should be given powers to call for persons and papers, and to enter and inspect the premises of public authorities. Without those powers, the record shows that its investigations can be hampered and impeded, as happened when it was denied entry to a prison that it wanted to inspect. Such powers are essential if the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission is to comply with the UN Paris principles. Powers to call for persons and papers are possessed by human rights commissions throughout the world, including the one in the Republic of Ireland.

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. David Hanson): The hon. Gentleman will be aware that a consultation on those very points was completed at the end of February. We are currently considering our response.

Mark Durkan: Given that the commitments were made as far back as 2000, that the response to the consultation is now available and that the Government have indicated that there are other amendments that they might be prepared to include in the Bill, they should indicate their willingness to use the Bill to make that provision. Rather than waiting until next year to legislate—as they may or may not plan to do—why not do so now? Fairly simple and straightforward amendments could be tabled to deal with the matter.

Lady Hermon: The hon. Gentleman referred to the Paris principles. Those principles set out the characteristics and powers of a national human rights commission. Does he accept that the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission is a regional human rights commission, not a national one across the United Kingdom, and so should have lesser powers and different characteristics from those outlined in the Paris principles?

Mark Durkan: I do not accept that the commission should have lesser powers than those outlined in the Paris principles when it comes to carrying out its remit in respect of human rights in Northern Ireland. That remit should be significant and many people believed and assumed that it was as significant as what is covered in the Paris principles. That is what has to be rectified and remedied. We should remember that we are talking about a product of the Good Friday agreement. The human rights commission in the Republic is also a product of the Good Friday agreement. It is odd that one commission has those powers and the other does not, if we are talking about things being like for like and parity of approach.

In response to an intervention from the hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson), the Secretary of State entertained the possibility of a number of amendments being introduced to deal with what might be termed constitutional or institutional matters. I warn the Government that it would be a political misadventure to try to use the Bill as a vehicle for translating into legislation chunks of the so-called comprehensive agreement of December 2004, which was not an agreement and was not comprehensive. It emerged as a result of negotiations between the two Governments, the Democratic Unionist party and Sinn Fein. It came on the back of the two Governments aborting the review of the workings of the Good Friday agreement that was under way in 2004 and it contains a number of provisions that violate key principles of the Good Friday agreement.

I warn the Government against using the Bill to legislate for the comprehensive agreement. I know that they will be tempted to do so, because Sinn Fein very foolishly agreed all sorts of things that it apparently now disagrees with. In the comprehensive agreement, it agreed that legislation would be introduced in the House to create a shadow Assembly. Now Sinn Fein says that it is totally against a shadow Assembly. It also agreed that coming out of the shadow Assembly would depend on the reports of the Independent Monitoring Commission. It now says that it would not have the Independent Monitoring Commission about the place and that the commission should have no part in determining our political future. However, I hope that, although the temptation might be there in relation to Sinn Fein's mistakes in the comprehensive agreement, the Government will not try to lift chunks of the comprehensive agreement and legislate for that in the Bill.

Mr. Hain: It is not a question of importing the comprehensive agreement wholesale into legislation. The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office, my hon. Friend the Member for Delyn (Mr. Hanson) and I have spent some time talking to the hon. Gentleman's party, the DUP, the Ulster Unionist party, Sinn Fein and the other parties about a consensus on the way forward, which remains our objective. We intend to try to achieve that, but I need his party to engage positively, rather than to pretend that everything should remain unchanged. The small tweaks, as it were, to the existing arrangements could easily be dealt with by common agreement if his party would focus on the detail, rather than simply saying on principle, "No, we'll never change anything."

Mark Durkan: I thank the Secretary of State for his intervention, but we have engaged very positively with all the detail. Like many other parties, we were engaged positively and constructively in the detail of such things in the review of the Good Friday agreement and then we found it aborted by the two Governments. We had put forward all sorts of proposals to improve the workings of the institutions, and effectiveness, efficiency, transparency and accountability, because people said that they were worried about those issues. All sorts of ideas were put forward, but the Government were not interested in that. They were interested simply in concentrating on the positions of Sinn Fein and the DUP, at the expense of the agreement.

Again contrary to what the Secretary of State has said, the comprehensive agreement does not provide for mere tweakings of parts of the Good Friday agreement. Central to the Good Friday agreement was the principle of democratic inclusion and key to the concept of inclusion in the agreement was respect for difference and for parties' mandates. Parties would go into Government according to the strength of their mandate, if they so chose. Nobody could vet or veto each other's appointments to Government. That principle of inclusion is torn up by the comprehensive agreement. Not only is there a possibility of people being able to prevent the appointment of Ministers, under the comprehensive agreement the Social Democratic and Labour party and the UUP are effectively threatened with automatic exclusion from ministerial office if we do not bend a knee to Sinn Fein and the DUP and vote confidence in them as First and Deputy First Minister. Annex B, strand one, paragraph 9 of the comprehensive agreement states that we will be automatically excluded from office if we abstain on a vote of which the only legal effect would be to elect the First and Deputy First Minister. Someone cannot be automatically excluded from office for committing a crime, misconduct in office or all sorts of other misdemeanours, but they would be automatically excluded under the comprehensive agreement for exercising a legitimate democratic right and expressing a legitimate democratic difference. That cannot be right and that is no mere tweaking.

Mr. Hain: I agree that it would be wholly wrong if the SDLP or the UUP found themselves excluded in those circumstances. I do not intend to legislate in relation to that small part of the consequences, as I think that the hon. Gentleman knows.

Mark Durkan: I welcome that commitment from the Secretary of State. I hope that there will be nothing like what I have described. I made the point to emphasise that the comprehensive agreement involves changes and is pregnant with implications and complications that the Government have not admitted to date.

Lembit Öpik: I am sure that, like me, the hon. Gentleman is encouraged by the Secretary of State's reassurance, but does he agree that, many times, there are unintended consequences in the legislation such that one cannot trust the word of the existing Secretary of State to bind future Secretaries of State for Northern Ireland? Is it not the case that, on innumerable occasions in the past nine or 10 years, we have had those kinds of assurances, which have eventually counted for nothing? In the end Ministers have said, "Well, that was then and this is now."

Mark Durkan: I accept fully what the hon. Gentleman has said. It reminds me of a conversation that I tried to have with him a few weeks ago in the context of the debate on the Short money about the folly of accepting shallow sweeping assurances from Secretaries of State about what may or may not happen in the future.

There are other aspects of the comprehensive agreement that would mean that in restored institutions, we would find it hard to get decisions taken and there could be gridlock. The content of the comprehensive agreement is wrong and flawed. Fundamentally, parties need to remember that all the issues relating to the workings of the institutions and the agreement did not bring about suspension. They did not bring the institutions down. The institutions were brought down because of other things happening or not happening completely outside them. Resolving those issues should not be a precondition for restoring the institutions. We can address the issues, as we were addressing them constructively, in the context of a review. The best circumstances for a review to take place would be in the context of working restored institutions, because then every party would have a lot more confidence in the real willingness of other parties to engage in such institutions and processes. It is that lack of confidence that is at the root of the deadlock and stand-off at the moment.

Of course, it is not just what is in the comprehensive agreement that has worried those of us who stand fully by the Good Friday agreement, but the fact that we were told in a statement by the hon. Member for Belfast, East that the comprehensive agreement had alongside it 100 side deals and secret understandings in the form of more than 100 clarifying answers, notes and letters. We were told that about the comprehensive agreement at a time when the Government were still telling us that there would be no more side deals and we had seen the last of them. In a while, we will probably be told that there has not been a side deal in two months. The fact is that we can trust neither what is in the comprehensive agreement, nor what we have not been shown outside of it. Again, I warn the Government against the misadventure of turning to the comprehensive agreement and things like it for new material for legislation, because that will not give us a platform for progress, but just create a political tug of war in a dead end, which will not take anything forward.

The hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) mentioned that provisions on the devolution of policing and justice are at the heart of the Bill. We need to remember that the power to devolve policing and justice already exists—it is not created by the Bill. The Bill does not do much one way or another in respect of that basic power, which is in section 4(2) of the Northern Ireland Act 1998.

The Bill contains provisions that are somewhere between a figment and a fig leaf. It contains provisions that may or may not operate or be called upon, such as the power to appoint a Minister of Justice in a way other than by d'Hondt. There may or may not be a joint Ministry and rotating junior and senior Ministers. The Bill provides for all sorts of things that might not happen. We know, as my earlier remarks and the Secretary of State's comments have shown, that much of the more serious stuff that will happen regarding future policing, such as that involving MI5, lies outside the Bill. We have been given a figment, or fig leaf, so that some people can pretend that the big outstanding issue that kept them off the Policing Board and prevented them from supporting the policing arrangements has been resolved and that their demand for the devolution of justice and policing has been met.

The scale on which some devolution has already taken place should not be underestimated. The Policing Board already has quite a number of the powers and functions that were formerly exercised by the Secretary of State and the Northern Ireland Office. That was shown graphically when the Secretary of State and the NIO tried to intervene on and influence the Policing Board on the position of the then Chief Constable, Ronnie Flanagan. A similar thing happened in response to the police ombudsman's report on Omagh. It cannot be emphasised enough that the Policing Board proved that it had devolved powers and independence. Sinn Fein has refused to be part of the devolution that has already taken place.

There is a paradox about Sinn Fein's position on the outstanding issues of devolution. The DUP must be delighted—its members must be grinning like horses chewing thistles—whenever Sinn Fein effectively gives it a veto on the position on policing. Sinn Fein's big macho position is that it will not move on policing until the DUP agrees a date for the devolution of justice and policing. I do not detect any great hurry on the part of the DUP to see Sinn Fein on the Policing Board and entering into the arrangements. The DUP will pocket that veto and say, "That will do nicely, thank you very much." It is quite happy that Sinn Fein's position has given it a veto on the future of policing, the devolution of justice and policing, and devolution. People need to understand that there is a ruse going on and that the Bill is somewhere between a figment and a fig leaf.

We want the full devolution of justice and policing and the full outworking of the agreement and the Patten report. That is why we want progress to be made on the restoration of the institutions. We want the Governments to show real intent with regard to the talk of determination and the talk of time lines in which they have engaged. They should set a date for restoring the political institutions, put it to the parties and flush out where the parties stand on all the institutions of the agreement. They should, not least, flush out where the parties stand on the democratic policing arrangements.

6.5 pm

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): As you will know, Madam Deputy Speaker, since the last time that we had a debate on Northern Ireland, the Liberal Democrats have elected a new leader. There is a new shadow Cabinet, but I am still here. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for North-East Fife (Sir Menzies Campbell), in his benevolence, has granted me the opportunity to continue to speak on Northern Ireland and, indeed, Wales, which proves that he is far from Ming the merciless, but Ming the merciful. Since the last Ming dynasty lasted 275 years, I am both relieved and delighted to have found favour with the new emperor.

I thank the Secretary of State for introducing the Bill and explaining its various provisions. On the whole, Liberal Democrats support the motivation behind them, but, once again, we have several serious concerns. We will therefore try to improve the Bill as it progresses through the House.

The hon. Member for Foyle (Mark Durkan) correctly pointed out that we had a debate on the possible unintended consequences of the Short money for Sinn Fein. I remind him and the House that the problem with that debate was not the sincere intent of the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, but the confused attempt by the Leader of the House to explain what was going on, which led many Liberal Democrat Members to vote as the hon. Gentleman would have liked: against the proposal. I say to the Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office, the hon. Member for Delyn (Mr. Hanson), who is likely to wind up today's debate, that it is important that a lesson be learned from that debate. Individuals have become cynical and think that while the Government might intend to do one thing today, a future Secretary of State or Minister may do another thing tomorrow. In Committee, I intend—I hope that hon. Members of all parties will do this—to ensure that we really understand the consequences of such a wide-ranging Bill. The hon. Member for Foyle described the Bill as a dog's breakfast, but I would more charitably describe it as a catch-all Bill that covers many matters. The worst thing that could happen would be that the Bill had precisely the opposite outcome to that intended by the Government, but that is more than possible, given the history of other legislation.

Let me turn to the details of the Bill. We have little worry about the intention in clause 1 of introducing anonymous registration in Northern Ireland to mirror clause 10 of the Electoral Administration Bill. As the Secretary of State indicated, the power would allow individuals to register anonymously if they feared that their safety, or that of any person in their home, would be at risk if they could be identified from the electoral register. Given the changing threat of terrorism in Northern Ireland, I can only say that I hope that the number of people for whom the provision might be necessary will be small and decrease over time.

I am curious about how the Government will achieve anonymous registration. The clause allows the Secretary of State to lay an Order in Council to achieve such registration. However, will the Minister explain why such a measure is not simply in the Bill? Why, once again, do we have to go through the increasingly unsatisfactory Order-in-Council process? Why is it not possible to extend the provisions on electoral administration to Northern Ireland now, because the Government could thus achieve their aim earlier than they would by using the Bill? Perhaps there is a procedural explanation, but I have not heard it, so I hope that the Minister will deal with my point.

We are disappointed that the Government intend to abolish the annual canvass that was introduced by the Electoral Fraud (Northern Ireland) Act 2002. The annual canvass has proved to be pretty successful in Northern Ireland. The introduction of individual registration, with personal identifiers, has been a matter for debate throughout the whole of the United Kingdom. In Northern Ireland it has led to a much more accurate and robust electoral register than those compiled under the system of household registration. There are roughly 1.2 million people on the register, which is an estimated 91 per cent. of the voting age population.

I understand the Government's concern at the continued decline in numbers of people registering, and we must make sure that the procedures are not so onerous that we are discouraging registration. That is a fair point, but I fear that by extending the period of time between canvasses to 10 years, the Government have back-pedalled far too far and will, as an unintended consequence, achieve the exact opposite of what they seek to achieve. Can the Minister, in his summation, explain why a period of 10 years was chosen? Would not a shorter period be more sensible—if not an annual canvass, then a canvass every four years to ensure that the registers are comprehensive in advance of Assembly elections?

There is a logic to tying the registration of individual voters to the timing of Assembly elections. It is not clear to me why the Government would choose a period—10 years—which will necessarily alter the synchronisation of the electoral registration process with the elections, which should be on a fixed time scale once the situation normalises.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the fact that people can register up to a few days before the voting date leaves them no excuse for not being on the register?

Lembit Öpik: The right hon. Gentleman is correct. In theory, there is every opportunity for people to register, but it takes some proactivity from the individual elector to do that, whereas the suggested process of registration, if I understand it correctly, produces some back pressure to encourage individual registration. If there is to be a formalised period between registrations, the Government should seriously consider synchronising that process with elections that happen on a fixed time scale.

The Secretary of State and the Minister may want to consider another suggestion. Would it be possible for the chief electoral officer to send to every household every 12 months a sheet of paper containing the details of members of the household who are on the register? Perhaps the Minister intends that to happen anyway, in which case I would be delighted to hear that reassurance. It would allow people to confirm that their details were correct, or to ask for certain different people living in that household to be registered. It would mean that every individual did not have to re-register every year, which is what the Government want to change, but we would still have a more accurate picture every year of the state of the register. The system of individual registration has worked in Northern Ireland, and it would be wrong to undermine it.

I turn briefly to clause 8 and the changes that it makes to the tenure of the chief electoral officer. I understand that the current chief electoral officer is due to retire shortly, and that the process to appoint a successor is well under way. Can the Minister confirm to me that the candidates for the position were aware of the impending changes to tenure? That does not relate directly to the Bill, but if the Minister could clear that up in his comments or by way of intervention, that would be helpful.

Clause 10 deals with a more important issue. The power to change the date of an election by statutory instrument is a proposal with which we fundamentally disagree. The House may recall that in 2003, the Government postponed the date of elections to the Northern Ireland Assembly, not once, but twice. Contrary to the concerns of the right hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley), I remind him that on both occasions we criticised the Government for interfering with the date of the elections. I realise of course that the provision would not allow the Secretary of State to postpone elections, just to bring them forward. Nevertheless, this is a fundamental constitutional issue and should not be decided by way of secondary legislation.

In reply to an intervention, the Secretary of State said something that worried me even more. Asked whether he would insist on proceeding with an alteration to the date of an election even if the parties in the House opposed it, he said, "It is not something I would want to do." The inference was that it was something that he would be willing to do, regardless.

To take a salient example of a democratic deficit, let us remember that the Government were elected with roughly one third of the vote. That means that two thirds of the vote was for parties that opposed the Government's manifesto, yet the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland said that he would be willing to force through a change to the date of an election even if the parties representing two thirds of the electorate opposed it. The position is worse than that. If the Secretary of State is willing to do that, there is every expectation that he would be willing to ignore the overwhelming view of the parties in Northern Ireland. That is why I am so concerned, and it is to some extent why we were opposed to the change on 17 March 2003, the first change to the date of the elections at that time, and once again we criticised the change on 12 May 2003.

I am not satisfied that the Secretary of State has resolved our concern. More than that, Members of the House and of another place should have the opportunity to debate fully the merits of such a move, and to propose such amendments as Parliament considers necessary. I cannot see why a Secretary of State would be so unwilling to countenance a reasonable debate on the Floor of the House and in another place, if he was so sure of his ground.

Despite the contrary claims, I recall that I and others thought that the Government were trying to help one particular party at the time—the Ulster Unionist party—by changing the date on at least one of those occasions. I remember predicting that that would only have a beneficial effect for the Democratic Unionist party, which at the time did not seem to be a particularly close friend of the Government. We know that that relationship has since been mended, and that the DUP and others are a little worried about the notional nature of the friendships that the Government develop with parties from Northern Ireland.

Let me be clear that there is much to commend the members of the Democratic Unionist party. They are fine and pleasant people one and all, but it is the vicarious way in which one party finds favour, and then another, that causes us concern about legislation that seems to be framed in order to allow Ministers to alter election dates for what we might call reasons of expediency. In any event, we cannot allow democracy and its routine operation to be reduced to a short debate on the Committee corridor, which would deny a vast number of Members the opportunity to discuss such an important issue. We cannot accept the inclusion of the clause in the Bill.

I am also disappointed by the provisions in part 4. Although this part aligns donation controls in Northern Ireland more closely with those in England, Scotland and Wales, it does not achieve full transparency. Northern Ireland political parties and regulated donees will continue to be exempt from the full donation controls until October 2007, after which they will be required to comply with most, but not all, of part IV of the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000. From November 2007 until 2010 the new measures will require Northern Ireland parties only to submit donation returns to the Electoral Commission on a confidential basis. I fully appreciate that concerns still exist about the publication of donors in Northern Ireland, because of fears for their safety. The new measures are a step in the right direction, but can the Secretary of State guarantee that full disclosure will be achieved by 2010?

Let us be realistic. Even if the Government think that the process must be opaque in order to get everybody to buy into it, they need to take a reality check. For example, I doubt whether, even under those more generous arrangements, Sinn Fein would put on its list of donors the Northern bank, which has been more than generous in making a recent donation to that organisation and its paramilitary colleagues. Paramilitarism and illegal action will continue whether or not we require transparency, and I therefore counsel the Minister that we can achieve that objective a lot more quickly. We are likely to have elections in that period of time, and various parties could benefit from the opaqueness that will guarantee them greater funds than would otherwise be the case.

I also have concerns about extending the categories of permissible donors. When the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 was progressing through Parliament, Liberal Democrat Members recognised, in the absence of any similar legislation in the Republic of Ireland, that it would be useful to include Northern Ireland in the ban on receiving foreign donations, because parties that operate on an all-Ireland basis would be able to receive such donations through their offices in the Republic. If the DUP were to put its political headquarters in Dublin, it would have no trouble in obtaining international funds. That point applies to every party, a number of which already do exactly that. [Interruption.] There are, as the right hon. Member for North Antrim has suggested, other, more exotic solutions to the problem, and I look forward to his proposing them in Committee.

The Liberal Democrats agreed to the exemption of Northern Ireland from those provisions on the express condition that the Government would urgently seek to persuade the Government of southern Ireland to introduce similar legislation, or at least to find some way of excluding parties that also operate in Northern Ireland from their own funding arrangements. Will the Minister tell me whether such discussions have taken place? If they have taken place, the Government have been coy about them. Have the Government actively pursued that matter with the Irish Government? If not, will the Minister explain why we should take seriously the Government's implicit intention of normalising that important element of funding arrangements for political parties in a part of the United Kingdom, namely the north of Ireland?

The Electoral Commission also has concerns about those provisions. In its view:

"it is difficult to achieve openness and transparency with such a regime."

The commission has stated that it would like the regime to be clarified on the face of the Bill, and it has accordingly asked for a clear definition of the acceptable tests of Irish citizenship in order for the recipients of donations to check the permissibility of donors. Will the Minister take on board those concerns and table amendments accordingly in Committee? If he is unsure about taking that step, will he make a commitment to hold cross-party talks before the Bill enters Committee, because we would be happy to draft amendments that the Government could then accept?

Finally, I shall turn to a matter that other hon. Members have already mentioned—the arrangements for the devolution of policing and justice to the Assembly. The Liberal Democrats are a devolutionist party, and it has been party policy for many years to devolve those functions to the Assembly, and I therefore welcome the sections of the Bill that will enable policing and justice arrangements to be devolved in any form chosen by the Assembly. However, given the importance of policing to society, we must be careful about when the functions are devolved, and I support much of what the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) has said about policing in Northern Ireland and the insightful points made by the hon. Member for Foyle.

We all agree that Sinn Fein should come in from the cold on the devolution of policing and justice and that it must take its place on the Policing Board and accept the current policing arrangements. With some justification, the SDLP and the DUP have criticised Sinn Fein for always asking for more on policing, because Sinn Fein has got quite a lot of what it has asked for from this Government but still says that that is not enough, which is a practice that has tried the patience of us all. The Bill includes arrangements for the full devolution of policing, which can happen only when we are sure that Sinn Fein will not act as the dog-in-the-manger party by bleating that there has not been sufficient change to policing in Northern Ireland. Compromises have been made in response to Sinn Fein's requirements, and Sinn Fein now needs to compromise in return.

The Northern Ireland Assembly has been suspended for almost five years. From the Assembly elections in 1998 until the beginning of the current suspension in October 2002, the Assembly went through a start-stop process in which there were various periods of suspension. Even when the Assembly was functioning, there were various crises and resignations involving the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister, and I accept that it would have been quite wrong to devolve policing and justice functions to the Assembly in such an unstable situation. We cannot allow something as important as policing to be devolved to an institution which does not look durable, because it would be disastrous if policing were in the hands of an Assembly Minister one week and a Minister at Westminster the next. Of all the areas in life for which Parliament is responsible, policing is surely one of the most fundamental. There are some hurdles to overcome, some of which relate to political buy-in, primarily by Sinn Fein.

Ministers must be careful what they say about crime. For the Secretary of State to discuss "pure crime" implies a certain naivety about the difference between "proper terrorism" and "proper crime". In recent debates in this Chamber, I have become annoyed, because Ministers appear sincerely to think that Northern Ireland terrorism should be treated differently from international terrorism. Although the Secretary of State claims to see those things equally, as DUP Members have rightly pointed out, they are treated differently. If anyone thinks that a large proportion of organised crime in Northern Ireland is not directly related to organised paramilitarism in Northern Ireland and that money gained from organised crime does not seep across into organised terrorism, they are dreaming and do not understand how paramilitary funding has taken place in the Province.

I counsel Ministers to take a more insightful and circumspect view of how they define crime in Northern Ireland and of how they seek to differentiate it from terrorism. The Government have created that problem by repeatedly describing international terrorism as motiveless, while stating that Northern Irish terrorism has motives that we can understand and negotiate away.

[Lembit Öpik]

Although I am tempted to go further down that path, I shall simply say that in Committee we must ensure that what is put into the legislation does not utterly contradict the reality on the ground in Northern Ireland.

Ministers must be able to answer the questions put by the hon. Gentleman. If they cannot do so, I will be concerned that once again we are creating unintended consequences, overlaps and ricochet effects that will come back to bite not the Government, but security and policing in Northern Ireland. When the time comes to give those powers to the Assembly, we must be sure that we are devolving them to a secure and stable institution and that the legislation is also secure and stable.

The Bill contains much of merit, but we are concerned by the changes, one or two of which are in principle, that will serve to create instability. We want to see a proper debate and a willingness to modify the canvassing period for electoral registration, more robust consideration of the principles at stake on altering the date of an Assembly election by an Order in Council alone, and greater transparency when it comes to donations to parties. All those matters require proper attention and debate.

As ever, Liberal Democrats will seek to be as constructive as we can. We will not oppose the Bill's Second Reading, nor the programme motion, which, as ever on Northern Ireland matters these days, provides sufficient time for consideration. However, we will be eager to have informal debates with the Government, if they find that easier, or formal Divisions with them if they fail to listen, in order to try to make the changes that we wish to see in a Bill that covers a great deal and serves potentially to destabilise quite a lot.

6.30 pm

Mr. Eddie McGrady (South Down) (SDLP): My hon. Friend the Member for Foyle (Mark Durkan) strongly outlined the problem that we have with clauses 19 to 22, which deal with the devolution of justice and policing. Interventions on the Secretary of State were numerous and perceptive in that respect. These four clauses are mainly technical in nature and, one could argue, cosmetic in purpose. They may prove almost irrelevant to what is actually achieved.

It is right to stress that the devolution of justice powers has already been partly achieved. Many of the functions that were formerly exercised by the Northern Ireland Office are now being handled by the Policing Board, at times in opposition to the attitude of the Northern Ireland Office, be it in dealing with the huge challenges of the Omagh report, ensuring proper handling of intelligence by the police, or creating, for the first time ever, a human resource strategy for the police. Patten's recommendations have been at least 75 to 80 per cent. implemented.

The powers that are being sought already exist. Section 4(2) of the Northern Ireland Act 1998 gives the Secretary of State the power to devolve justice. All that the Bill does is make some technical provisions to facilitate that. Only one of those has any real political significance—it allows the Secretary of State to make provision that d'Hondt is not to apply to filling the justice portfolio in the event that the parties decide to adopt some other method of choosing heads of Departments, such as electing joint Ministers. However, when negotiations on the devolution of justice get under way, the parties might well decide to apply d'Hondt. The provision might therefore be completely unnecessary.

As many Members have said, it would perhaps have made more sense to consider whether legislation was needed after the parties had agreed the shape of devolution, when the full legislative implications could have been properly and fully assessed. It seems to me and my party that the only reason why it is being done beforehand is to help Sinn Fein to change its position on policing on the ground that it has won some wonderful new legislation on the devolution of policing, despite the fact that devolved policing powers are already in the existing legislation. I do not think that that will succeed, because Sinn Fein has no intention of joining the Policing Board. The Secretary of State's announcement of a new membership clearly indicates that even the Northern Ireland Office recognises that the probability of Sinn Fein joining in on policing lies at some point in the distant future, if ever.

Sinn Fein says that it needs to take control of the "securocrats"—its term—in the police through the devolution of justice. Yet again, it has missed the point, because at the same time as the Government are legislating on the devolution of justice in the Bill, they are taking away responsibility for intelligence gathering on national security from the PSNI and giving it to MI5. That has been a focal point of contention throughout several Members' contributions. The whispered justification for this is that when one has devolved justice one cannot have a devolved Justice Minister who may be of a particular political party. However, that is not the argument. The issue of who gets intelligence information—the devolved Justice Minister or the Secretary of State—is a separate issue from that of who gathers it—the PSNI or MI5. Clearly, as Patten envisaged, the PSNI will not report to the devolved Justice Minister on national security, but rather to the Secretary of State. However, also as Patten envisaged, the Chief Constable should do the reporting, not MI5.

There are several reasons for that. First, the PSNI has undergone the Patten reforms; MI5 has not. Much of the community in Northern Ireland, be it nationalist or Unionist, has no confidence in MI5 and does not identify with it. That is why it would be destabilising for it to have such an enlarged role. Secondly, as the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) said, in Northern Ireland organised crime and subversive activity go hand in hand. Reference was made to the Northern bank robbery. That is why one organisation should be in the lead in monitoring the situation—the PSNI. Giving that over to MI5 carries with it the huge risk that it, like the old RUC special branch, will hog the intelligence and not share it, where it does not suit it, with the police who are responsible for prosecutions. People have got away with murder in the past as a result of that.

Thirdly, Northern Ireland has a much more accountable informer-handling regime under the PSNI following the Patten report, the Stevens report into collusion with the security forces and other activities, and the Omagh report. Taking intelligence gathering from the PSNI diminishes those changes. Moreover, how can we have confidence that MI5 will operate by the same standards? How can we have confidence, for instance, that Torrens Knight, a convicted sectarian mass murderer, will not again be recruited by MI5? Fourthly, the Patten report explicitly stated that "the police service must remain equipped to detect and deal with terrorist activity, and for this they will need good intelligence capability."

The regime proposed by the NIO means that Patten is being broken.

All that is being proposed at a time when it has been recently revealed that MI5 failed to pass on warnings about the Omagh bombing. Who knows whether that tragedy could have been averted had that warning been passed on? Now, I see that the head of MI5, in whom we are meant to have great confidence, has refused to meet the Omagh families, who suffered such a tragedy at that time. Is that accountability? Is that transparency? Is that Patten?

Just when we have overcome the old RUC concept of the force within a force that was the special branch, the Government seem determined to create a force outside a force. Just when nationalist confidence in the police is growing, the Government are creating a new force that will detract from and perhaps destroy that new confidence. The Government need to reconsider their proposal on MI5's role in Northern Ireland intelligence gathering. If they continue along this path, our community and the prosecution of crime will be greatly diminished.

I should like briefly to deal with some of the comments that were made in the context of the legislation on fundraising for political parties. Disapplying part 4 of the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 in Northern Ireland was a logical approach to a specific local problem and circumstances. I hope that hon. Members appreciate that political fundraising in Northern Ireland presents distinct challenges, different from those in England, Wales or even the Republic of Ireland.

We have not advanced far enough down the road of confidence. Members of my political party could not and would not make donations to the party if their names were published. They would be fearful for their lives and those of their families and for their businesses. There is no doubt about that—and I am talking about the present day, not past history. Circumstances are changing and Northern Ireland has moved on substantially nearly eight years after the Good Friday agreement, but the residue of a problem remains: sectarianism continues to fester and intimidation persists. In the past, individuals have been intimidated, attacked and ostracised because they are donors to and supporters of a specific political party, not only mine. I could give specific examples, but not on the Floor of the House and not to the embarrassment of the people concerned.

For those legitimate reasons, many people seek certainty that their personal details will be kept private if they donate to a political party. Given the experiences of the past, that is not too much to ask. The contributions are made to a political party and to democracy.

Lady Hermon: I know that the hon. Gentleman will not disclose the names of constituents who have been intimidated—I would not ask him to do that. However, will he identify the source of the intimidation?

Mr. McGrady: The intimidation comes from the paramilitaries attached to political parties other than those represented in the House. The hon. Lady's constituency is more benign than those that most of us have the joy of representing. However, I am sure that she could find examples of such intimidation, because it is not unknown in North Down, where sectarianism has raised its head on many occasions. I make my comments in that context.

We want to acknowledge the Government's efforts to tackle the problems. I recognise that Northern Ireland cannot be given exceptional treatment for ever, but I fear that the proposal to register donors' details with the Electoral Commission when donations of more than £5,000 are made will, even with privacy provisions, deter many people from making donations. There is a further lead-in period to full compliance with the 2000 Act and we welcome that. However, we should like to believe that it was not set in stone and that, beyond October 2007 and 2010, the position would be re-examined in a practical way.

We should consider how things have developed and changed in Northern Ireland to make it safe for people who want to support democracy through democratic political parties. We should ensure that they are given the protection that they need so that they, their families and their businesses will not be danger. We have not reached that point yet. I should like to believe that before my time is over we will reach it, but it has not yet happened. We acknowledge what the Government have done and what they have taken on board. We hope that the position will be re-examined in future.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): This is a sobering moment, because the words that the hon. Member for South Down (Mr. McGrady) just uttered should be in all our minds throughout the debate. He told the House that people in his constituency and others would be afraid for their lives, their families, their property and their businesses if it were known that they made a donation to his party, or the party that the right hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) represents or the party that the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) represents.

We must be careful to acknowledge that what the hon. Gentleman said is a fact. He is an honourable man and I believe implicitly all that he said. Having heard the evidence to our Select Committee in the past few weeks, we must recognise that, sadly, we are not yet dealing with a normal part of the United Kingdom. That should inform all our discussions and decisions. I shall therefore go along with the hon. Gentleman's plea for anonymity for an indefinite period, because it is made with great personal knowledge and we should respect that. I am sure that all members of legitimate parties from the Province recognise that.

The Bill was described as a dog's breakfast by the hon. Member for Foyle (Mark Durkan), who leads the SDLP. It is not made up entirely, as I said to the right hon. Member for North Antrim, of Pedigree Chum, but has several other ingredients. We should concentrate on two specific aspects of it. First, we should consider the pro-consular powers that it grants the Secretary of State. I do not impugn his integrity or good intentions, but it is not only the road to hell that is paved with good intentions. I am nervous about giving pro-consular powers to a Secretary of State over such an important issue as determining the dates of elections.

[Sir Patrick Cormack]

My misgivings were reinforced by the answer that the Secretary of State gave to my intervention, to which the hon. Member for Foyle referred. I asked the right hon. Gentleman whether, if the legitimate Northern Ireland parties that are represented here today—the DUP, the SDLP and the UUP, perhaps together with the Alliance party, which is also fully democratic—had misgivings about the timing of an election, he would heed them. The answer was not reassuring. He said that he would be reluctant to proceed, but he did not say that he would take notice of such misgivings.

We have to be conscious that the Bill gives power to the Secretary of State to determine the crucial issue of the date of elections. The hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik)—I am glad that he has retained his portfolio—also referred to the order-making powers for which the measure paves the way. I know that the Minister will agree that that is an unsatisfactory way of legislating and it applies only to the Province, because we do not deal with matters in Scotland, Wales or England through order-making powers exclusively in the House. However, it is increasingly the pattern for Northern Ireland and will remain so until we have devolution.

Lembit Öpik: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the creeping erosion of our democracy is going even further than he suggests? A piece of legislation relating to the government of Wales is introducing the Order-in-Council process wholesale. I have little doubt that that is in large part because the Government have already got away with using it in Northern Ireland. Our contention that these precedents are serious—although the Government say that they are not—is being borne out by their promotion to higher status for other parts of the UK.

Sir Patrick Cormack: You would probably rebuke me, Madam Deputy Speaker, if I went off on a long excursion into Wales. However, I take the point, made with knowledge and feeling, by the hon. Gentleman, who speaks for his party on Northern Ireland and Wales.

On devolution, which is central to all our concerns, I was impressed by the speech made by my hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington), the shadow Secretary of State. He spoke powerfully of the need to have an Assembly—[Interruption.] It would be good to have an audience here, too. He talked—[Interruption.] Hon. Members should not say those things. I did not call myself to speak; I was called by the occupant of the Chair, as other hon. Members may or may not be. It is important that we all recognise that and listen to each other accordingly in this place.

Let me go back to the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury, who speaks from the Front Bench and who made some powerful observations about policing. I am strongly opposed to devolving power over policing to any Executive who have Ministers from a party that refuses to take any part in the Policing Board. If we move towards devolution and a power-sharing Executive, and if we have a Deputy First Minister from Sinn Fein—as the arithmetic suggests that we might—it would be preposterous to give devolved powers for policing to an Executive that included Sinn Fein, if Sinn Fein were boycotting the Policing Board and playing no part in returning Northern Ireland to the normality to which we aspire.

It is incumbent on Sinn Fein to pause for a moment. If it is really anxious to have devolution and to play a part as a constructive democratic force, it must do two things. First, it must totally repudiate any connection with organised crime and urge any of its number still involved with organised crime to disgorge their gains. The same goes for the so-called loyalist paramilitaries—I hate to use that term in this context—although they do not have the political muscle that Sinn Fein has. Secondly, Sinn Fein must co-operate with the Assets Recovery Agency and with the police, and play its proper part in making Northern Ireland a law-abiding community again.

If Sinn Fein did all that and, having done so, played a part in the Policing Board, it would not be giving up its nationalist aspirations or its desire for a united Ireland. If, some day, the people of Northern Ireland vote for a united Ireland, so be it. I would not do so because I do not want that. I am a Unionist and I support Unionism. However, I wholly honour the way in which the hon. Members for Belfast, South (Dr. McDonnell), for Foyle and for South Down approach their parliamentary duties and advance legitimately their proper cause. Their party has joined the Policing Board and striven to bring a degree of normality to Northern Ireland. If Sinn Fein would do the same, it would not be necessary for the hon. Member for South Down to make the kind of chilling speech that he made, with his customary charm and great moderation, a few minutes ago. As long as it is possible for such chilling speeches to be repeated and echoed, we shall remain a long way from the state that we wish to be in.

I say to the Minister that I hope that the Government, in their legitimate desire to see devolution restored, will not treat with any degree of preference, or perceived preference, a party that does not play by the democratic rules. I hope that they will not seek to rush things, or to impose or over-use the powers of Orders in Council. I hope, above all, that they will not seek, arbitrarily and against the wishes of those who have been democratically elected and who play by the democratic rules, to force a date for an election, as that would be perceived as yet another concession to those who are not prepared to come in.

Those who are not prepared to come in are not here in the Chamber, but I wish that they were. They will be able to read the report of this debate, and I hope that they will do so. I say to them that the door is open for them to come in. If they want a truly peaceful Northern Ireland for their sons, daughters and grandchildren to grow up in, they must take away the system that obliged the hon. Member for South Down to make the speech that he did this afternoon, and they can do that.

Rev. Ian Paisley (North Antrim) (DUP): The Northern Ireland (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill has certainly been well named. The "miscellaneous provisions" seem to be a smokescreen to hide what the Bill is really about. Its main thrust, and the Government's main motivation in introducing it at this time, is to deal with policing and justice under devolution.

The hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) admitted tonight that it is all very well to talk about having Sinn Fein on the Policing Board, and about its members taking part in policing and justice, but there should be no place on the Policing Board for anyone associated with terrorism and with the crime that follows hard on the heels of the terrorist organisations, whether they are the UVF's nominee, who is now on the Policing Board, or not. Of course, if that had happened to be a DUP man, he would have been kicked off. He would not have seen daylight. He would not have been allowed to eat his bread. I myself, even while a Member of this House, was not permitted to enter Downing street for two years. I was looked upon as a leper and was not allowed in through the door. It did not do me any harm—actually, it did me good. But I am used to the knocks of the House. I am a democrat and I believe that, in the end, democracy will win this battle.

There is another thing that I must say, which is that we cannot have in the Government of Northern Ireland those who are still in terrorist organisations, and in fact control, run and dictate those terrorist organisations. I did not lock the door at Stormont. I had nothing to do with it. Who brought down Stormont? The representatives of the Government and the Secretary of State—he brought down the Stormont Administration. They are the people who brought Stormont down. Why did they do it? Because the terrorist activities of Sinn Fein were quite open and people saw what it was doing.

I never voted for the Executive when I was at Stormont—neither did my party and neither did many others—but others voted for them, including the Social Democratic and Labour party. They voted into power those who were active in terrorist work and they sat down with them. They talk about excluding people. It is a terrible thing to be excluded. The Minister got up and said that those people will not be excluded. I hope he gets up now and says that we will not be excluded either.

Let us be very fair about it—we were excluded, but we did not argue about that. In fact, we were referred to as Ministers who should not be allowed to be Ministers, but under the terms of the agreement the law said that we could be Ministers. Still people tried to exclude us, but what good did it do? Did it convert Sinn Fein? Did the leopard change its spots or the Ethiopian his skin? Not likely. They became more and more aggressive, and, even today, Sinn Fein has only one word to say, which is that the Democratic Unionist party is calling the shots and keeping it out of government.

The majority of people in Northern Ireland, whether Protestant or Roman Catholic, do not want terrorists in the Government of Northern Ireland. That is the opinion of the vast majority of people, and the House needs to learn that. We cannot tolerate terrorists in any Government of Northern Ireland. Of course, if the Bill goes through, the Government seem to think that eventually we could have a Sinn Feiner as the head of the police and the head of the Department. They are arguing now that we could have two people involved—this matter of having twos is popular. We could have a Sinn Feiner and someone else in charge of the police.

I wonder when Sinn Fein and the IRA will come with their millions of pounds that they stole from the Northern bank. When will they put that on the table and say, "We are going to finish with our terrorism"? We do not see repentance, and it should be a repentance not to be repented of, but it has not come. Therefore, the Bill looks away into the distant future. It is nothing to do with today, tomorrow, next week or Christmas. Does anybody believe that, with the standing of Sinn Fein today in Northern Ireland, it will give up its violence and its terrorism?

The House, in its wisdom, set up independent commissions. Those independent commissions have met and looked at the situation. They have told in their reports that terrorism is not over. I heard the Secretary of State at the Dispatch Box today telling us it was all settled and all over. It is not all over. The Government's own commissions said that the police had informed them that the IRA still had guns. We were told all the guns were gone, but no one could say that all the guns were gone because no one knew how many guns it had. There was no inventory and no proper challenge.

We wanted something that could be seen and that people could depend on. That did not come about. The clergymen who were involved admitted to my party when they met us that they had been brought to the place not by the British Government—they were not appointed by the British Government—but by the IRA. One of them then said that the IRA never was engaged in violence anyway, such is the credibility of the people who were supposed to verify whether the arms were done away with.

Now we have this Bill. I have sat as a Member of the House for a long time, and I have heard Government after Government—Tory and Labour—say, "We would like to pass legislation, but there is a lack of parliamentary time." How is it that we are getting time tonight for something that cannot and will not be accomplished by passing the Bill? The House can pass as many Bills as it likes. That will not accomplish the doing away with terrorism, nor will it alter the fact that there will not be devolution in Northern Ireland until the terrorists are exiled—put out of business. We need to recognise that.

We are called here to waste our time and to argue about points that are not really in the debating Chamber, because they are not going to be dealt with. SDLP Members are worrying about the election of a First Minister and a Deputy First Minister. They need not worry in any way whatever. They can enjoy 17 March and even drink green beer, because that is not going to come about.

Here we are in the House, which is the signal to the world of democracy, and parliamentary democracy at that. We have been called here by the Government to hear their spokesman going on and on in a long speech, but this is like a canary in a cage: plenty of activity, but no progress. There cannot be progress until the House opens its eyes wide and says, "We cannot have terrorists in the Government of any part of this United Kingdom."

[Rev. Ian Paisley]

When the Government and the House come to do that, there will be a move—a move in the right direction for democracy. I hope it comes sooner rather than later, but I think it will be later—maybe much later, after we have done what we are doing in the House tonight.

7.8 pm

Mr. David Anderson (Blaydon) (Lab): I apologise to Members for having had to leave the Chamber for a short time earlier.

Everyone in the House should welcome the Bill and if there is a real argument here, it is that the Bill is long overdue. The blame for that can be laid at many doors, and we have heard some of that already tonight. We have spent far too many years being involved in the blame game. The time is right to move forward and those who can shift the roadblocks to peace and progress should get on with the job now.

Lembit Öpik: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Anderson: Already?

Lembit Öpik: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman at such an early stage, but I think that he said that the Bill is overdue. Which parts are overdue?

Mr. Anderson: Any part that relates to the impasse that we have been in for the past seven years or to anything that prevents us from moving forward and giving people a sense of control over their own destiny, which they voted for seven years ago.

There is no doubt that the Bill is a challenge to the right hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley)—indeed, the devolution process has been a challenge from day one—but the people of Ireland and their politicians have shown in recent years that they can rise to that challenge when given the opportunity to do so. The fact that at times the process has stalled and, worse, gone into reverse, must not stop us making progress now. This is not just about Northern Ireland. It is about everyone in Great Britain: everyone who wants to see progress, everyone who wants to see peace and security, everyone who wants to see a massive reduction in the number of troops in Northern Ireland, and everyone who wants to see the people of Northern Ireland moving together in a positive and modern manner. The Bill lays the foundations for such progress. There is a long way to go, but it lays those foundations.

Once again, the people of Northern Ireland will be represented by people who are directly accountable to them, with real control over things that really matter to them. Once again education, health, social services and transport will be part of the local remit. Local people and their representatives will control economic development, agriculture and regeneration. Culture, arts, leisure and planning matters will all be the responsibility of an Assembly with real links to the people who matter.

As one who is involved in the whole devolution process in every part of these islands, I believe that this is a real chance for us to deliver what people really want and need. As one who was sadly disappointed when the people of my part of the country rejected devolution, I can only say that I believe the result would have been different there had we been given the range of powers and responsibilities that are once again within the grasp of the people of Northern Ireland. The Bill goes further, however. I have heard what has been said today and I understand all the issues, but if the Assembly agrees and if the people give the Executive the right to proceed, it will be possible to run the police and criminal justice system on the ground in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Wallace: Does the hon. Gentleman think it wise to provide for Martin McGuinness, for example, possibly to be responsible for policing firearms and explosives as a result of the devolution settlement?

Dr. Alasdair McDonnell (Belfast, South) (SDLP): He is an expert.

Mr. Anderson: He may well be. Besides, it is called democracy. If the people decide that Martin McGuinness is the man to do the job, that will be the will of the people. The right to control the police and criminal justice system should be given to the people on the ground. The problems that have been raised so far should be seen as problems, but not as problems that cannot be overcome.

Mr. Hanson: Can my hon. Friend confirm my understanding that again there is a triple lock on the devolution of policing? First, the Assembly must want it; secondly, the Government must support it; and thirdly, the political parties themselves need to take it forward. There will be a vote on the Floor of the House or in Committee. There is a triple lock to ensure that the matter is resolved by all parties in the interests of devolution.

Mr. Anderson: That is what I meant when I said there might be discussions to establish how the devolution of policing would take place. But the principle is that, once all the hoops have been jumped through, the people on the ground will have control. That is what is important, and what our debate is about.

It is clear from the discussions mentioned by the hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack) that the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee's inquiry into organised crime has shown that any improvements in the criminal justice system should be welcomed. It is true that, as Sir Hugh Orde told us recently,

"Northern Ireland is not the 'Wild West'", but organised criminal activity is still far too common, and the police and other bodies involved in the fight to defeat crime must be given all possible support.

There is a clear demand that the House must make unanimously. If any political party is involved in any way with criminal activity, organised, paramilitary or—that curious word—pure, it must cease immediately. If it does not do so, its members should not be recognised as democratic politicians. It is all well and good for the leaders of Sinn Fein to demand the reinstatement of the devolved Assembly, and to insist that failure to reinstate it should result in the withdrawal of Assembly Members' salaries. That party must convince us all that the loss of its members' salaries will not be cushioned by a backhander from the paramilitary branch of the Northern bank. We need deeds as well as words if we can ever hope to move forward. I agree with the right hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) that it is not possible to be a terrorist and a democratic politician at the same time. You must take your pick: you are one or the other.

It is right and proper for us to welcome transparent election processes that will give confidence to all involved. The old concept of "Vote early and vote often" will not wash in the 21st century. It is also right for us to institute legislation that allows people to vote safely, without fear of threat or reprisal. We should therefore welcome a limited use of anonymous registration for those who are genuinely in need of such protection, and we should want to reach, as quickly as possible, a stage at which such safeguards are no longer needed.Other changes to the electoral system, including the process of donations to parties, should also be welcomed. All our people, throughout the country, need to be assured that our political processes are as transparent as possible, and the Bill takes us a long way in that direction.

We hope that the energy market will become more open and produce efficiencies and savings in the cost of energy to people on the ground. I would have loved to stand here and say that we have a nationalised energy market controlled by our country and our people, but sadly that is not the case. Thanks to the efforts of the Conservative party when it was in power, we have a market-based energy system under which people struggle to supply energy. I can see the potential for our lights to go out over the next few days because we have put our faith in the market. However, the market may well work in this context if it allows people throughout Ireland access to cheaper energy supplies than they have had in the past, and that must be welcome.

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury) (Con): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that an action taken by his own party—the creation of the new electricity trading arrangements—further liberalised the market, causing energy prices to fall even more? That was not just due to our good work, but also due to his party's good work.

Mr. Anderson: We can all learn from our mistakes. I have learnt from mine. That is why I am here: otherwise I would still be digging coal to keep the lights on.

Since I came to the House, I have been closely involved in most of the debates on issues involving Northern Ireland. I lobbied hard to become a member of both the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee and the Northern Ireland Grand Committee. I did that because for many years I had worked with people on the ground in Northern Ireland—good, hard-working people who were trying to find a resolution to end years of misery and strife that, as always, hit the least well-off worst. I am talking about public sector workers, great folk, people who were on the front line in every sense, people who really knew what the word "interface" meant.

During many of the debates that we have had over the past 10 months, I have continued to observe and understand the deep-seated feelings that have been expressed today by Members throughout the Chamber. I also understand that we must try to move forward, and the Bill may well constitute a big step in that direction. We cannot pull back at this stage. The Bill removes many legislative barriers to progress. It introduces a more transparent and accountable electoral process; it gives people and politicians the tools with which to do the job; it gives us a chance once again to give direct control of day-to-day life to the people who really matter; it gives us a chance to build on the process that was apparent during the short time in which the Assembly sat during the final days of the last millennium; and it gives us a chance to show the good work that was done when the Assembly reconvened after the suspension in 2000.

One of the things that kept me going throughout the debates when the devolution process broke down was being told by colleagues that, during the time when the Assembly sat, they were amazed at how well people worked across community and cultural barriers. I believe that that was because people were directly accountable. No longer were they dealing with representatives who were remote; their representatives could stand up and speak on their behalf, and affect their lives in a way that had not been possible before. That is the pressure that real accountability puts on politicians. If they are one step removed, they can always blame someone else, but when they have the power, the responsibility and the means to deliver for people, it certainly focuses their minds.

The time has come for us to re-engage with that accountability. We owe it to the people of Northern Ireland and to the people of Great Britain. Any ideological or structural objections need to be sorted out and removed. This is the way forward, and we can move forward by supporting the Bill.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): I listened carefully to the hon. Member for Blaydon (Mr. Anderson) and I have to say that some of his comments about the Bill do not really match the current situation. Passing the Bill will not necessarily have all the consequences for the future of Northern Ireland that he described, and, as many Members have already said, it is a hotch-potch.

It is surreal to be here today debating the enabling framework for the devolution of policing and justice, at a time when devolution of all the other, much less contentious powers is still proving extremely problematic. Not many people in Northern Ireland think that the devolution of policing and justice to politicians in the Northern Ireland Assembly is going to happen any time soon, and nor will anyone in this House who examines the situation realistically and sensibly. People take the view that any devolution that involves Sinn Fein-IRA in the administration of crucial matters such as policing and justice is out of the question.

Mr. Jim Devine (Livingston) (Lab): Is it not fair to say that 20 years ago, the hon. Gentleman would have described Nelson Mandela and the African National Congress in exactly the same terms? However, has not South Africa proved a very good example of learning, working together and forgetting the past?

Mr. Dodds: Others too have tried comparing Northern Ireland to South Africa, but it is not very helpful because such comparisons are not at all accurate. We are talking about people associated with a terrorist organisation that is illegal under the law—people whom the Dublin Government indicated they would not have in their Cabinet in any capacity, let alone in policing and justice capacities. The International Monitoring Commission report pointed out that such organisations are still actively involved in intelligence gathering and criminality. Surely the hon. Gentleman is not seriously suggesting that the people of Northern Ireland would accept for one minute that such organisations should have some involvement in the administration of policing and justice.

The hon. Member for Blaydon said that he regretted the fact that his constituents rejected devolution. One reason that he ventured for such rejection was that insufficient powers were offered, and that, had they been offered the same powers locally that we in Northern Ireland are being offered, they might have grabbed the opportunity. Well, if his constituents had been offered the prospect of gangsters connected with the Mafia and other criminals running the local police force, they might have been even more opposed to devolution than they were when they rejected it.

Mr. David Anderson: The hon. Gentleman will accept that I made it clear that terrorists and criminals should not have a role in the political process.

Mr. Dodds: I accept that entirely, and it was clear from the hon. Gentleman's speech that, although he is a strong advocate of devolution, he recognises that there can be no place in a devolved democratic government for those linked to criminality and gangsterism. I hope that that view is widespread within his party, although some contributions make me doubt whether it is.

I want to discuss devolution of policing and justice, the electoral registration process and political donations. The Secretary of State said in his opening speech that there is still a considerable amount of work to be done on the devolution of policing and justice. That has to be the understatement of the year. As the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) said, there are considerable hurdles still to be overcome, and we have to face reality. It amazes many of us who represent Northern Ireland constituencies that although we are told time and again that slots cannot be found in the parliamentary timetable for consideration of all manner of important legislation, time can be found to debate the devolution of policing and justice. Indeed, we are told that two days will be made available to debate this Bill in Committee on the Floor of the House.

Lady Hermon: I know that the right hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) described the Bill as something of a smokescreen, but will the hon. Gentleman kindly agree with the only Ulster Unionist in the House on one little point—that the beauty of the Bill is that it simply devolves the decision about the devolution of policing and justice to the Assembly? That means that Unionist Members of the Assembly will have a complete veto over any future devolution of policing and justice that might otherwise have been foisted on the Assembly by this Government.

Mr. Dodds: Of course, the triple lock that the Secretary of State referred to means that it is not just the Government who must agree to the devolution of policing and justice; the Assembly must agree to it by a cross-community vote, and the First Minister and Deputy First Minister must initially agree to it before proposing it to the Assembly. I should be grateful if the Minister indicated when he winds up that the latter element of the triple lock is still in his thinking. I am very happy to say to the hon. Lady that I agree that it is absolutely essential that there be a veto in respect of the Assembly's cross-community provisions, but my point is that that hardly requires a Bill at this stage. Neither now nor in the foreseeable future is there any prospect of the Assembly voting for such an eventuality, so we are spending a lot of time debating something that is unlikely to happen, as my right hon. Friend the Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) said earlier.

Mr. Peter Robinson: Does my hon. Friend recall that it was actually the Democratic Unionist party that, during discussions leading up to December 2004, included such a provision in proposals for the comprehensive agreement, despite the fact that the Ulster Unionists—according to their secret document, which they have never published—wanted the devolution of policing and justice to be time-limited, and to have all-Ireland policing of various kinds as well?

Mr. Dodds: My hon. Friend is absolutely right, and this issue, which was fully debated during the election campaign for this House not so long ago, doubtless contributed to the success of our party. We made sure that the devolution of policing and justice could happen only with the agreement of Unionists in Northern Ireland via a cross-community vote in the Assembly.

I agree entirely with the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) on the attitude that Sinn Fein and any party that aspires not just to run policing and justice, but to be in government, must adopt. They must support the forces of law and order and the administration of justice, and demonstrate such support not just by taking seats on the Policing Board or in the district policing partnerships. We must remember that members of Sinn Fein took their places in the Northern Ireland Executive and still went about their criminality—drug dealing, racketeering, intimidation, murder and all the rest—so that they could be in government and undermine everything that good government stands for. Simply taking one's seat on the Policing Board or in a DPP is not sufficient in itself. Sinn Fein have to make it clear that they support policing on the ground in practical ways, and that they are giving a lead in their local communities. Anything short of that disqualifies that party and any other party that takes the same view from being in government and from ruling over people in any democracy.

The recent IMC report—the eighth report—was clear, despite the efforts of some to spin it for their own purposes, about the extent of ongoing criminality and of ongoing intelligence gathering about subversive activity by the Provisional IRA. The Provisional IRA was not alone, because there were references to loyalist organisations and dissidents. We do not wish to gloss over that or set it to one side. We accept that such activity also has to end, but—as has already been made clear—we are talking about the Provisional IRA because Sinn Fein has the political numbers and the votes to enable it to aspire to government. That is why we are concentrating today and in other debates on the role of the Provisional IRA.

From the IMC report, our own sources, the Chief Constable's remarks and other information, there is no doubt that the Provisional republican movement has a long way to travel before anyone can be certain that it has moved to a permanent and irreversible position and foresworn violence and illegal activity for good. As I said in an earlier intervention, as long as it maintains an illegal terrorist organisation, that will be a strong indication to many people that it cannot yet be described as being exclusively committed to peaceful and democratic means. Why would one need an illegal terrorist organisation, even if it is silent, if one were truly and permanently committed to peaceful and democratic methods? That point has been well made, over and over again, by Michael McDowell, the Minister for Justice in the Irish Republic, and by other political parties there.

Our party backs the changes in the Bill to the electoral registration process. The decision to move the registration deadline nearer to polling day—11 working days before—is to be welcomed. It is a positive move and brings us into line with the position in the rest of the United Kingdom. It will also encourage greater voter participation and involvement in elections. Many people in many of the communities that I represent in north Belfast turn their attention to the issue of whether they are on the electoral register only when an election is announced. By then, it is too late, and I hope that the change will help to ensure that people who want to vote and are entitled to vote can do so.

I accept that we need safeguards, one of which is that people who register so late will not be able to apply for a postal or absentee vote. There will be other restrictions, but I make a plea that they should not be too burdensome. If they are, they would negate the change. One of the problems that we had with rolling registration and getting people on to the register after the annual canvass was completed was that some people were called to interview in the electoral office. Some of those interviews were set for the middle of the day when people were at work or had other commitments. They were unable to attend and therefore did not bother to proceed with their application to be registered outside the normal annual canvass. I hope that the Minister will accept that any safeguards should be commensurate with the objective of getting as many people on to the register as possible.

The abolition of the annual canvass will save considerable expenditure and it will also mean less chance of people falling off the register by accident, simply through neglecting to renew their application. Provided the electoral office is given the resources to ensure, through the proper use of databases and so on, that those who should be on the register are on it and those who should not are removed, we should end up with a much more accurate register.

On the issue of political donations, we have no objection in principle to the Bill, which will bring Northern Ireland into line with the rest of the United Kingdom. We accept entirely the concerns that have been voiced by the hon. Member for South Down (Mr. McGrady), and that is one reason why the current provisions will be extended until at least 2010. I am sure that the Minister will confirm that if, come 2010, the parties in Northern Ireland are agreed that intimidation is still an issue, he will look carefully at whether to extend those provisions. That is a matter for the future.

The hon. Gentleman was right about the concerns on this issue, but one thing strikes me as odd. In answer to a question from the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon), he said that it would be paramilitaries linked to political parties in Northern Ireland who would be guilty of intimidation of donors to his party. At the same time as the hon. Gentleman makes that point strongly here today, the leader of his party—and others in his party—call for parties linked to those paramilitaries to take their place in government. Indeed, we are told that we should rush ahead and call the Assembly together in six weeks. No doubt the hon. Gentleman's party would want us to vote into government those same parties with the paramilitary friends who would try to intimidate donors to his party. Sometimes, people need to take a reality check. I have no doubt that what the hon. Gentleman said was right. As the Chairman of the Select Committee said, he is an honourable man, but how can we admit those parties into government? Surely we need to be certain that all the criminal and illegal activity is finished for good.

Mark Durkan: I remind the hon. Gentleman that it was his party that agreed with Sinn Fein and the two Governments in the comprehensive agreement not only to go into government with Sinn Fein but potentially to be in government alone with Sinn Fein, because the exclusion principle would have meant that no other party would have been included. It would essentially have been a voluntary coalition between Sinn Fein and the DUP.

Mr. Dodds: The hon. Gentleman has repeated that line so often that he is beginning to believe it. If he reads the comprehensive agreement, he will find that we made sure, through the provisions that we enunciated and the safeguards that we introduced, that the criminality and paramilitarism had to be over for good. However, his party was prepared to vote terrorists into government at a time when no decommissioning was taking place and criminality was ongoing. That was not even mentioned by his party. He voted for that, so it does not behove him to lecture the DUP on such matters.

We have concerns about political donations that are permissible under Irish law. That opens up the possibility that what is permissible and legal is defined not by debate, discussion and vote in this House and in the other place but by what is decided in Dail Eireann. Laws could be made that apply to parties in Northern Ireland over which we would have no control. The clause that allows that needs careful consideration in Committee. It is far too wide-ranging; it opens up possibilities whereby we are handing over power in this matter to another jurisdiction without any real safeguards at all and without any opportunity to curtail it or to revisit the issue, even within the Bill. That needs to be looked at.

Finally, I allude to the point I raised when the Secretary of State opened this debate: the exemption for foreign donors when they are Irish or Irish corporations. The Secretary of State indicated that it is not just

[Mr. Dodds]

Sinn Fein that will benefit and which had made representations. He said that there were others, but he did not elaborate on that. It would be useful to know who else he was referring to in that regard—

Mark Durkan: Guess.

Mr. Dodds: The hon. Gentleman invites me to guess, so I presume that he invites me to look in his direction on this matter. If he is holding up his hand and admitting guilt in this matter, I think he is rather short-sighted. He is providing cover to Sinn Fein, which will be by far the main beneficiary of this provision. Far from helping his own party, he will disadvantage it vis-à-vis Sinn Fein in the long run. Many people in Northern Ireland regard this as being designed purely and only to benefit republicans and nationalists. It will give them an unfair advantage and should be looked at carefully.

In Committee, we will want to look at many matters, not least that raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) when he mentioned the changes to the institutional arrangements for the working of the Assembly. We might yet have to deal with those arrangements in Committee. It seems bizarre that during this Second Reading we are not able to discuss that matter, but we may spend a considerable amount of time in Committee on provisions that have not been proposed. Nevertheless, we will await developments on that and see what transpires.

7.42 pm

Dr. Alasdair McDonnell (Belfast, South) (SDLP): I wish to confine myself to the miscellaneous aspects of the miscellaneous provisions in the Bill. The slightly more main aspects have been discussed at length. Before I get into the detail of what I want to say, I wish to emphasise to my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, North (Mr. Dodds) that the SDLP has been consistent since Leeds castle and before about the criminal activity of paramilitary organisations; as they moved away from more lethal operations they were diverting their energies into crime and associated matters. The SDLP has no need to apologise to anyone for that.

I shall take a brief look at the all-Ireland energy provisions, the renewable energy provisions and electoral registrations, and I may say a word about political funding. I welcome the parts of the Bill that refer to the all-Ireland energy market and congratulate the Secretary of State on the move towards the creation of a single electricity market for the island of Ireland. That is something that the SDLP has long campaigned for. The Bill acknowledges our argument that we cannot operate efficiently with two small energy markets on a small island. The creation of an all-Ireland electricity market creates better value energy and power through economies of scale and provides security and diversity of supply, making the island of Ireland, north and south, a better place to do business. I compliment the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) who, during his contribution earlier, raised the issue of wider connectivity within the British Isles and to Europe. In modern energy markets we need a minimum market of 10 million to 12 million people and the all-Ireland market needs to be better opened up to Wales and Scotland.

The energy sector in Northern Ireland faces many challenges. We are far too heavily dependent on fossil fuels, and we need to do much more to encourage the development of diversity and more sustainable energy supply. We need to tackle our global warming commitments more sincerely and genuinely through the reduction of carbon emissions. For many years we have been lumbered with—indeed, if I dare use the term, murdered by—badly negotiated contracts for electricity generation. We pay an overcharge of 40 or 50 per cent on the normal market rates. We have that millstone around our necks until 2010, 2012 or 2014 when various guarantees to suppliers come to an end. In recent months, gas and electricity costs have increased substantially throughout these islands, but these price increases are particularly severe in Northern Ireland because they come alongside a draconian 19 per cent. rise in the regional rate and the prospect of water charges. They threaten poverty. Far from poverty being reduced, particularly fuel poverty, we are now faced with an increase, and increased fuel poverty in particular.

While the development in energy markets is welcome, obstacles of many other kinds continue to impede useful, pragmatic and practical north-south co-operation and partnerships, commonsense partnerships that should carry no political burden or baggage whatsoever. It is my understanding that they are as useful and beneficial to those who see themselves as Unionists as to those who see themselves as nationalists. These partnerships are necessary across a wide range of matters. Some of them are minor, others substantial. They include double-charging—particularly roaming telephone charges where people are charged an arm and a leg to make mobile telephone calls over a distance of a mile or two—and taxation anomalies arising from being resident in one jurisdiction and working in another, which create further difficulties. All these matters need to be tackled with a commitment to resolving the problems and removing barriers so that people, goods and services can move throughout the island for the benefit of all.

That is why the SDLP has published detailed proposals, including plans for transport and infrastructure, suggestions of an all-Ireland research alliance, marketing and investment co-operation and a public safety body. We could perhaps go as far as a joined-up anti-poverty strategy across the island. I could go into other issues, but it would unfair of me to drag on now. I have made the point.

In Northern Ireland, we have some of the best renewable energy resources in Europe, yet, according to the Carbon Trust, only 0.2 per cent. of the north's primary energy requirement comes from renewable sources. That is a scandal. The threat of global climate change ensures that we must quickly change the way that we source and use energy. Financial assistance is required. There is some around, but it is not massive and we need to extend it further. There is a desperate need to develop, initiate and innovate around the renewable energy sector on a major scale to ensure that we are not as dependent on fossil fuels and the traditional electricity-based fuels of the past. That would allow Northern Ireland to meet its global commitment by increasing the energy available from renewable sources, reduce carbon emissions, improve air quality and ultimately improve health. While I am pleased to see the commitment to renewable energy, legislation should be in place by now for a sustainable development strategy for Northern Ireland. Such a strategy would have broader implications to ensure that all areas of Government policy would meet the needs of today's society while protecting resources for future generations.

The SDLP welcomes the decision to review arrangements for electoral registration and elections in Northern Ireland. In the past, electoral fraud has been widespread and in some areas it has skewed or affected election results. Proper regulation of the electoral process is crucial to ensure that as many as possible of those eligible to vote are registered, that elections are fair and that the democratic will of the people is reflected as accurately as possible. More than 91 per cent. of those eligible should be registered; I should like the figure to be 97, 98, 99 or even 100 per cent.

In the past, my party has campaigned vigorously for measures to combat electoral fraud and we welcomed the Electoral Fraud (Northern Ireland) Act 2002. We argued that any measure to target fraud must be carefully monitored to ensure that the citizen's right to vote and the need to guard against fraud were upheld. The three elections since the introduction of the Act were cleaner and fairer than those held previously. The requirement for individual registration, with personal identifiers, has significantly tightened the electoral register and closed down the fraud that had been ongoing over many elections.

We welcome the high level of public support for measures to combat electoral fraud. According to recent research, 72 per cent. of people endorsed the changes. However, the SDLP believes that although the proposal to allow some individuals to be registered anonymously because of concerns for their safety is sensible, it should be monitored closely. The Order in Council that will define criteria for qualification for anonymous registration needs to be strict to ensure that it is not open to abuse. The criteria must be robustly applied, so that the process protects only those who are genuinely vulnerable.

Although public support for clearer, cleaner and fairer electoral registration is high, the requirement for people to register annually has led to a decrease in the number of people registering; as I said earlier, research indicates that only 91 per cent. of eligible people make it on to the register. Although we believe that individual registration should continue on the current basis, using identifiers, as the strongest safeguard against fraud, annual registration is not required and we support its relaxation.

The carry forward of people already on the 2004 register was extremely useful, and allowed many people to vote in elections in 2005 who would otherwise have been denied a vote. It was a sensible move that encouraged significantly higher electoral participation.

Withdrawing the annual canvass should enable the electoral office to focus better on groups that tend not to register, especially people living in disadvantaged areas and young people, as well as people who have difficulty in completing forms—of whom there are many more than we realise. That is where resources are needed and can best be put to good use to ensure maximum participation. In the context of the abolition of the annual canvass, the necessary resources must be delivered and allocated to registration.

I am a little worried by the suggestion that a blanket canvass be carried out every 10 years. It should be held every three or four years, or there should be a rotational canvass that covered different areas every year. I am worried that relaxing the requirement would mean a reduction in district or regional electoral offices.

I welcome the proposal for greater data sharing between the chief electoral office and other Departments and public sector bodies. That enhanced sharing of information will ensure greater accuracy and will help in identifying correct addresses and responding quickly. I welcome the proposal for easier registration before an election, but I am concerned that 11 days before polling would not give the electoral office enough time to verify applications properly and could lead to a degree of fraud. A slightly longer period—perhaps 18 days—might be more realistic and responsible, to ensure that only those people genuinely entitled to a vote received one.

I want to address political funding, about which my hon. Friend the Member for South Down (Mr. McGrady) put some well-made points. There is no suggestion that there is a grand orchestrated plan for intimidation. For example, a donation may be demanded of a decent honest person in the public eye—of whom there are many in my constituency—such as a publican, the owner of a small building firm or a small business man or woman; they are not subject to direct intimidation, but a parallel donation can sometimes be demanded for a paramilitary organisation, with the suggestion that it be treated as a business investment. However, if they do not make the donation, their building site or bar can be wrecked or the business can be interfered with or undermined in some way.

My colleagues and I are making a genuine plea for sensitivity about that issue. Our party is the most vulnerable. We have fought and stood our ground for 30 years for sanity, democracy, peace and progress in Northern Ireland. We are extremely vulnerable. We do not want those who stand alongside us in support of democracy to be subjected to threats. We have no objection to lists if they are treated as confidential, but their publication is extremely dangerous and exposes people.

The Chairman of the Select Committee is fully aware of the implications of the investigation that the Committee is undertaking at present. It is not a great leap from the organised crime that we are talking about in the Select Committee to organised pressure and threat in respect of elections.

I thank the House for the opportunity to speak and urge Members to take the electoral and fund-raising provisions seriously. I should like an undertaking that, as my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, North said, we reconsider the provisions in 2007 or 2010 to ensure that people who want to support democracy and donate to a democratic party are allowed to do so without fear of intimidation.

7.57 pm

Mr. Ben Wallace (Lancaster and Wyre) (Con): I understand why the Government have introduced the Bill and I understand their justification that we must maintain the momentum of the peace process so that there is lasting peace, but we must be careful that the momentum does not become a rush. Far too often recently, the Government have used maintaining that momentum as an excuse to overlook some of the failures of parties such as Sinn Fein in the peace process. The Government could implement some of the measures in the Bill quickly, but that may not ensure that justice is done and that the process is thorough. I urge the Minister to take that on board. Momentum is one thing, rush is another.

One of the main issues that has been raised throughout the debate is the devolving of policing and justice, which is important. The background is that following the Patten report, certain elements in Northern Ireland were keen to get their hands on parts of the policing service. We should not kid ourselves: the jewel in the crown for Sinn Fein has always been to try to get hold of elements of special branch and the informer network, which decimated the party and helped to force it to the negotiating table. Sinn Fein constantly pushes for that, but it is extremely important that we protect the men and women who gave information that led to the conviction of many men and women who had committed mass murder.

The Government's solution, and their stated aim, is to remove those elements from the policing service and include them in the security services. One of their justifications for the proposal to remove those people from under the umbrella of the PSNI is that it would reflect uniformity across the United Kingdom. That is not technically correct. Obviously, SO12 in the Metropolitan police is involved in informer and agent handling. The security services have primacy, but they do not necessarily carry out operational actions.

The uniformity argument is also undermined by the fact that on the mainland the two organisations report to two Ministers in the same Government. We could end up with the security services reporting to a UK Minister and the Police Service of Northern Ireland reporting to a Justice Minister in the Northern Ireland Assembly, with conflict between the two lines of responsibility. I am sure that whoever the Justice Minister was, they would like to be informed of security service operations, especially when they entered the realm of police executive action. Therein lies a problem: when would members of the security service want to tell the justice Minister about an operation that involved somebody of their own political persuasion—for example, Sinn Fein?

I urge the Minister to work out the details. One option is, as in the Patten report, to keep the security services in the PSNI, but have them reporting to the Secretary of State. Another option is to consider special provision to allow the security services to have some form of executive power in Northern Ireland. Those are just off-the-cuff suggestions, but these are important details. The strength of the RUC and PSNI special branch was the fact that cases went from intelligence to evidence to conviction in the same organisation. That is one reason those cases were successful.

Mr. Hanson: For the benefit of the hon. Gentleman and the rest of the House, I refer him to the discussion paper that we published on devolving policing and criminal justice in Northern Ireland. It sets out a range of issues about some of the questions that he is raising. We want debate; we want discussion; we want continued engagement on how to proceed in the event of the triple lock of the Assembly, the Government and this House supporting such devolution.

Mr. Wallace: I am grateful to the Minister for his reply, but some of the answers given by the Secretary of State, such as the uniformity argument, could be defeated in debate. We are often in danger of creating two-tier terrorism: there is international terrorism and there is little, local Irish terrorism, with the IRA as a bunch of boyos who throw a few petrol bombs and are very different from al-Qaeda or the Islamic community. The IRA raised funds and entered into arrangements with Mr. Gaddafi. He is now Mr. Blair's friend, but certainly when I was in Northern Ireland he was helping to supply the IRA with weapons. The IRA has international reach—it trained with the Palestine Liberation Organisation and even managed a bird-watching tour to Colombia only a couple of years ago—and it is more sophisticated than some other terrorists.

The idea that we can treat one group of terrorists differently from another is wrong. The Liberal Democrat Front-Bench spokesman was very clear on that. Many of us, including the party of government, have always accepted that a crime is a crime is a crime. It is not a little local difficulty with a terrorist or a prisoner of war; it is a crime. My worry is that in having this fudge, in an attempt to sustain momentum, we set a precedent by creating two tiers of terrorists.

It is very clear that members of the SDLP, for example, are democrats. They have always fought in the hardest environments to uphold the democratic principle. There has been no fudging. Sinn Fein has, on the one hand, entered into democracy and, on the other, spied at Stormont. It will not take ownership of, participate in or even recognise the Northern Ireland Policing Board. That is the crux of the matter: Sinn Fein has, like any other democrat in Northern Ireland, to recognise its duty to policing. We saw Sinn Fein-IRA's idea of justice following the murder in the Short Strand, when in a statement with regard to the murderers it said, "We'll kill them if you want." That is not my type of justice. We should ask them whether they are going to take ownership of this process, which means playing a proper role in the Policing Board.

Not so long ago I attended a dinner with a number of serving police officers and licensed released terrorists—I think that that is probably the right term—including one loyalist and one republican terrorist. The opinions that they expressed are not rare, but I was shocked. I asked one whether he thought that he had done anything wrong in murdering someone and his answer was "No." I asked the other what he felt, and he said, "Well, I have learnt so far in the peace process that violence should not be the first option, only the last." That was a man who was released on licence. We have to understand that that attitude, that violence is always there and always an option, still prevails.

When Sinn Fein takes ownership of policing and says, "No more," and perhaps disbands the IRA, that option will be ruled out, certainly for a long period. I would hope that it would be ruled out for ever, but if one studies Irish history one knows that ceasefires have come and gone, and we had the border campaign before that. That may be why some of us are sometimes cynical about this process, although we wish it well.

The Bill also deals with donations. Again we have a two-tier element, in that one party in the process is treated slightly differently from another. It is interesting that, under Irish law—a 1997 Act amended in 2001—an Irish citizen, even one living in the United States, can donate money to Sinn Fein. In the five years from 1997 to 2002, Friends of Sinn Fein USA donated $1 million to Sinn Fein's coffers. That can happen under Irish law because one has only to be an Irish citizen, an Irish corporate body or an extension of a political party based in Ireland. Friends of Sinn Fein, therefore, is allowed to donate, and under new regulations in Ireland it will not have to declare its donation unless it is part of a political campaign. If it is funding Sinn Fein activities other than those in elections, it does not have to be declared.

If we want a fair democratic process, in both the south and the north of Ireland, we cannot have different rules for different groups of people. I am sure that there are well-intentioned Irish citizens in the south who donate to the Unionist cause; I do not know how many. There was certainly an attempt to march in Dublin recently. The situation seems to favour one group or party, and that unfairness leads to a feeling of injustice that we are all trying to rule out.

It is rather ironic, perhaps, that currently the biggest single donor to Sinn Fein-IRA is Her Majesty's Government, with the fudge on Short money that we saw not so long ago and allowances being given by this House to a party that does not sit in this House. That is perverse. The hon. Member for Blaydon (Mr. Anderson) referred to the ANC under apartheid in South Africa. I am afraid that the South Africans would think us barking mad for giving so much funding to one particular party at this moment.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) and I sat on a Statutory Instrument Committee only six weeks ago discussing the extension of the amnesty for decommissioning. We debated the issue with the Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, the hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Woodward). Rather discourteously, at no stage did he say that, never mind us all having to agree to an amnesty for one more year, this Bill, which I am sure had already been drafted or was in the process of being drafted, would sneak under the wire the extension of the amnesty to 2010.

The Secretary of State referred to the ninth report of the International Monitoring Commission. It says that all in the garden is rosy, but it comes with a health warning that that could change at any moment. If it is all going so well, why do we need a three-year extension? [Interruption.] The Minister of State says from a sedentary position that it is for loyalists. I am sorry, but the loyalists should have the same chance as everyone else. They should be told, "There's your amnesty. There's your chance." Most people have tried to decommission. How many years do they want? Loyalist or nationalist, they should get their chance, and that is it. The fact that we are returning yet again with another concession and another allowance for people who are murders and terrorists just says one thing to me: in the guts of it, what we are seeing is yet again another exception.

Anyone who has spent time in Northern Ireland knows—people need not be born and bred Ulstermen to know—that such injustices reflect in history and build up a head of steam. All that I am trying to achieve in the debate and in my opposition sometimes to the process that we currently face is to show that, if we are not truthful with the people of Northern Ireland and if we are not clear that everyone gets the same rights, we will end up going back all the way to square one. That would be a tragedy.

I find it rather ironic that the policing of firearms and explosives may be handed to a future Minister of Justice, especially as some of the people involved are probably experts, as some hon. Members have said, and certainly may have been sponsored by the makers of Semtex in their time. I hope that we think again—twice. The Minister has said that there is a triple lock. The Assembly must agree, Ministers must agree, and indeed, I believe that the First Minister and Deputy First Minister must agree. All those things are possible, and we must be careful not to oil the lock so much that it slips open with the most gentle pushing.

Too many locks make things more complicated. Why do we not just have a simple lock? Unless people renounce terrorism and violence and disband their terrorist organisations, they should not get to play the game. That is not difficult; three locks or a combination lock are not needed. Why do we not make things more simple and fair to everyone? In Committee and throughout the Bill's proceedings in the House, I shall do my best to ensure that everyone is treated the same in the Bill.

I hope that the Minister will assure us in summing up the debate about those individuals who may transfer from their current policing roles as a result of the changes and say what will happen to their terms and conditions and their status or protection. I hope that we are all treated the same, whether we are members of the United Kingdom or Irish or, indeed, members of Ulster or Northern Ireland. The Bill must uphold that in every aspect of its miscellaneous provisions, of which I agree that there are many.

I agree with the SDLP Members, especially the hon. Member for Foyle (Mark Durkan) in his opening remarks, about anonymity for donations. The reality is that people are intimidated and threatened and their political activities are curtailed. I should like to think that that was not so, but I want the SDLP, not Sinn Fein-IRA, to represent the nationalist cause. That is why I go along with the protections for donors or anyone else in the current regime. We should not forget that the parties must still present their election expenses and their donations—they are just kept confidential—and it is important that any extension may happen in three years time. I will go along with the SDLP's cries for protection because we must live in the real world.

Finally, it is important the Bill should affect everyone in the same way, and it should not contain peculiar exemptions that will lead to an increase, not a decrease, in injustice.

8.13 pm

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East) (DUP): I am delighted to follow the hon. Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Wallace), whose experience in Northern Ireland has brought a valuable insight to the House. On his last remark, it is not even just an issue of the intimidation of those who might be donors to political parties in Northern Ireland—the reality is that Northern Ireland is a very divided society, and as soon as anyone is identified as a supporter of one party or another, that person will automatically lose a large section of their clientele. That is off-putting and it will harm the political parties and democracy in Northern Ireland if people are not encouraged to continue to give to the political parties there.

I can confirm that my party gets money—perhaps not as significant as that received by the SDLP—from people in the Republic of Ireland, but we still believe that all donations should be governed by one piece of legislation. We should not have another jurisdiction dictating the manner in which there will be an announcement or publication of the names of those who have donated to political parties in Northern Ireland. It is vital that that issue is dealt with in Committee.

A number of hon. Members—indeed, probably all who have spoken—have referred to the wide-ranging nature of the provisions in the Bill. It has been described in many ways. It was first a dog's dinner. The dog was then in a manger. I am not quite sure where the dog will end up by the end of the debate. The Bill's provisions clearly range from Dan to Beersheba, but the central issue is policing and justice. That was clearly the most prominent issue that the Government had to deal with, and I should say why. It is also very clear that there is no practical requirement for legislation on policing and justice powers to come before the House at this stage.

I listened with great interest to the hon. Member for Blaydon (Mr. Anderson), who spoke passionately in describing devolution. I found myself nodding in agreement with him as he went through the attributes of devolution. I am a devolutionist. I believe in devolution for Northern Ireland in the right circumstances and at the right time—if it is of the right kind. He spoke of his desire to see devolution in his area. We agree with him on all those matters, but he somehow made a leap that the Bill was in some way necessary to make that stride forward. Of course, it is not.

The Government are putting the cart before the horse with the Bill because policing and justice will not—cannot—be devolved to Northern Ireland under existing United Kingdom legislation. That cannot happen. The existing legislation under the Belfast agreement will not enjoy the support of the majority of the Unionist community. Cross-community support is required for any form of devolution to take place. Therefore, there will be no devolution.

The Government know that they must change the form of devolution to get an Assembly up and running, yet instead of doing what is required first, they have decided to leapfrog that and deal with the policing and justice issue. Why should they do that? What is the imperative that requires the Government to introduce legislation to provide an enabling power on policing and justice to an Assembly that is not sitting and for which the legislation that will allow it to sit is still not in place? The answer is clear—they have been colloguing with Sinn Fein-IRA.

Sinn Fein-IRA required changes in policing and justice matters to give them a cloak for various statements in the past. That is the basis of the legislation, but it will not be required for years to come. Does any hon. Member really believe that, if the Assembly were up and running, anyone would seriously allow policing and justice powers to be devolved to Northern Ireland?

The Minister talked of a triple lock. I suspect that none of those locks will be opened if policing and justice powers are devolved to Northern Ireland. The Government certainly would not consider that the time was appropriate to hand over the responsibility for policing and justice to the Northern Ireland Assembly, particularly if it included those who are still involved in criminality, according to the Government's own watchdog on the matter. The Northern Ireland parties in the Assembly would not vote on a cross-community basis for that to take place; nor would the community in Northern Ireland allow it to happen. Therefore, the three locks that the Government say are in place—I will come back to that issue in a moment—would not be unlocked by the Bill.

We are talking about what could happen years down the road. Even if the Assembly wanted policing and justice powers to be devolved years down the road, I am told quite reliably, by the Minister's officials, that it would probably take about two years before they could devolve them. The practical requirements after the Assembly took the decision would take several years to work through the system—enough time, I should have thought, for even the hard-pressed business managers of this place to find time to have this legislation passed. There is no need to deal with the Bill tonight; there is no practical purpose. It is being done for a political purpose—a purpose that is between the Government and Sinn Fein-IRA.

I said that I would return to the triple lock. It has changed—it is no longer the triple lock that was in the Government's proposals for a comprehensive agreement. I have spoken to the Minister privately about the matter, but I think that it is necessary to put it on the public record. When I met him privately, I accused the Minister of being involved in some mischief, and he assured me that he was not. He assured me that the Government would look at the matter and that it was not their intention to depart in that respect from the proposals for a comprehensive agreement. However, the comprehensive agreement proposals specifically contained another lock, which is not in the Bill.

The proposed comprehensive agreement required any proposal for policing and justice powers to be devolved in Northern Ireland to be made jointly by the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. Why is that such an important proposal? It is because even though the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) rightly recognises the advance in the Bill allowing, in effect, a veto for Unionists under the arrangements, regrettably, a cross-community vote in the Assembly does not require a majority of Unionists to be in favour, because one of the triggers for cross-community voting requires only 40 per cent. of Unionists. I do not question the bona fides of the Ulster Unionist party, but the UUP and the Progressive Unionist party could provide that 40 per cent., so without the consent of the majority of the Unionist community as represented in that Assembly, legislation could be enacted to have policing and justice powers devolved in Northern Ireland. Two of the crucial locks are absent. Cross-community support in the community itself, which is one of the requirements of the proposals for a comprehensive agreement, would not be provided, and the requirement in the comprehensive agreement for the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister to act jointly has been removed. Clearly, such a proposal would not have the support of the largest party in Northern Ireland.

It is vital that that issue is re-examined. The Minister said that there was no mischief intended by the Government, but I think that if it was not intended by the Government, there is someone lurking in the draftsmen's department who intends mischief. The draftsmen are extremely careful when looking at the language of agreements and translating those agreements into legislation. I suspect that it would have been impossible to translate the comprehensive agreement proposals into legislation and simply forget the requirement that the proposal come from the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister. I hope that, when he winds up the debate, the Minister will respond to that issue, which many of us consider to be vital.

The main point is that in the foreseeable future the circumstances will not exist for policing and justice powers to be exercised in Northern Ireland. Let me make it clear: my party is a devolutionist party. It believes in the widest powers possible being devolved, including policing and justice powers. It wants that to be done with the right modality, at the right time and in the right circumstances, and that can only be when the community has confidence that those powers will be properly exercised. The community could never be satisfied that those powers would be exercised properly when those who would be exercising them are involved in paramilitary and criminal activity.

The reality that we have to face up to is that there is a party in Northern Ireland that is still entrenched in violence and criminality. The report of the Independent Monitoring Commission—the Government's own appointed body—indicated that that party is still involved in paramilitary activity, intelligence gathering and criminality at the very highest leadership level and at an organisational level.

I congratulate the Police Service of Northern Ireland and the Garda Siochana on a recent joint effort. Operating on both sides of the border in the sort of security co-operation that we support and encourage, they descended upon a certain individual. I had asked the Assets Recovery Agency when it was going to act against the man, and I have raised his portfolio in the House on several occasions, so I was glad to see the police on both sides of the border take action. The hon. Member for Belfast, West (Mr. Adams), who never presents himself in the House, says that the man in question is just an ordinary decent farmer who is being punished because he is a republican, but I looked at the list of items removed from that farmer's farmyard. He had £200,000 in sterling and euro notes and thousands more in cheques. He had 30,000 cigarettes—he is obviously a heavy smoker. He had 8,000 litres of laundered fuel, although I am not sure in what vehicles he was using it. He also had two firearms—I am quoting what was reported in the newspapers, so the information does not come under the sub judice rules. There were also six oil tankers and a number of laptop computers, which are now being examined by the police. Let me ask hon. Members a question—where do people put their laptop computers? The answer is under bales of hay. Hands up everyone who stores their laptop computer under a bale of hay. I do not suggest that there is anything alarming about the fact that that man's laptop computers were found under a bale of hay, but it must make discovering their contents more worth while.

That is a man who, according to the leader of Sinn Fein-IRA, is an ordinary decent farmer. None of the ordinary decent farmers whom I know keeps that amount of cash on their farm, or would even have that amount of cash to keep. Nor do they have that many cigarettes, that amount of laundered fuel or that number of vehicles—and they certainly do not keep their laptop computers, if they have any, under bales of hay. However, I congratulate the Garda Siochana and the PSNI and I trust that the case—together with several related cases that the ARA and the Criminal Assets Bureau in the Irish Republic are handling—will eventually come through to the courts. Mr. Deputy Speaker, I see you sitting somewhat nervously, waiting to pounce if I go too far, so I shall say no more on that subject.

A number of speakers in the debate said that elements of the comprehensive agreement need to be changed. I speak principally of the leader of the SDLP, the hon. Member for Foyle (Mark Durkan), who becomes very exercised if anyone suggests changing one letter, never mind one word, and certainly not one phrase, sentence or paragraph, of the Belfast agreement. I understand that he has some emotional capital tied up in that agreement. He believes that it is a wonderful document and that, like the law of the Medes and the Persians, it should never be changed. However, the reality is that it failed.

The hon. Gentleman has not come to terms with that—he is still in denial. He does not realise that the core of the agreement that he negotiated had cross-community support as a key requirement. Without cross-community support, his deal cannot work, and the people of Northern Ireland have moved on—he has not, but they have. They have shown that repeatedly at the ballot box, which is where we encourage people to show their feelings on such issues. They have said that they do not support his agreement, and one of the key reasons for that is to do with accountability. Although the proposals for a comprehensive agreement have not been endorsed by my party, many of them flow from proposals that were made by my party and many others were not the choice—certainly not the first choice—of members of my party.

The hon. Gentleman has identified an issue that was not my party's first choice—the way in which the First and the Deputy First Ministers would be elected or appointed. I do not have any misgivings about the issue, although I find it difficult to understand why he is so tender about the election of the First and the Deputy First Ministers. One never talks about rope in the house of the hanged man, and he would be better served if he did not raise the issue of elections, given his party's background.

[Mr. Peter Robinson]

I recall the occasion on which Mo Mowlam, the late Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, came to the Dispatch Box and announced to the House, almost in tears, that the then Member for Newry and Armagh and Deputy First Minister, Seamus Mallon, had resigned. She said that that was dreadful and that he was a good man, and she spoke eloquently about his attributes. At home, the Deputy First Minister's car was taken away, his salary was stopped, and his staff and even his mobile phone were taken away. All the emoluments of office were taken away, but people realised that no one else would be elected to his position because they did not have the necessary cross-community support. They therefore said that he did not resign, even though his resignation was announced in the House, his pay stopped, and he was thrown out of his offices and so on. They decided to overturn everything and make him un-resign. If I were the hon. Member for Foyle, I would not have raised the way in which the First and the Deputy First Ministers are elected, as I would not be on strong ground.

Mark Durkan rose—

Mr. Robinson: The hon. Gentleman may wish to wait a moment before he intervenes, as he may have more to say.

The Secretary of State cannot give the hon. Gentleman an undertaking. I heard an undertaking that the Secretary of State will not implement the piece of the comprehensive agreement whereby effectively the two largest parties—the Democratic Unionist party and Sinn Fein—can determine whether Ministers in fact achieve ministerial office. However, the Secretary of State cannot give such an assurance because of the legislation that was encouraged and supported by the hon. Member for Foyle. The Belfast agreement ensures that there will not be any Ministers in Northern Ireland unless those two parties are satisfied, because they must propose the First and Deputy First Ministers. If they do not do so, for whatever reason, the rest of the process does not take place. I suggest to the hon. Gentleman, therefore, that there is a requirement for change.

The Belfast agreement structure is based on a mandatory requirement for Ministers to be appointed according to their strength, which runs contrary to the voluntary nature of the appointment of the First and Deputy First Ministers. If it is a mandatory system for all the other offices and every other Minister in every other Department, if it is mandatory for the Committee Chairmen and Deputy Chairmen, if it is mandatory for Committee membership and almost everything that the Assembly does, why is it suddenly turned on its head for the appointment of the First and Deputy First Ministers? If it is a mandatory system it should be mandatory throughout. If it is a voluntary system—and I would encourage such a system—it should be voluntary throughout. Regrettably, however, the hon. Gentleman would deny us the opportunity to have a voluntary coalition. Government could be up and running tomorrow if he were willing to move in that direction.

Mark Durkan: The hon. Gentleman has misrepresented the Secretary of State as well as the SDLP. I do not believe that the Secretary of State gave me the assurance that the hon. Gentleman thinks that he did. On the specific provisions in the comprehensive agreement, if the SDLP and the Ulster Unionist party did not vote to show their confidence in Sinn Fein and the DUP members as First and Deputy First Ministers, we would be excluded from office. By contrast, under the Belfast agreement members of the DUP rightly took up ministerial office even while voting against the First and Deputy First Ministers. Sinn Fein members could take up ministerial office while abstaining from the vote on the First and Deputy First Ministers. When those two parties have a chance, however, they change the deal and they deny inclusion on the same basis for anyone else. They have concocted what would be a voluntary coalition between Sinn Fein and the DUP, which would be the only parties in government, because they would vote for themselves.

Mr. Robinson: I am puzzled why anyone who believes in power sharing and an inclusive Government in Northern Ireland should say that they want to be part of that Government while not wanting to show any support for the people who will be First and Deputy First Ministers. That is inconsistent.

Mark Durkan: The hon. Gentleman did so.

Mr. Robinson: Yes, but we were opposed to it. The hon. Gentleman is supporting it. His position is quite inconsistent.

Mark Durkan: We oppose the hon. Gentleman's changes.

Mr. Robinson: Let me make the position clear. When members of my party decided to take up seats in the Executive and operate in silos, as they were entitled to do under the legislation, the hon. Gentleman's party said that we should not be allowed to behave as rogue Ministers—effectively, Ministers in opposition. We proved that we could do so. If we want to make genuine progress in Northern Ireland, we need joined-up government and collective responsibility. To achieve that there must be a level of trust that does not exist at present. The fact that it does not exist is a reality, and the hon. Gentleman knows that the trust necessary to run the Government in Northern Ireland is not there.

I cannot understand why the hon. Gentleman refuses to accept the reality and, together with us, tell the Government to consider a lower level of devolution. We should achieve the highest level possible under prevailing circumstances so that important decisions can be taken in Northern Ireland, progress can be made and trust built. I should have thought that that was in the interests of the whole community in Northern Ireland. The hon. Gentleman's approach is one of all or nothing—I think I offended him at the weekend by referring to it as the SDLP's scorched-earth policy—in which Executive devolution must be up and running, with Sinn Fein in harness, otherwise there will be nothing in return. The reality for the people of Northern Ireland, however, is that no one is pressing my party to go into government with people who are still involved in criminality, as the IMC has indicated is the case with Sinn Fein.

Leaving aside the general tenor of issues relating to policing and justice, some Members have told the Minister of State that it is essential that he deals with the issue of the triple lock in the comprehensive agreement. My party does not intend to divide the House this evening, although there are issues that we want to examine in Committee. If they are not dealt with satisfactorily, we have the option of voting against the Bill on Third Reading. It would be unfortunate, given that this is an important piece of legislation, if the Minister could not carry the main parties with him.

I will touch on some of the issues relating to other provisions in the Bill. First, there is the power that the Secretary of State has given himself to bring forward the date of the next Assembly election. I have some experience in that area because I ended up taking a previous Secretary of State to court over the issue. The case went right through to the House of Lords, where, on the narrowest vote possible—by three to two—a decision was made in the Secretary of State's favour. On reflection, I am probably glad that that was the result and the Secretary of State is probably unhappy that it was, although at the time we both felt very differently about it. The reality is that if the election had been held at that point, we would not have reached the level that we were then at and the outcome might have been different. However, that is all academic because our level of support has increased even from the last election, so the Secretary of State will not get the opportunity to play that one again.

Indeed, it is probably because our level of support has increased since the last election that it is unlikely that the Secretary of State will ever use the provision that he has given himself in the Bill to call an early election. However, if he wants to, my party will be more than happy to get on to the hustings and show that the community still supports our position. It is right that he has the provision. I can envisage circumstances in which it might be better to have an election now and then move on to whatever might be agreed over the months after it has taken place.

The provision is useful but, by and large, the problem with this Government has not been to do with calling elections early, but with putting elections off. On every previous occasion, the Government have come to the House, or taken the power themselves, to call off elections so that the people do not have the opportunity to express their views democratically. For a Minister to come to the House and say, "We want to take the power to give the people of Northern Ireland the opportunity to speak" is something that I would encourage. I hope that, at some stage, he uses it.

I also want to touch on the extension of the decommissioning period in the Bill. I do not think that there has been too much discussion about it, but the realities are as follows. The Loyalist Volunteer Force started the process by decommissioning a very small number of fairly old and not very usable weapons. That was followed by a gesture. Nobody knows the extent of that gesture accurately, although I do know that, after three such gestures by the IRA, one well-known official—who I will not name because I do not like naming officials in the House—indicated that they would be embarrassed to have published the amount of weaponry that had been decommissioned in those three tranches. Indeed, the process that was then under way, whereby the IRA was allowed to have its representatives in government even while it still held on to its weapons, allowed it to use its weapons to buy concessions.

When my party became the largest party in Northern Ireland and spoke on behalf of the Unionist community, one of the first things that it said was, "We can't allow the IRA to continue to have that control. The situation has to be reversed so that it does not get into government until it gives up its weaponry." The substantial amount of weaponry that was decommissioned came about because people were prepared to dig in their heels and say, "To get into this club, you have to pay your membership. You don't become a member and then consider how much you're going to pay."

My right hon. Friend the Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) was pilloried by some on the day when that great decommissioning act took place because he had some misgivings about whether the totality of weapons had been decommissioned. The Independent International Commission on Decommissioning, led by General John de Chastelain, was unequivocal and said that all the weapons had been decommissioned. The IRA said the same and the Government immediately said the same, too. However, it later transpired that intelligence was available on the matter. The Independent Monitoring Commission reported in its eighth report that it had intelligence that indicated that a significant number and variety of weapons—not just handguns—were still in the possession of the Provisional IRA.

The IICD was rushed out to respond and take away the sting from that remark. It said, "Oh well, yes, we have seen that intelligence and as a result of that we have started to investigate." It made the mistake of telling us how it investigated the matter. First, it went to the Garda Siochana, who said, "In our jurisdiction, we have no evidence of that." Obviously, because the Police Service of Northern Ireland and MI5 were providing the intelligence, it was clear that it was coming not from the Garda Siochana's jurisdiction, but from the United Kingdom's jurisdiction. Having received that reply from the Garda Siochana, a further call was made by the IICD. It went to the IRA and—surprise, surprise—guess what the IRA had to say? It said that it had handed over all its weapons and was shocked and irate that anybody would suggest otherwise.

Is it not amazing that the whole basis on which the IICD was able to tell hon. Members and the world at large that all the weapons had been handed over and destroyed was intelligence from the Police Service of Northern Ireland and MI5? They supplied the IICD with the statistics of the weaponry that they believed that the IRA had, which was based on the information that they got from Colonel Gaddafi, when he became our great friend, and informers within the organisation. They believed that they could give an accurate account of the IRA's weaponry in every category. The IICD was prepared to accept that their intelligence was sound, that they were the people to listen to and that, on the basis of what they had provided, all decommissioning had taken place. However, when those self-same people came back and said, "Hold on a minute; they've still got guns," the IICD did not want to believe them.

Anyone in Northern Ireland who thinks about that for a moment will realise that it is more than likely that the IRA still has weapons. Most people will think that no one should ever have said with the clarity and certainty of the Government and the IICD that all the weapons had been decommissioned. From the very beginning, everyone in this party believed that weapons were still held out there. We have been vindicated, and it is still the responsibility of the Government and, for that matter, the IICD to pursue the remaining weapons in the IRA's arsenal.

Of course, the IRA will not admit it, but am I not right in saying that weapons were discovered at a farmhouse—I will go no further than that—in recent days? Is it not true that another search was carried out in the Irish Republic and a weapon was found? Where are those weapons coming from if all the weapons of the Provisional IRA have been decommissioned? It is vital that we continue to press for the full decommissioning of all paramilitary organisations in Northern Ireland.

I have dealt extensively with the republican movement, so let me touch on the loyalist paramilitaries. This party believes that every illegal gun should be destroyed, whether it is held by a loyalist paramilitary organisation or a republican paramilitary organisation. No one in this party will put forward any excuses for any loyalist paramilitary organisation. We believe that they should all decommission. They should all end their paramilitary and criminal activities.

I will bring my speech to a conclusion because several of my colleagues and the hon. Member for North Down wish to speak. I urge the Minister to ensure that we have proper time to deal with all matters in Committee, whether on the Floor of the House or upstairs, especially if the Government intend to introduce, by way of amendment, important provisions to give life to an Assembly in Northern Ireland. I have misgivings about introducing important constitutional measures by way of amendment to a miscellaneous provisions Bill. It does not say too much for Northern Ireland that the way in which it is to be governed is dealt with by a miscellaneous provisions Bill. It would be more proper if separate, custom-made legislation was brought forward for such measures, rather than bringing them in by way of amendment. I urge the Minister to ensure that priority is given to the provisions for an Assembly, rather than provisions on what might happen when an Assembly is under way and running in Northern Ireland.

8.48 pm

Lady Hermon (North Down) (UUP): It is a delight to follow the hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson). I found myself in considerable agreement with much of what he said. That is an unusual event, so I want to put it on record, but there will be differences that will distinguish us later on.

The hon. Gentleman criticised the Bill for being of a miscellaneous nature, but I disagree with him on that point. Even if we have a miscellaneous Bill, it is umpteen times better that we have primary legislation for Northern Ireland instead of a wretched Order in Council. It is absolutely shameful that, during the protracted period of the suspension of the Assembly, the Government have repeatedly used Orders in Council to legislate for 1.7 million decent people who are part of the United Kingdom. It is an unusual novelty—a red letter day—that we are here this evening, discussing primary legislation. It is a welcome change, although unfortunately I do not think it represents a change of policy or a change of mind by the Northern Ireland Office team. Primary legislation is necessary, as the hon. Gentleman pointed out, because the Bill amends so much else of a primary nature.

I concur with the hon. Gentleman's remarks about decommissioning. It is unfortunate that the Secretary of State skimmed over the extension in clause 23 of a period of amnesty from 2007 to 2010. I say that with great bitterness and I know I sound bitter. I am bitter and jaundiced, particularly towards loyalist paramilitaries. I say that because it was those with paramilitary connections who murdered a young constituent of mine, Lisa Dorrian, over a year ago. On 20 February 2005, she disappeared from a caravan site and she has been disappeared ever since. It is a horrible term to use, but it is accurate. Her family do not have a body to bury, they do not have a grave and they have not had a funeral.

Those with loyalist paramilitary connections engender my wrath on account of that case and on account of many of the ghastly murders that they have carried out—for example, Jim Gray last summer, and four other grisly murders throughout the summer as a result of internal feuding. It is not internal housekeeping. It is someone's husband, son or brother. It is contemptible. I say that as criticism of the extension of the amnesty period to 2010. I hope that the Minister will have a quiet word with the Secretary of State some time after the debate and remind the Secretary of State of what he said not that long ago.

On Wednesday 21 September 2005, the Secretary of State—I do not blame the Minister—said:

> "The choice for loyalist paramilitaries is clear: play the political role that you claim as your motive, or face the rigour of the law as the mafia organisations into which you seem to have degenerated. You will not be allowed to terrorise your own community."

Those words were welcome across Northern Ireland. People believed that the Secretary of State meant them. If, as the Government repeatedly tell us, and as the hon. Member for Belfast, East and others have mentioned, referring to the report of de Chastelain's Independent International Commission on Decommissioning, the republican movement has completed such a significant act of decommissioning—I happen to believe it has and I respect the integrity of the Rev. Harold Good, and of Andrew Sens and his colleagues on the commission—if that is accurate, we are looking at the decommissioning of loyalist weaponry.

Why in heaven's name have the Government offered an extension? In light of the Secretary of State's words about loyalists facing the rigour of the law, why are we contemplating an extension of the amnesty period to 2010? As my father would say—metaphorically speaking, of course—"You should keep their feet to the fire." The pressure should remain on loyalist paramilitaries.

Another interesting aspect of this miscellaneous Bill that the Secretary of State did not even mention is the reference to the change in the status of the Chief Constable of the Police Service of Northern Ireland to bring that office into line with chief constables throughout the rest of the United Kingdom. For whatever reason, there has been an anomaly for years.

For example, if a breach of health and safety legislation occurs, all chief constables, except the Chief Constable of what was the Royal Ulster Constabulary and is now the PSNI, are treated as a corporation sole. That treatment is not available to the Chief Constable, who is personally liable if a breach of health and safety legislation occurs and who must appear in court, which takes up a lot of valuable time and effort. That situation has forced the most senior police officer in the PSNI to sit for hours in court. Will the Minister explain why it has taken so long to bring the Chief Constable into line with other chief constables throughout the United Kingdom by treating them as a corporation sole?

Mr. Hanson: When the hon. Lady made that point in a Committee considering another piece of legislation, I made a commitment to introduce this provision. As I said at the time, the situation was the result of an oversight, and I am pleased that she is pleased that we have introduced the provision.

Lady Hermon: The Minister has not explained why the anomaly existed for such a long time.

May I place on the record my gratitude, and that of the family of Lisa Dorrian, to the recently retired assistant chief constable, Sam Kinkaid, who headed a painstaking and extensive investigation into the disappearance and murder of Lisa Dorrian, and did a great deal in difficult circumstances?

The Bill also covers donations to political parties, which other hon. Members have mentioned. I have a particular interest in that matter, because I sit on the Speaker's Committee on the Electoral Commission. Far be it from me to disagree with the hon. Members for South Down (Mr. McGrady), for Belfast, East and for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack), but when the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee recently visited Dublin—it was our first foray overseas, which was interesting—I was particularly struck by the evidence from members of the Garda and of the public, who repeatedly referred to the undermining of the confidence in Sinn Fein of the public in the Republic of Ireland following the Northern bank robbery. The theft of £26.5 million from the Northern bank in Belfast had a significant impact on the public in the Republic of Ireland, in that people suddenly realised that the democratic political process in the Republic of Ireland can be undermined when political parties obtain funding from a variety of sources.

I do not like the private funding of political parties and believe in state funding of political parties. Various hon. Members referred to the intimidation of donors, and intimidation is a criminal offence. In Northern Ireland, there is intimidation and extortion, and windows get broken when someone is told to make a contribution by paramilitaries. When the Chief Constable of the PSNI gave evidence to the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee in public session, he pleaded for people to come together and report efforts by paramilitaries to use intimidation to try achieve their ends.

I am worried about the extension of the period of quietness as regards political parties reporting to the Electoral Commission on political donations. Not only that, but it will be a criminal offence, punishable by up to six months in prison, for a serving or past member, or member of staff, of the Electoral Commission, to disclose any information about a political donation that is reported to them, right up until 2010. This Government have told everyone that they want to be open, transparent and accountable. Indeed, they introduced the Freedom of Information Act 2000. If a serving or past member of the commission gets a request for information under that Act, will it be a criminal offence for them to disclose it? [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson) says that it will. Perhaps the Minister will confirm that when he winds up, if it is to be kept secret for such a long time.

One of the wonders of the Bill is that its long title includes provision to amend the Northern Ireland Act 1998. Given that we are discussing the devolution of policing and justice, perhaps one such amendment could try to get rid of the hideous and immoral procedure of 50:50 recruitment to the police service. It was part of the agreement that I voted for in 1998 that there be equality of opportunity irrespective of political opinion or religious belief, yet the Government legislated to legalise religious discrimination in recruitment to the police, thereby standing the agreement on its head. I am sure that right hon. and hon. Members from parties across Northern Ireland will enjoy tabling amendments for discussion in Committee and on Report. The Bill deals with miscellaneous provisions, so let us use it to amend those parts of the legislation that has been passed in recent years that we loathe and detest.

This is a red letter day not only because we are discussing primary legislation instead of a wretched Order in Council but, for me, because I am one of those who loathe and detest direct rule. That is not a reflection on those who hold the ministerial posts at the present time. The five direct rule Ministers might be nice individuals in their own right but, since every single one of them is a member of the Labour party, which does not organise or field candidates in Northern Ireland, they are completely unaccountable to the people of Northern Ireland. The sooner direct rule is ended and devolution restored, the happier I will be. All that the Bill does is to devolve to the Assembly the decisions that it will make. When, not if, we have an Assembly again, although it certainly will not be tomorrow, it will not be next month, and it may not be next year, I should like to think that the 108 Assembly Members—of whom I am not one, as I am a rare breed indeed: one woman with one job—will be mature enough to seize the opportunity. That requires the Unionist Members of the Legislative Assembly to decide whether devolution of policing and justice is appropriate and timely and whether, for example, members of Sinn Fein, who wish to have seats on the Executive, have ended their criminality and severed all ties with paramilitary activity. Until they do, Unionist MLAs will not agree to devolve policing and justice.

It is therefore a red letter day for extending what can be devolved to the Assembly. I welcome that, but those in Sinn Fein and the republican movement who want policing and justice to be devolved cannot have their cake and eat it. They must join the real world with the rest of us and put all paramilitary activity and criminality behind them. Then we can face the future together. I want that to happen for the next generation, instead of constantly looking over my shoulder.

9.5 pm

Mr. Jeffrey M. Donaldson (Lagan Valley) (DUP): I welcome the opportunity to participate in the debate and to follow the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon). I was interested in her closing remarks because she and I were on different sides of the debate when the matter was discussed in no less a body than the Ulster Unionist Council. When I, sometimes in desperation, tried to persuade the party not to go down the road of sharing power with an organisation and party that engaged in criminality, murder, holding on to illegal weapons and so on, I was sadly in a minority at the time.

I therefore welcome the conversion of the Ulster Unionist Council to a new policy position whereby it agrees with the view that the Government of Northern Ireland cannot include, in any circumstances, a political party that is linked to a terrorist organisation, that continues to engage in crime and violence and that has not completed the decommissioning of its weapons. I am glad that there is now Unionist unity on that. I sincerely welcome it because it is essential for democratic parties to stand together on the matter.

I also welcome the hon. Lady's intention to table an amendment in Committee on 50:50 recruitment to the Police Service of Northern Ireland. I feel strongly about that and many of the hon. Lady's constituents, like mine, will have lost out through that discriminatory recruitment policy. Indeed, one of the hon. Lady's constituents took a case to the High Court in Belfast to challenge the discriminatory policy.

Lembit Öpik: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman remembers our debates here predicting not only resentment but injustice directly resulting from a measure that was intended to do away with injustice and unfairness. Does he agree that the lessons of the recent past suggest that our scepticism about the policy was justified?

Mr. Donaldson: I concur with the hon. Gentleman's comments. Many people recognise with hindsight that many of the policies were wrong. That is to be welcomed. However, I remind the hon. Member for North Down that the former Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone, now Lord Maginnis, first suggested introducing the 50:50 recruitment policy. I was present at the meeting with the Secretary of State when he made the suggestion, much to the surprise of some of his colleagues on the delegation. I note that Lord Maginnis now opposes the policy and that one of his colleagues, Lord Laird, has presented a Bill in the other place to end such discrimination in Northern Ireland. I wish him well with that measure. We will support any amendment to the Northern Ireland (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill to end that discrimination against Protestants in Northern Ireland.

Mark Durkan: The hon. Gentleman needs to recall that 50:50 recruitment was proposed in the context of retaining a significant number of serving police officers. Many people might have taken a different view of the number of serving officers who were to be retained in the PSNI if it were not for the guarantee of 50:50 recruitment of new officers. Does he not also recognise that far more young Protestants are joining the service every year than before the PSNI and 50:50 recruitment were established?

Mr. Donaldson: When I heard the hon. Member for Belfast, South (Dr. McDonnell) say earlier that the SDLP stood for stability, democracy and peace, I turned to one of my hon. Friends and asked what the "L" in SDLP stood for. I suspect that it now stands for "lunacy", because it would have been pure lunacy at the time to pursue a policy that reduced the RUC—now the PSNI—to just a small number of serving officers. The hon. Member for Foyle (Mark Durkan) will know that the police commanders in his own constituency are crying out for more resources to cope with the level of crime in Londonderry, where there are more attacks on young people every week than in most other places in Northern Ireland, and where there are still no-go areas—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. The hon. Gentleman is ranging a little too widely. Could we now get back to debating the specific provisions of the Bill?

Mr. Donaldson: Perhaps I was ranging a little wide of the miscellaneous provisions, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Lembit Öpik: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, while we all want a police service that represents a cross-section of the population, we disagree with the idea that one sort of discrimination—positive discrimination—can get rid of another?

Mr. Donaldson: I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman. It matters not to my constituents whether a police officer is a Protestant, a Roman Catholic or of any other religious persuasion. What matters to them is that, when they need the police, the police are there for them. That is the key to this issue. Without wishing to stray beyond the boundaries of the debate, Madam Deputy Speaker, I would say to the hon. Member for Foyle that reducing the number of police officers is no substitute for recruiting more police officers, regardless of their religion. I welcome the young Roman Catholics who have joined the PSNI, and I hope that they enjoy serving the whole community.

On the question of the date for the Assembly election, I have no difficulty with the Secretary of State taking that power. However, it says a lot about where we have got to in Northern Ireland that Sinn Fein-IRA continue to exercise a veto over political progress. That is wrong. Part of the reason behind that, as my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) said earlier, is that the SDLP in particular has given Sinn Fein that veto because it will not countenance any form of devolution that falls short of full Executive power sharing that includes Sinn Fein. That is highly regrettable and plays against the SDLP's own interests.

The reality is that there is no alternative form of devolution on offer at the moment, even though we have expressed a willingness to consider one. We made it clear in our recent proposals that we are prepared to share power with the SDLP at whatever level it chooses, right up to full Executive level. Our bottom line, however, is that we are not prepared to share power in an Executive with a party that is linked to a criminal terrorist organisation, and that position will not change. The SDLP needs to understand that. Sadly, if this involves an all-or-nothing approach, the result will have to be nothing, for the SDLP and for my party. We will have no devolution if the only devolution on offer to the people of Northern Ireland includes Sinn Fein-IRA in executive positions while the IRA continues to engage in crime and terrorism. I welcome what the hon. Member for North Down said about the UUP's position on this matter. The SDLP should reflect on where we are and look again at the proposals we have made, as we are willing to look at its proposals on devolution.

Like the hon. Lady, I am a devolutionist, and I want the Assembly up and running and functioning properly as soon as possible so that it can address important issues such as education. I am glad that missing from the miscellaneous provisions Bill are the proposals contained in the draft Education (Northern Ireland) Order 2006. Like the hon. Lady, I would like that important matter to be dealt with by primary legislation, but I would rather not have it dealt with by the House at all in its current form, because it will fundamentally undermine our education system in Northern Ireland.

I would like the Assembly to get to grips with the issue of education. I would like us to sit down with SDLP Members and reach a consensus on education reform, as well as dealing with other matters such as the need for investment in our infrastructure.

I welcome the Bill's provision for loans to the Consolidated Fund of Northern Ireland. We made proposals during previous talks with the Government on the need to make more money available to the Northern Ireland Administration for infrastructure investment, which is long overdue. Indeed, there have been recent announcements by the Secretary of State and his colleagues on matters such as education and a massive investment in the infrastructure of education. I hope that he, while on the one hand improving the infrastructure of education, does not, on the other, fundamentally undermine the education system through the education reform order, which I think will do serious damage.

I want briefly to discuss the primacy of the security services in intelligence in Northern Ireland. In an intervention, I asked the Secretary of State whether he shared my concern. In principle, I see the argument in favour of integrating Northern Ireland in the overall United Kingdom intelligence system and we recognise that the threat to this country from international terrorism is as much relevant in Northern Ireland as it is elsewhere in the UK. Indeed, there is evidence that the IRA and other terrorist groups in Northern Ireland have colluded and co-operated with other international terrorist groups, and one cannot rule out the possibility of that happening in future. Nevertheless, I have concerns.

I believe that our security services are already stretched in dealing with the threat from international terrorism and I have not yet heard the Government's proposals for strengthening the security services to take on their new role in Northern Ireland.

I am also concerned about the need for protocols to be put in place to ensure that the security services pass on the intelligence that they gather to the special branch of the PSNI to help it to combat the terrorist threat in Northern Ireland and also, as my hon. Friend the Member for East Antrim (Sammy Wilson) mentioned earlier, pursue the issue of criminal activity.

While my party will not divide the House on this issue, as my right hon. and hon. Friends have said, let me say that that does not mean that there are not issues that concern us in relation to the Bill. We will take the opportunity in Committee to table suitable amendments. We will also watch out for what the Government do. I hope that, if they are to legislate for further changes to the Northern Ireland Act 1998, they do so by way of proper, separate legislation, rather than through an amendment to this Bill, which would be constitutionally inappropriate.

9.19 pm

Sammy Wilson (East Antrim) (DUP): We have had a wide-ranging debate. Indeed, the views expressed have ranged from that of the hon. Member for Blaydon (Mr. Anderson), who believed that the Bill was long overdue, to that of the hon. Member for Foyle (Mark Durkan), who believed that it was a dog's dinner.

Mark Durkan: A dog's breakfast.

Mr. Wilson: Breakfast, was it? Well, I think it is supper now. I think that we are all becoming dog-tired. We have reached a point at which even the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) is so beaten into submission that she agrees with my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) on almost anything, which I think makes history.

I want to discuss two issues. The first is the devolution of policing. There have been long discussions about that—about the reasons behind it, and about whether it is realistic. We know the attitude of representatives of Sinn Fein. The Member for Newry and Armagh (Conor Murphy) and the Member for Belfast, West (Mr. Adams), neither of whom presents himself in the House, have defended criminality along the border, and have howled because the police and the Garda had the temerity to raid farmhouses and seize lorries that had been used to launder fuel. Regardless of whether terrorism is taking place, we must ask whether people with such attitudes to police activity against organised crime are fit to be Ministers responsible for justice or policing, or indeed members of the Policing Board or of local district policing partnerships.

I think that my right hon. Friend the Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) was right: the SDLP and others can—what was the term that he used?—drink green beer. I do not think that he was exhorting them to drink green beer—I hope he was not, for the devil's buttermilk with an Irish tinge is fairly far down the road—but we can see how far we have to go.

The Minister spelt out a couple of the implications of devolution of policing. The first related to security and intelligence. If policing were devolved, it would be inappropriate for national intelligence to be discussed, and for a Minister at devolved level—especially one who might well have the contacts that Sinn Fein has—to have any access to national intelligence that had been gathered. I think that we should divorce the function of national intelligence-gathering from policing in Northern Ireland.

[Mr. Wilson]

Safeguards are needed, though, because of the contacts and links between terrorism and criminality. That issue has been raised time and again. Some of the intelligence gathered on terrorism may well relate to criminal activities. There must be protocols. The police in Northern Ireland must be sure that information will be passed to them indicating that such and such a terrorist, or terrorist group, is involved in criminal activity, so that they can act on that information.

There is also the issue of the ability to gather intelligence. As my hon. Friend the Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson) pointed out, it is not just a case of having the resources; it is a case of having the expertise. A large influx of people into Northern Ireland to gather intelligence might well stick out like a sore thumb. It is therefore important for the police to have an input, and I understand that that will happen.

We heard about the implications of the police finance and the policing precept. I have huge worries about that. It is estimated that within the next two years the Northern Ireland police budget will be in deficit by £70 million, because of the freezing of the amount available. We have also heard of the threat from the Northern Ireland Office that the current number of police officers will be guaranteed only until 2010, after which, if we go down the Patten road, we shall see the end of funding for about 3,200 officers. If the policing precept is seen as a way of filling the gap, that would constitute unjustifiable taxation on the people of Northern Ireland, on top of the various other additional taxes being envisaged, such as water rates, the increase in the regional rate and the handing down of services to local councils that lack finance.

The hon. Member for Belfast, South (Dr. McDonnell) said that co-operation on energy was one form of co-operation to which no one could attribute political connotations—that it was just a question of practical common sense. My hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, East has made it clear that where co-operation benefits people in Northern Ireland—as did the recent security co-operation that led to raids in south Armagh—we support it. If the clause on energy and an all-Ireland energy market is going to ensure security of supply, cheaper supply, a better network and a better market, we have no difficulty with that at all. People in Northern Ireland pay more for electricity than they ought to. It is estimated that since privatisation, each household has paid about £1,200 more for its electricity than it would have paid on tariffs applying to the rest of the United Kingdom. So an all-Ireland energy market could well achieve economies of scale, but we need certain safeguards and assurances from the Minister.

The supply chain in the Irish Republic—the Energy Supply Board—does not have a good record in delivering power. In Northern Ireland, 76 minutes of supply are lost per household per year; in the Irish Republic, 162 minutes are lost. That is because of a problem with the network, and like much in the Celtic tiger, outside the greater Dublin area one finds serious inefficiencies and defects. We have to be sure that funding for the all-Ireland energy market will not be used to address the ESB's inefficiencies, especially in border areas, and that that is not the implication of the all-Ireland electricity market.

If an all-Ireland market is seen simply as a first step to giving us access to a British isles market—the Irish Republic has indicated that it wants links with the English and Welsh grids—we welcome it. Indeed, many who see this as a way of developing north-south links might be a bit disappointed if it led to a British isles link, but of course, such a link makes sense in terms of security of supply and economies of scale. If it is such a first step—as it could, and should, be—we welcome it.

There is much else in the Bill that, as my colleagues have said, we are not happy with and that we will seek to change. That said, I thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker, for allowing me to speak in the debate, even at this late hour.

9.29 pm

Dr. William McCrea (South Antrim) (DUP): The Bill will extend the investigatory powers provided for in the Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005 to Northern Ireland. Actions that aid the work of the Assets Recovery Agency in the Province will certainly be welcomed across the community. People were heartened to hear of the raid last week—in which the ARA and its counterpart in the Irish Republic, the Criminal Assets Bureau, were involved—on a farm, which straddles the border, belonging to a recent IRA chief of staff, Thomas "Slab" Murphy. According to reports in the press, and as my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, East said, hundreds of thousands of pounds in cash and cheques were discovered in a hay shed, as well as laptops and hundreds of files and documents. Law-abiding citizens in the United Kingdom, especially in Northern Ireland, could not understand why those so openly flaunting their lawlessness, from both sides of the divided community, appeared for so long to be the untouchables. They seemed to be treated with kid gloves. Moves against Murphy and the criminal godfathers can only rebuild confidence in the political process and the primacy of law and order.

I was requested to allow the Front Benchers to wind up at 9.30 pm, so I shall not make any further comments. We will listen with interest to the responses to the debate, especially from the Minister, and we look forward to further discussion of the Bill in Committee.

9.31 pm

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury) (Con): It has been a wide-ranging and interesting debate, which was ably—as usual—opened by the Secretary of State. Then we heard from my hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington), who greatly impressed both sides of the House with his assertion that there should be no devolution of policing powers to people who are criminals by night—

Mr. Donaldson: Not just by night.

Mr. Robertson: Indeed, they may not even wait until night. I am sure that the House will endorse my hon. Friend's comments on that point.

The hon. Member for Foyle (Mark Durkan) talked about what is not in the Bill, and he raised one or two important issues. If I may, I suggest that you and your colleagues, Madam Deputy Speaker, have been correct to allow the debate to stray slightly wider to talk about the future role of MI5, because it is relevant. The hon. Gentleman also spoke about possible exclusion from the Assembly, and the Secretary of State assured him that he did not seek to bring that about.

The hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik), with whom I have shared proceedings on so many statutory instruments, asked why the Bill will create so many more statutory instruments. The hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) said how good it was to be debating primary legislation, and that is true, but the downside is that it will lead to many more orders. The Government say that they are intent on getting the Assembly up and running soon, but it is rather contradictory to introduce so many important matters through statutory instrument.

The hon. Member for Montgomeryshire also talked about recording people for electoral purposes and he made a sensible suggestion. There could be an opportunity to send out forms to households, even though it is individuals who are registered, to check that the details were correct. I understand why the system is being changed, and that in Northern Ireland people have to record much more information. However, I discussed the issue in Northern Ireland last week and it appears that people could still slip through the net. The hon. Gentleman made a sensible proposal and perhaps we will discuss it in Committee.

Lembit Öpik: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his words about my observations. Does he recall how often Ministers in proceedings on statutory instruments and Orders in Council accept that they are not a satisfactory way to make progress but say that there are so many only because the Stormont Assembly is not operational? Does he see the political contradiction in agreeing that statutory instruments are not the best way to do things but introducing a Bill that will necessarily increase their number?

Mr. Robertson: Yes, I find it rather odd, which is all I need to say on that point. It does seem to be contradictory.

The hon. Member for South Down (Mr. McGrady) spoke about the difficulty of fund-raising for political purposes in Northern Ireland, which was agreed by most Members who spoke.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack) expressed concern about the Secretary of State having power to set the election date. He was also concerned about devolving police powers while not all parties support the police. That point was also raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury. It is not just a matter of joining police boards; it is about hearts and minds and providing evidence to the police when crimes have taken place. That has not been the case; we are far from that position and it is a concern.

The right hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley), in a typically passionate speech, talked about people connected to terrorism not being allowed to sit on police boards or in government. He said that it is odd to be debating things that will not come about. In other words, we will need the Assembly to be up and running before the devolution of policing. It seems an odd situation for us to be in.

If I am quoting him correctly, the hon. Member for Blaydon (Mr. Anderson) was probably calling for the nationalisation of the energy industry. He is not objecting to my paraphrase of his words. I cannot say that I agree with him on that point. He also strongly made the point that nobody should be a terrorist and a democratic politician. He was very clear that people have to make up their minds. They have to become democratic politicians and give up terrorism for good. He sounded an optimistic note, but I am not sure that it was entirely shared by the House.

The hon. Member for Belfast, North (Mr. Dodds) made a reasonable and wide-ranging speech. He endorsed calls for all parties to support the police and called for people to give up private armies. He questioned the need for them. He also raised an interesting point regarding donations. He said that whether donations coming from the Republic are legal will depend on Irish law, not our own. That seems to be a strange situation, especially when, as I understand it, money could come from America if it comes through the right channels. I do not think that is in the spirit of the laws that have been passed by this Parliament. There is a legal issue there, and possibly a constitutional one, and it needs to be discussed.

The hon. Member for Belfast, South (Dr. McDonnell) welcomed moves towards a bigger energy market and said that he would welcome a British Isles market. He called for an increase in the use of renewable energy. There is a point about the energy market. As I understand it, there will not be one regulator for north and south, but there will still be one regulator in the north and one in the south who will attempt to harmonise regulation. We are not moving towards the full position that we have in Great Britain, where we had new electricity trading arrangements that have since changed to BETTA—the British electricity trading and transition arrangements—and there is an internal competitive market that supplies electricity. We are not moving towards such an arrangement because of the need for transparency in Northern Ireland and because the market, even with the south, will not be big enough. It would be advantageous for people in Northern Ireland and southern Ireland if we had that bigger market and a better trading arrangement. We would then see prices fall, just as they fell in Great Britain when that system was introduced here by the Government. This is a complicated area, and I hope that I have expressed my view on it reasonably clearly.

My hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Wallace) stressed the need to remove violence as an option. He spoke about how some people are talking about it as no longer being a first option, but a final option. That cannot be right either. That is equally wrong.

My hon. Friend also discussed the need to extend the arms amnesty, which the Government say is necessary to take into account paramilitary weapons on the loyalist side. However, we can equally say that there is a need for the amnesty to include the remaining weapons on the republican side; many Members expressed the view that the republican movement has not yet got rid of all its arms.

The hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson), in a long but entertaining speech, covered many issues. One of the most interesting was whether it would be possible to get the devolution of policing through when there was a 40 per cent. Unionist vote in the Assembly. I look forward to the Minister's response.

The hon. Gentleman bravely questioned the basis for the agreement in relation to cross-community support. Obviously, the whole agreement is about bringing people from the different communities together, yet that is one of the things that is holding up the process. When the issue of South Africa was raised, the hon. Member for Belfast, North said that it was not relevant, yet in a sense it is, because for South Africa to move on, people had to stop talking about their particular national identity. Rwanda moved on when people stopped saying that they were members of a particular tribe.

However, in Northern Ireland we have, I regret, institutionalised sectarianism, and 50:50 police recruitment offers an example. Several Members said that they disapproved of that recruitment policy. The hon. Member for North Down referred to the issue and spoke movingly about murders committed by loyalist gangs, which are completely unacceptable. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury, I condemn violence from whichever side it comes. It must end; there is no reason or excuse for it.

The hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson) has been consistent for many years in his opposition to sharing government with people linked to terrorist organisations, but he told us passionately how much he wants the Assembly to be up and running, so that it can deal with many of the issues that are dealt with in the House. He, too, spoke against 50:50 recruitment.

I am concerned about the falling number of police reservists, and about the fact that it seems that they will be replaced by community support officers. The Bill does not include such provisions, but the policy causes great concern in Northern Ireland so the Government may want to address it.

The hon. Member for East Antrim (Sammy Wilson) spoke of the need for safeguards in respect of information gathering when the role of MI5 in Northern Ireland changes. He made the important point that MI5 must be sure to pass on to the police information that the police would regard as helpful. There were reports in the Northern Ireland press recently about one serious occasion when that had not occurred. I do not want to explore that point at this stage, but the issue is real.

The hon. Member for South Antrim (Dr. McCrea) suffered, as I have suffered many times in the House, by speaking right at the end of a long debate. He was able to speak only for about two minutes, so although he is always worth listening to, on this occasion we were not allowed that luxury for very long.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury said, we shall not divide the House tonight, but there are several issues that we want to examine in Committee, and I am glad that some of the Committee stage will be taken on the Floor. We want to consider whether the electoral office changes could be slightly better made. Police and justice devolution is a big issue and we also want to discuss the funding of political parties. I want to explore whether more could be done to help to reduce the cost of energy in Northern Ireland and whether renewable energy can be brought in more quickly, because it is being adopted extremely slowly throughout Great Britain.

We give the Bill a cautious welcome and look forward to further discussion of it, and indeed to the Minister's response to the debate.

9.44 pm

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. David Hanson): I thank hon. Members from all parts of the House for what has been a fascinating and largely good-tempered debate. I have certainly enjoyed listening, and have noted certain issues to do with drinking green beer, with dogs' dinners and with laptops in haystacks, all of which has been fascinating and enjoyable. After seven hours in this Chamber, I find that dogs' dinners and green beer have their attractions.

It is important that we have the consensus that we have today, and I am grateful for the broad welcome given to the Bill by the hon. Members for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) and for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik). I also welcome the assurances from DUP Members that they will not seek to divide the House. Important issues have been raised that I hope to address during my winding-up remarks, but we need to focus on the Bill's core purposes.

Our aim in government has been to equip Northern Ireland to meet the challenges that it will face over the coming years, be they political, social, economic or environmental. The Bill seeks to do so by putting in place frameworks for the devolution of policing and criminal justice and for the regulation of political donations and elections, by securing for Northern Ireland a potential future on issues such as the electricity market and by tackling the question of decommissioning.

As hon. Members have said, and as is clear from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State's introductory remarks, the clear starting point for that has to be the restoration of the Assembly. The hon. Members for Belfast, North (Mr. Dodds) and for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) and others mentioned the fact that the Assembly needs to be restored as a matter of urgency. I fully agree with the comments by the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) on that point. In the event of the Assembly being restored and government returning to its proper place in Northern Ireland, the Bill tackles some key issues.

I recognise the concern expressed by hon. Members from all parts of the House about the provisions enabling the future devolution of policing and criminal justice. A number of points have been made by hon. Members, and it is only fair that I try to answer them today. First, I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Blaydon (Mr. Anderson) for welcoming the Bill. We want devolution of policing and criminal justice to take place at a point in the future when it is appropriate. The proposed arrangements must be robust, must be workable and must continue to deliver an effective, impartial and independent justice system. The Bill does not set out what should be devolved or how it should be done, and I refer all hon. Members to the document on these questions issued by the Government.

Policing and devolution were mentioned by the hon. Members for Aylesbury, for Foyle (Mark Durkan), for Montgomeryshire, for South Down (Mr. McGrady) and for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack), the right hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley), and the hon. Members for Belfast, North, for Lancaster and Wyre (Mr. Wallace) and for East Antrim (Sammy Wilson). Obviously, it is of concern to all the Members who spoke in the debate. We certainly want Sinn Fein to join the Policing Board, and we want to see the devolution of policing, but I hope that I have been able to reassure right hon. and hon. Members throughout the House that the triple lock is in place: first, the Assembly must, on a cross-party vote, wish it; secondly, the Government must propose it; and thirdly, the House of Commons must approve it.

Sir Patrick Cormack: Does the Minister agree that there is no point in Sinn Fein joining the Policing Board, much as we would wish it, unless there is an absolute, total and complete repudiation of criminality by Sinn Fein?

Mr. Hanson: I certainly hope so, and I condemn the acts of criminality that are occurring. We want to ensure that such a development takes place. The Government have said that the arrangements for that devolution must be robust, must be workable and must continue. There is much more work to be done on that. The hon. Member for Aylesbury has pointed to some of the issues that we need to consider.

The hon. Member for Belfast, East mentioned the position of the office of the First Minister and Deputy First Minister in relation to that. It is one aspect of the comprehensive proposals that were mentioned as part of the Assembly motion to devolve policing. I have, in private discussions with the hon. Gentleman, given him assurances on this matter, and we certainly have not forgotten that. We will be considering that during the ongoing discussions with the Northern Ireland parties as part of the devolution of policing.

Mr. Wallace: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Hanson: I will, but I want to make progress on these points.

Mr. Wallace: Is it correct that irrespective of whether, through the triple lock, we devolve policing and justice, it is the Government's intention to move the intelligence framework currently in PSNI into the security service remit?

Mr. Hanson: We have said—this was mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for South Down—that we want national security to be tackled on a United Kingdom basis. Indeed, paragraph 6.15 of the Patten report recommended that "responsibility for policing be devolved to the Northern Ireland Executive as soon as possible, except for matters of national security".

We want to support the Patten recommendations in that respect.

A number of hon. Members have mentioned electoral reform, support for which came from the hon. Members for Belfast, North and for Aylesbury. We are making provision in the Bill for the reforms that were outlined in the consultation paper that we published on 24 January. Those measures were developed in conjunction with the chief electoral officer for Northern Ireland and the aim is to increase the number of members of Northern Ireland society who are able to vote, so that we can ensure that we increase turnout and participation in elections.

Specifically, as hon. Members have mentioned, those measures will lift the burden of the annual canvass, and I am pleased that that has been welcomed generally. The hon. Member for Montgomeryshire mentioned the fact that that will be done by Order in Council. Yes, it will certainly be done by Order in Council, but I very much hope that the clauses that deal with that matter will be taken on the Floor of the House. We want to replicate the effect of clause 10 of the Electoral Administration Bill, while taking into account the different registration and anti-fraud measures in Northern Ireland.

Lembit Öpik: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Hanson: I cannot give way, because I must complete the point. [Interruption.] I hope that it will be; we will have to discuss those matters later. [Interruption.] These matters will be discussed by the usual channels, as the hon. Gentleman will know.

The chief electoral officer's independence has been mentioned. The proposal will bring the chief electoral officer into line with other modern approaches and modern terms and conditions of appointment. Again, I hope that that will reassure the hon. Gentleman.

Donations to political parties were mentioned in some detail. That part of the Bill makes provision for the reforms outlined in the Government's response to the consultation paper on 24 January. We have been clear that we want to ensure that the regulation of donations to political parties in Northern Ireland is effective and to bring Northern Ireland into line with the rest of the United Kingdom. However, there are significant changes that, I hope, hon. Members welcome.

The hon. Members for Montgomeryshire, for Belfast, South (Dr. McDonnell) and for South Staffordshire and my hon. Friend the Member for South Down mentioned the transitional period and the need to tackle intimidation and donor intimidation. We have put in place partial transparency, whereby the report will be put to the Electoral Commission for the period up to 2007, for the very reason that we want to ensure that there is the possibility that individuals lack intimidation. That will also give parties the chance to let the new arrangements bed in before we move to full transparency.

As was mentioned by several hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire, we are in discussion with the Irish Government about their arrangements in the Republic of Ireland and how they impact on our own arrangements. Indeed, that matter was covered at the recent British-Irish governmental conference in London. I hope that those matters will be resolved to positive effect in due course.

The hon. Member for North Down mentioned the Freedom of Information Act 2000, and I hope that I can assure her that that Act will not override any prohibition on the disclosure of information in the Bill. Section 44 of the 2000 Act will exempt information from disclosure if that is prohibited by another Act, and I hope that that covers the points that have been raised.

[Mr. Hanson]

date of the Assembly election was mentioned by the hon. Members for South Staffordshire, for Belfast, East and for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson). My right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland have made it clear very strongly that 2006 is decisive in the process of restoring the Assembly in Northern Ireland. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I, along with Irish colleagues, are engaged in intensive discussions with the political parties about how we can make progress, with a view to an early restoration of the Assembly. We hope that progress will be made soon, and in the context of early progress, an early election could be needed. The Bill contains provision to enable an Assembly election to take place earlier than May 2007 if required. I am glad that hon. Members welcome the potential for that to happen. The relevant clauses will be taken on the Floor of the House. The order could be taken in Committee, unless the usual channels wish it to be considered elsewhere.

The extent of the amnesty period for arms decommissioning was mentioned by the hon. Members for Lancaster and Wyre, for Belfast, East and for North Down. As far as the Government are concerned, Provisional IRA decommissioning is on track. That is debateable, I know, and reports are forthcoming on the subject, but the provision in the Bill is focused on loyalist weapons. I concur with the hon. Lady and others that loyalist paramilitary activity must be condemned and that murder is murder. Loyalist weapons are out there and it is essential that we make provision for them. I condemn the use of those weapons and I hope that we will not need to invoke the procedure in the Bill—I hope that action will be taken much earlier—but while those weapons remain we need to make provision to allow further time for decommissioning. In addition, dissident groups such as Continuity IRA and Real IRA may be able to avail themselves of the provision.

The strand amendments were mentioned by the hon. Members for Belfast, East, for Foyle and for Belfast, North. In the past couple of months we have had serious discussions about strand issues and I have had two meetings in Belfast with colleagues from all parties. My right hon. Friends the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister and others do not rule out amending the legislation, and I take the points made about having specific legislation. We are considering all those matters and we shall discuss them further with all the parties. We have to consider what would be a suitable vehicle for legislation. Our view has always been that if there is an opportunity to legislate through an amendment or a separate Bill, we shall take it, and if there is agreement, we will take advantage of it. However, we need to consider those matters in some detail for the future.

I am pleased that the prospects for Northern Ireland's economy have been mentioned, because I do not want us to lose sight of those aspects of the Bill. Several of the Bill's provisions underline the Government's commitment to securing the future of Northern Ireland. The single wholesale electricity market was mentioned by the hon. Members for Belfast, South and for East Antrim and welcomed by the Conservative Front-Bench spokesmen. The creation of a single wholesale electricity market is a long-standing aim of both Governments and has been a prominent feature of recent British-Irish intergovernmental conferences. We want that market to be established for the pragmatic reasons that all hon. Members understand: it will help the mutual economy of north and south and bring social benefits in future. The business community and the Confederation of British Industry want it to work, and so do the Government.

The Bill contains strong measures on energy. The hon. Members for Belfast, South and for East Antrim welcomed the fact that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has established a £59 million package of support in an environment and renewable energy fund to enhance and accelerate renewable development and deployment in Northern Ireland. The Bill includes provision to amend existing legislation to provide financial assistance for energy purposes and give a massive boost to renewable energy in Northern Ireland.

The Government's commitments to increase borrowing capacity, which was mentioned by the hon. Member for Lagan Valley, are extremely important, because whatever else happens, Northern Ireland needs to compete on the global stage. The single electricity market, increasing expenditure on renewables and ensuring that we have the ability to support Northern Ireland's economy will be crucial in future.

I welcome the commitment to the Chief Constable's sole corporation.

There are many miscellaneous provisions in the Bill, which is a positive measure for Northern Ireland. It is a good Bill that will help planning for Northern Ireland's future, and I commend it to the House.

Proceedings in Standing Committee

7. Proceedings in the Standing Committee shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion on Thursday 27th April 2006.

8. The Standing Committee shall have leave to sit twice on the first day on which it meets.

Proceedings after Committee

9. When the provisions of the Bill considered respectively by the Committee of the whole House and by the Standing Committee have been reported to the House, the Bill shall be proceeded with as if it had been reported as a whole from the Standing Committee.

Consideration and Third Reading

10. Proceedings on consideration shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion one hour before the moment of interruption on the day on which those proceedings are commenced.

11. Proceedings on Third Reading shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion at the moment of interruption on that day.

12. Standing Order No. 83B (Programming committees) shall not apply to proceedings on consideration and Third Reading.

Other proceedings

13. Any other proceedings on the Bill (including any proceedings on consideration of Lords Amendments or on any further messages from the Lords) may be programmed.—[Mr. Coaker]

Question agreed to.

NORTHERN IRELAND (MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS) BILL [MONEY]

Queen's recommendation having been signified—

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 52(1)(a) (Money resolutions and ways and means resolutions in connection with Bills).

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Northern Ireland (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill, it is expedient to authorise—

(1) the payment out of money provided by Parliament of any increase attributable to the Act in the sums payable by virtue of any other Act out of money provided by Parliament,

(2) the payment out of the Consolidated Fund of any increase attributable to the Act in the sums payable by virtue of any other Act out of that Fund,

(3) the payment out of the National Loans Fund of any increase attributable to the Act in the sums payable by virtue of any other Act out of that Fund, and

(4) the payment of sums into the National Loans Fund.—[Mr. Coaker.]

Question agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 15 (Exempted business).

That at this day's sitting, proceedings on the Lords Message relating to the Identity Cards Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Coaker.]

Question agreed to.

Identity Cards Bill

Lords Reasons for insisting on certain of their amendments to which the Commons have disagreed, considered.

Clause 5

APPLICATIONS RELATING TO ENTRIES IN REGISTER

Lords amendment: No. 16.

10 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Charles Clarke): I beg to move, That this House insists on its disagreement with the Lords in the said amendment.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): With this it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendment No. 22, the Government motion to insist on disagreements thereto and amendment (a) in lieu.

Mr. Clarke: Amendment (a) is largely technical and clarifies clause 5 by adding the words "or be accompanied by" after the requirement for an application for a designated document to include an application to be entered on the register. This is the second time in four weeks that these amendments have returned to the House for consideration, so I hope that I do not need to spend long making the case to reject them yet again. The issue has already been debated, voted on and approved twice by the House. A similar amendment was defeated on Report on 18 October last year by a majority of 32. In our consideration of Lords amendments on 13 February, it was rejected by a majority of 31.

We have always made it clear that the identity cards scheme has been designed as a compulsory scheme for all United Kingdom residents and is eventually intended to become such a scheme. In the second phase of the scheme, it will be a requirement to register and there will be a civil financial penalty regime to tackle failure to do so. We have made it clear, too, that linking identity cards to designated documents is a central part of the first phase of the scheme, allowing a sensible phased introduction of identity cards. Once passports and residence permits are designated, as British nationals resident in the United Kingdom renew or apply for passports, and as foreign nationals renew or apply for residence permits, those individuals will be entered on the national identity register and issued with ID cards.

Each designation order under clause 4 will need to be approved by both Houses of Parliament under the affirmative resolution procedure. The amendments proposed by the other place would make registration and an identity card optional extras for anyone applying for a designated document. Last week, we began to phase in the issue of e-passports incorporating a facial image biometric—the first generation biometric passport. Once we move to the next phase—biometric passports including a facial image and fingerprint biometrics—anyone applying for a passport must go through exactly the same application process as they would for an identity card, and their personal details and biometrics will be recorded on a central passport database. The data is being collected in any case when people renew their passport. Merging the two processes will add the statutory safeguards provided by the Bill, such as the creation of a national identity scheme commissioner, to the passport data. The Bill will therefore provide more safeguards for people who renew their passports, but the Lords amendment would remove those safeguards.

Mr. Neil Gerrard (Walthamstow) (Lab): I would be grateful if my right hon. Friend clarified an issue relating to the renewal of passports. The Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, my hon. Friend the Member for Leigh (Andy Burnham) said that there was an element of choice, however small, about whether to have a passport. He said, too, that all passport holders could choose when they renewed their passport and could do so at any time. The UK Passport Service website, however, suggests that it is only possible to do so if a passport is full, has expired, or will do so in the next nine months. Which statement is correct? If the website is at fault, can it be corrected?

Mr. Clarke: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving me the chance to clarify that point. My understanding is that an individual can renew their passport at any time. If there is an error on the UK Passport Service website, I will deal with that immediately.

Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): The Home Secretary will know that many people have no objection to the idea of signing up to an international agreement to have a new form of passport with the necessary biometric and other details. However, is the implication of the Government's insistence on the linkage that there will be a new precondition for any British citizen who wants to have a British passport—that they will also have to accept an identity card? Does that not change the basis on which we were entitled to passports in the past? They were always in theory discretionary, but given to people if there was no very good reason for not doing so.

Mr. Clarke: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman is correct. What we are saying is very clear and in accordance with the Labour party's election manifesto, which stated:

"We will introduce ID cards, including biometric data like fingerprints, backed up by a national register and rolling out initially on a voluntary basis as people renew their passports."

Passports are voluntary documents—[Laughter.] Well, of course they are. No one is forced to renew a passport if they choose not to do so. That will remain the case once we begin issuing identity cards alongside passports. Election manifestos cannot possibly deal with every detail of an existing policy, but it is clear to me that, in saying very explicitly that the roll-out would initially be on a voluntary basis, the manifesto refers to what has always been the Government's position, as Members on both sides of the House who have considered the matter carefully should acknowledge. That position is that the scheme will initially be based on a stand-alone identity card, issued on its own on a voluntary basis, or together with a document such as a passport, which is also issued on a voluntary basis. That seems to be clear and unequivocal.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Will the Home Secretary tell the House what proportion of the 60 million residents of the United Kingdom do not hold, or are not included on, a UK passport? For them, this really would be optional.

Mr. Clarke: I am speaking off the cuff, but I think that the figure is about 20 per cent.

David Davis (Haltemprice and Howden) (Con): It is 15 per cent.

Mr. Clarke: I will take the intervention from the right hon. Gentleman and say 15 per cent. The point is that a significant proportion of people do not choose to have a passport, for a variety of different reasons. In my opinion, that simply reinforces my point.

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills) (Con): Will the Home Secretary give way?

Mr. Clarke: No, I will not.

Later this year, we plan to start to interview all adult first-time passport applicants to confirm their identity at a network of 69 new UK Passport Service local offices. That will require a personal visit, just as will be the case when people enrol biometrics for an identity card.

Mr. Shepherd: Will the Home Secretary give way?

Mr. Clarke: No, I will not.

The structure that I have described indicates that there are four common-sense reasons for rejecting the amendments from the other place: costs, benefits, convenience and security. First, on costs, we want the identity card scheme to provide the greatest benefits at the lowest cost to the taxpayer. The Lords amendments would increase the cost of establishing the scheme because of the greater complexity of handling an optional service that would mean that some people could opt out of having an identity card when obtaining a passport. Moreover, uncertainty would affect the unit cost and thus the fee level for identity cards. That is a serious point. Cost is a factor that has been raised across the House and the Lords amendments make the issue more, rather than less, difficult to resolve.

Secondly, there would be an impact on the benefits of the identity card scheme. Reducing the speed of the roll-out of ID cards would slow down the wider benefits such as combating illegal immigration or improving the effectiveness of public services. Thirdly, there would be inconvenience to the public if the Lords amendments were passed. It does not make sense to issue a biometric passport without the accompanying identity card. The process of enrolling biometrics and checking identity for both documents will be virtually identical. The same data will be held in both cases. Fourthly, there is the question of security. We would directly be offering an open goal to fraudsters, criminals and immigration offenders if we said that they could simply choose to avoid being included in the national identity register when they applied for a passport or an immigration document.

Mr. Clarke: I will not give way.

The amendments have been fully debated during the passage of two Bills in both this place and the other place. The House has made its position very clear on a number of occasions. We should send the amendments back to another place with the message that it is now time for their lordships to accept that the Bill should pass without further amendment. The case is clear for the House to insist again on its disagreement with Lords amendments Nos. 16 and 22 and to agree Government amendment (a) in lieu.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): On the face of it, this is just another Committee stage debate about the inclusion of the word "may" or the word "must" in clauses 5 and 8, or the words of Government amendment (a). Despite the guillotine, this short debate is about a lot more than that. The amendments are not, as the Home Secretary says, technical. One would have to be deaf or stupid to accede to the arguments advanced by him tonight.

We all know the Home Secretary is neither deaf nor stupid, but for the life of us we cannot understand what the Government are attempting to do, yet again, by riding roughshod over common sense and justice. We are discussing the relationship between the citizen and the state, and whether it is right for the Government to change that relationship fundamentally by requiring the citizen to do what the state says he must do for its convenience, rather than his. This part of the Bill and the debate that we are having fully describes the difference between, on the one hand, me, my party and our supporters tonight and the Members of the other place whose amendments we are seeking to sustain, and on the other hand, the Government.

Through the Bill, the Government have revealed their true colours and motives more clearly tonight than they may have realised: "Do as we say, not as we do." What do they do? Let us have a look, as the Home Secretary invited us to do. I know that he is not deaf or stupid, so we will take him back to his own manifesto, to which he glibly referred us this evening. It is worth repeating, and it is a document that he will no doubt enjoy hearing. It states:

> "We will introduce ID cards, including biometric data like fingerprints, backed up by a national register and rolling out initially on a voluntary basis as people renew their passports."

The words are plain and their meaning is obvious. I doubt that anybody, even the Home Secretary, is confused by what the Government intended that the public should understand before the general election in 2005.

It is clear beyond doubt that the Government know that their case is flawed and that Baroness Scotland in the other place and the Home Secretary and his Ministers in the House know that they are dangling on a flimsy thread of argument, yet they still seem to enjoy the twisting in the wind that we observe. Why else did they agree to introduce compulsion only following further primary legislation for that 15 or 20 per cent. of the British public who do not have a passport? They did it because they were complying with their own manifesto. They knew what "voluntary" means, but now they pretend it means something else.

This is not about the Salisbury convention or about a proper balance between this House and the other. It is about a Government who are guilty of intellectual dishonesty on a grand scale and who do not have the decency or the common sense to understand that, admittedly unusually, the public have read their manifesto and taken them at their word.

We recently had the derisory spectacle of the Secretary of State for Health throwing the Labour party's manifesto commitment on smoking in public places into the ashtray. Clearly, manifestos are relied on only when it suits the occasion, but it is surely better to have half an eye on the wording if they want to rely on it.

Simon Hughes: Has the hon. and learned Gentleman been able to discover a single example of any occasion during or immediately after the general election when the Home Secretary gave the explanation that he gave to the House tonight? Does the hon. and learned Gentleman agree that the new interpretation has arisen only since, as he said, the suggestion of primary legislation to do with compulsory ID cards?

Mr. Garnier: Trying to extract from the Government's words any coherent intellectual basis for the case that they are now making is extremely difficult. The Government have changed their reasons for supporting not only identity cards, but the national identity register, and they change their position on what they mean by "voluntary" and what they think they mean by "compulsory" day by day.

10.15 pm

As the Home Secretary undoubtedly had reported to him, because he is neither deaf nor stupid, the Minister for Immigration, Citizenship and Nationality said in Committee that the Government accept that their arguments in support of identity cards and the national identity register as a bulwark against terrorism are flawed. He also said that they accept that their arguments in support of identity cards and the national identity scheme as a bulwark against general crime, immigration breaches and other matters are all flawed. As each defence has been removed from them, they have returned to the argument that they will find ID cards "more convenient".

Mr. William Cash (Stone) (Con): Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that this is an extremely good example of what Lord Hailsham once described as "an elective dictatorship"?

Mr. Garnier: It is but one example, and we have had several since 1997.

On 13 February, the Government agreed that compulsory registration on the national identity register and the identity card scheme for the 20 per cent. of the population who do not have passports should require new legislation. Did they think that the remaining 80 per cent. of the population would not notice that attempt at compulsion by stealth? Unless one voluntarily applies to renew one's passport, one will face a financial penalty.

All the information set out in schedule 1 to the Identity Cards Bill must be spewed up into the Government's great bucket of information. Some 40 million British citizens are being told that to be compelled to do something at the Government's convenience—they will have to go through a processing centre; individually, they will probably have to pay a lot more than £30 directly; and collectively they will have to pay millions indirectly—is a voluntary process.

Look at what the Government are now proposing and compare it with the words of the Home Secretary just a moment ago, when he read out his own manifesto:

"We will introduce ID cards, including biometric data like fingerprints, backed up by a national register and rolling out initially on a voluntary basis as people renew their passports."

I know that the Government do not like hearing their own words, which allow the public to appreciate precisely what they mean, but they will hear them again and again until they realise that their arguments are flawed and that the public are no deafer and no more stupid than the Home Secretary.

The Government have said that identity cards will defeat terrorism, welfare fraud, general crime, immigration breaches and identity fraud. They have said that it is vital to introduce identity cards and the national identity register to deal with all those problems. If that were the magic of this great scheme, they would not "let it roll out" over the next 10 years; they would have introduced it yesterday or the day before.

The Government have stopped believing in anything that they say, and even if they keep saying it, they know that it will not produce the results that they claim. There is no urgency in their programme—assertion has followed assertion, but they know that that will not do. They have resorted to an argument based on public convenience and a deliberately misleading reliance on an international obligation to introduce biometric passports. Many Labour Members realise that the argument in relation to biometric passports is utterly flawed, because it is simply not a proper comparison. As the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Lynne Jones) mentioned on 13 February, biometric passports will contain perhaps three biometrics, not 13. There is no obligation under our international treaties to make the passport a gateway to the national identity register.

The Government will not tell us what further documents are to constitute that gateway. One of the 61 powers that the Bill gives the Home Secretary to make law by statutory instruments allows him to create a list of designated documents. So far, the Government admit that it includes passports, residence documents and other forms of travel documents—but what are those other documents, and where is the list? They have not a clue, and it shows every time they argue for the Bill and against the Lords amendments.

What will this exercise cost? Again, the Government have not a clue, and it shows. [Laughter.] It is interesting that they seem to think that this attempt fundamentally to change the relationship between citizen and state is a matter of risibility. The problem that they face is that they no longer have any understanding of the public, any understanding of what they are in business for, or any understanding of what this House is for. The longer they go on sniggering, the longer the public will find their arguments increasingly unattractive. Will this resistance to the Lords amendments make the national identity register and the identity cards scheme fit for purpose, to use a favourite phrase? They have not a clue, and the history of this legislation shows it. Do they know if and when, or how, these proposals will adversely affect the individual? They have not a clue, and if they do, they do not care.

Parliament should protect the citizen against the overbearing Executive. That is our duty, and tonight it should also be our pleasure. We are not here for the convenience of this arrogant Government. Let us hold firm for liberty and common sense. I urge the House to support the Lords amendments.

Mr. Nick Clegg (Sheffield, Hallam) (LD): The "Oxford English Dictionary" gives the following definition of "voluntary":

"done, given, or acting of one's own free will".

This debate is not only about the fate of a Bill that will introduce one of the most expensive, illiberal follies in recent times—it is also about our specific disagreement on the meaning of that one word.

The Labour party's manifesto at the last election was refreshingly—some would say uncharacteristically—clear on the introduction of identity cards. ID cards would, the manifesto said—it bears repetition—be rolled out "initially on a voluntary basis as people renew their passports".

Liberal Democrat Members take that to mean simply what it says—that when renewing their passports, individuals will be able to choose, of their own free will, whether they wish to receive ID cards as well. Yet by way of a painful linguistic contortion that the Home Affairs Committee has rightly condemned as stretching

"the English language to breaking point", the Government now seek to persuade us that "voluntary" actually means "compulsory". In rejecting Lords amendment No. 16, the Government are saying that every time someone renews their passport, they must receive an ID card; that every time someone applies for a new passport to pop across to Calais, visit relatives abroad or go on holiday to sunnier climates, they must receive an ID card; and that every time someone goes abroad for business with a new passport, they must receive an ID card.

About 80 per cent. of all Britons possess a passport and are likely to wish to renew it in the coming years. How can the Government seriously ask us to believe that a scheme that could compel up to 80 per cent. of the British population to possess ID cards is voluntary? That is possible only if we all suspend our shared understanding of the English language. A Government who specialise in stealth taxation now want to start on stealth compulsion. A Government who have built their reputation on spin are now reaching new heights of doublespeak.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): The Government pray in aid the fact that people are free not to travel, but I do not think that many people who voted at the last election believed that the Government seriously meant that they had to stay at home and not leave this country if they did not want an ID card.

Mr. Clegg: My hon. Friend makes a compelling point. The problem is compounded by the fact that the Home Secretary has told us that any move to fully fledged compulsion will be made through primary legislation. We are being asked to accept that gratefully as a significant concession. What possible purpose will be served by primary legislation to make the possession of identity cards compulsory if they have, to all intents and purposes, already been made compulsory for the vast majority of the population? Legislating badly is one thing. Legislating for something that the Government have already imposed surreptitiously on the British people is at best a waste of parliamentary time and at worst downright cynical.

There are many good reasons for not making such a flawed Bill compulsory. It is based on the flimsiest costings. Only last week, the London School of Economics estimated that the Government would rack up a deficit of £1.8 billion in 10 years unless they significantly raised the fees for identity cards and new biometric passports. The Government's guesstimate—it is no more than that—of a fee of £93 for the combined card and passport already appears entirely implausible.

The central database for ID cards will be far more powerful than any other equivalent ID database used elsewhere in Europe. Experience in the United Kingdom suggests that initial use will soon be expanded. When ID cards were introduced as a wartime measure in 1939, they had three stated purposes: conscription, national security and rationing. By 1950, an audit found that that had expanded to 39 stated purposes. The inevitable creeping expansion of the information held on individuals by the state will unalterably change the relationship between citizen and Government in this country.

The Bill is based on flimsy costings, does not have a clear purpose and now rests on a fictional use of the English language. Such a measure is bad enough. It should not now be foisted on the British people through the back door. I urge hon. Members to support the Lords amendment.

Mr. Shepherd: Both Opposition Front Benchers have made much of altering the relationship between the citizen and the state. They are right. One of the most curious aspects of the measure, which is being foisted on the British public, is its link to the royal prerogative. The Home Secretary exercises the royal prerogative in issuing passports. He is the determinant of that.

I am therefore puzzled that the Home Secretary uses something that is in the gift of the royal prerogative—whether we have passports is down to the Government, not to any right in legislation—and links it to this appalling Bill, which diminishes the liberties of the House and our people exponentially. He will not even take questions properly to try to advise us about why he finds the royal prerogative the right means for directing the new Labour concept that each one of us should be numbered, identified and subservient to the state. It is a perverse proposition, which reduces us greatly. Passports should not be the route whereby he forces on the British people something that appeared in the Labour party manifesto as a voluntary opportunity.

The House should stand with the House of Lords and reject this miserable Government's proposals.

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal) (Con): I am not opposed to the concept of identity cards but I oppose the misuse of the English language. I am surprised that my relatively close neighbour, the Home Secretary, is trying to argue what he knows will, in parliamentary language, not be accepted by most people as being close to the truth.

Anyone who read the Labour party manifesto believed that the Government proposed that identity cards would, at least initially, be introduced voluntarily. The Home Secretary now suggests that, somehow or other, getting a passport is a voluntary concept. A passport is a right. It is what the Government give us to say who we are when we wish to pass ports to go to other countries. We have a right to have it and no Home Secretary should deny it to us unless there is a genuine reason of state for his doing that. To tell us that we cannot have a passport unless we are prepared to pay extra for something that we do not want is not to suggest that we have a voluntary choice. It is, in any language except parliamentary language, untruthful to suggest that. I say to the Home Secretary very directly: no one outside this House believes you. No one thinks that what you say, as a translation of the Labour party manifesto, is what anyone else ever thought, and those on the Benches behind you do not believe it either, because they are honourable men who understand what the English language says—[Interruption.] Well, there is one lady there who does believe you, but most do not.

10.30 pm

If this country moves from a position in which to hold a passport is our right, we shall move to a position that Britain has never been in before. I do not have a passport because I want one; I have one because it is my right to have one, should I require it. For the Government to say that I cannot have a passport unless I comply with their proposal also to have an identity card is to make that compulsory. When I next apply for a passport, I shall want an identity card because I am in favour of them in principle. So of course I shall ask for one. However, those who do not wish to have one should not be forced to have one. That is the difference between voluntary and compulsory.

Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak) (Lab): The right hon. Gentleman says that he is in favour of identity cards, but is he in favour of the people who apply for passports subsidising the identity card scheme so that he can have a cheaper identity card?

Mr. Gummer: That question is so unimportant compared with the central philosophical issue with which we are dealing that I am not going to answer the hon. Lady.

I want simply to say to the Home Secretary that he must consider very seriously how he is going to get the British people to believe him about anything else after he has explained away the words in the Labour party manifesto to mean something that no sane person could possibly believe they meant at the time. In those circumstances, he stands condemned both as Home Secretary and as a Member of Parliament.

Stewart Hosie (Dundee, East) (SNP): There are two constantly repeated assertions with regard to the compulsory ID card system. The first is that the

[Stewart Hosie]

Government planned all along to deliver a compulsory ID card scheme from the start. The second is that this ID card scheme is required in order for the Government to meet their international obligations. I should like briefly to question those assertions.

The Swedish Government have introduced their new biometric passport, which complies with the International Civil Aviation Organisation's recommendations on biometrics and machine-readable travel documents. It has digitised facial images of the holder stored on a microchip on the card, so there is no requirement for a central database. Fingerprints will be added at the appropriate time by February 2008. The passport also complies with the United States visa waiver programme requirements. So the argument that we need a compulsory identity card, let alone a central biometric register, is plainly wrong.

We could have done as the Swedish Government have done, and introduced a basic biometric passport with the inclusion of fingerprints at the appropriate time by February 2008 or, in line with the Labour manifesto pledge, introduced a genuinely voluntary biometric ID card in conjunction with the new passport. The Home Secretary suggested earlier that the collection of the necessary information would have been one and the same in either case. This could all have been done on a similar basis to the Swedish model, with the biometric information held on the card rather than on a central database, with all the costs and dangers implicit in that.

There is no obligation under any international treaty or domestic manifesto pledge to issue a compulsory biometric ID card. There is absolutely no requirement to roll out from day one what is effectively a compulsory ID card through the issuing of a passport under the false insistence, or disguise, that it is voluntary, and then to do so compulsorily for any number of spurious reasons in future—not least the fraudulent pretext that £1.7 billion will be saved, mainly in the private sector. That is a falsehood; it was not rebutted properly in the last debate. It would be wrong to introduce the compulsory ID card and the national biometric database on that justification.

I want to speak briefly on the Government's manifesto pledge, which others have spoken about:

"We will introduce ID cards, including biometric data like fingerprints, backed up by a national register and rolling out initially on a voluntary basis as people renew their passports."

This is not voluntary; it is effective compulsion. As the manifesto expressly stated that it would happen on a voluntary basis, the Lords' disagreement does not violate the Salisbury convention, as it says precisely that the passport option means that people are not voluntarily joining the ID card scheme. To all intents and purposes, this is wholly compulsory. On that basis, my hon. Friends and I shall support the Lords amendment.

Mr. Cash: This is compulsion—there is no doubt about it. The hon. Member for Dundee, East (Stewart Hosie) has made that perfectly clear, as have others from our Front Bench. I am extremely glad that our own side has adopted the position of truculent opposition to these proposals in the House of Lords, and tribute should be paid to those in the House of Lords for the great work they have done on the Bill.

When the Bill started out on Second Reading, some of us were perhaps more truculent than others on the subject, but the fact remains that we have arrived at a sensible attack on the Bill, which the Home Secretary has completely failed either to deflect or to deter. The real problem is the votes that the Labour party will muster in the Lobby, which is why reference was made earlier to an elective dictatorship.

This is not just some minor matter; this is about the liberty of the subject. As I pointed out on Second Reading at the beginning of these proceedings some months ago, it is reminiscent of the state that George Orwell predicted in his book "1984". It is all very well the Home Secretary shaking his head, but the plain fact is that the case is made that this is compulsion. He tries to wriggle out of it, but he fails. He has been completely outdone by the report from the London School of Economics, those in industry who have commented on this, and the non-governmental organisations.

The reality is that these proposals are iniquitous, unacceptable and a serious infringement of the liberty of the individual. They should be consigned to the dustbin.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale) (Con): The Home Secretary knows that I have the highest regard for him—[Interruption.] Come on, we have had many exchanges in the House and I have the highest regard for him, but he would admit that this is not one of his finest hours.

I came to the House willing to be persuaded by the Home Secretary's argument, but I have been not only unpersuaded, but more persuaded by the argument of my hon. Friends that we should support the Lords in their amendments.

The fact of the matter is, as those of us who have been Members a long time know, that the best debates in the House always take place after 10 o'clock. They are the best attended, and people listen to the argument and speak their mind. I want to speak my mind on something that no other hon. Member has mentioned—that is, the cost of this charade to our constituents. For the average family, the cost of obtaining a passport—which, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) said, is a right—will be increased.

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Lords amendment will increase the cost.

Mr. Greenway: No, the Government's proposal will increase the cost. This is disproportionate. Before we vote on the issue, we should consider the Labour party's manifesto carefully, although there is compulsion—be in no doubt about that. Whether someone has a passport is not a voluntary matter, as 85 or 90 per cent. of our constituents need a passport. We have a right to have passports.

The cost of what the Government are doing to our constituents with this Bill is something that we should reject. I urge the House to agree to the Lords amendments. Let Labour Members vote as their hearts and minds tell them to vote and reject the Government's amendment. Let us deal with this matter now.

Simon Hughes: I support my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Clegg) and the view that the Liberal Democrats have taken consistently for many years.

There may be disagreement on quite how freedom to travel should be defined. I share the view that there is a freedom to travel. It is a European Union freedom, certainly. There may not be a right to have a passport historically, for the reasons given by the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) and, as was pointed out by the hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd), it was always a question of the royal prerogative, and the Foreign Secretary would sign the inside of the passport. However, there is no doubt that there was a common understanding that people would be able to travel if they needed to.

The Home Secretary has come here tonight to say to the elderly relative who is told that his or her child is ill in another country, "This is a matter of free choice, but you must have an identity card if you want to visit a relative who is very ill." The Home Secretary has come to the House to say to a business person, "If you want to do business and fly the flag for Britain, you must have an identity card as a condition of your choice to go and sell our products abroad." The Home Secretary is saying to the civil servant who is told that he must go and do work for our country abroad, "You must also have an identity card." That is not freedom of choice in the conventional sense of the term, and the Home Secretary can never persuade us that it is.

Furthermore, the argument is clearly disingenuous. Originally, a supplementary part of the Bill provided for a piece of secondary legislation to be passed by both Houses before compulsion took over from the voluntary system. Then we were told that we would have a different Bill—because this Bill did not provide for compulsion, compulsion would be dealt with separately. Only now, at this last stage, are we being told that under this system there will now compulsion if people want passports.

Finally, there is a constitutional point that I want to make to the Home Secretary. He has come here seeking to persuade us that the House of Lords should not be followed. The Government may have a majority of Members in this place, but it has a lower share of the vote than any majority Government since 1832. It has no justification for complaining that the House at the other end of the corridor should not do its job and ensure that Government proposals that were not in the manifesto are stopped by the British Parliament. The House at the other end of the corridor is the creation of this Government: it is put there by this Government; it is nominated by this Government; it is bought, in part, by this Government. The House at the other end of the corridor is entirely a new Labour creation. The Government have a cheek to come here and tell us that, with their minimal moral and political authority, they must ask the House of Lords to reject a view that the House of Commons has passed, and insert another view.

On these Benches we stand by principle, we stand by practice, we stand by precedent, we stand by democracy, and we stand for the right of Parliament as a whole to do its job as a whole and to throw out this Bill as a whole, if that is the view that the other House holds to. We encourage the other House to hold to it because the other House is right. The Home Secretary can persuade no one tonight that he is right. He is flawed, fundamentally wrong, and trying to deceive us—but we are not buying any of it.

Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central) (Lab): There is a perfectly logical case for compulsory identity cards. If one believes, as the Home Secretary does, that they really will deliver something very important in the fight against terrorism, fraud or impersonation, of course we should have a universal card, and a universal card is only possible if it is compulsory. However, that is not what our manifesto says. It says that there should be a voluntary scheme, and that there will not be a universal scheme for many years. At present, there are no overt Government plans for such a scheme, and it will be rolled out very slowly. Therefore, the benefits that can only accrue from an ID card scheme will not happen until it is a wholly universal scheme. The whole enterprise is deeply logically flawed.

10.45 pm

The Home Secretary has got himself into an appalling semantic tangle. If he is trying to persuade not only this House but the public that the word "must" means "voluntary" and that the opposite is the case, and that what he is suggesting is not what the Lords are suggesting, then he has got himself—as I have in this sentence—into a terrible logical tangle. If we believe in a voluntary scheme, as the Home Secretary and the manifesto say that we do, there is no way that we can reject the Lords amendments. The Lords make it very clear that the scheme is voluntary, not compulsory. By rejecting the amendments, the Government will be opting for compulsion. They should have the courage of their convictions and say that this will be a compulsory universal scheme, but the Home Secretary will not do that. If he is going to nail his flag to the mast of a voluntary scheme, the Lords amendment must be supported.

Mr. Charles Clarke: I was not going to respond to this debate, but—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. The right hon. Gentleman requires the leave of the House to respond.

Mr. Clarke: With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I should like to respond to this debate. I had not intended to, but the use of the word "deceit" by the hon. Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes) provokes me to do so directly. Let me be very clear about the process. The first consultation document that this Government issued on an identity card scheme, in 2002, canvassed the option of a universal scheme linked to passports. When we announced the decision, in principle, in November 2003 to introduce ID cards, it was made clear then that there would be a two-stage scheme. It was stated that the second stage would be compulsory—that it would apply to every UK resident—with a civil financial penalty for failing to register and to obtain an ID card when required.

[Mr. Clarke]

It was also made clear in November 2003 that during the initial stage, as well as introducing a voluntary plain ID card for those who do not have a passport, the intention was to link the issue of ID cards to that of more secure passports. That is why we stated the following in Cmd 6020, in November 2003:

"By linking the card scheme to widely held identity documents most people will get a card conveniently and automatically as they renew an existing document".

That announcement in principle was put into effect when the Government published the draft Identity Cards Bill in April 2004, with a provision in clause 5(2) requiring an applicant for any designated document to register and to be issued with an ID card alongside the designated document. We were again very clear that in the first stage of the ID card scheme there should be no possibility of obtaining a designated document such as a passport without an ID card. The provision requiring applicants for passports or other designated documents to obtain an ID card was also included in the first Identity Cards Bill, introduced before the election, which was passed by the House of Commons in February 2005 and given a Second Reading in the Lords in March 2005.

Mr. Garnier: Will the Home Secretary give way?

Mr. Clarke: No, I shall not.

After the election, the Bill was reintroduced and, yet again, we made it absolutely clear that once a document such as a passport has been designated, obtaining one would also mean being issued with an ID card. Nobody can claim, as the hon. Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey claimed, that our policy has not been entirely consistent on this point from 2002 right the way through. Moreover, no one can claim that in the many debates, in this House and in the other place, there has not been the fullest opportunity to debate these issues fully at every turn.

Mr. Garnier: Even if one accepts the history of the Home Secretary's argument, what does he mean by "on a voluntary basis"? What does that mean, in English?

Mr. Clarke: I have set that out clearly in what I have said, but I shall say it again if the hon. and learned Gentleman wants me to do so. The question, as the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Clegg) said, is one of free will. Those are the words he used in his definition. That is the free will that people may exercise in deciding whether or not they wish to have a passport—[Interruption.] That is the free will over what they can do and how they can operate. That is what the wording means.

As I said, I wanted to respond to the points made by the hon. Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey. I hope that the House will now reject the Lords amendments and that we can vote to establish the will of the elected House on this question.

Question put, That this House insists on its disagreement with the Lords in their amendments Nos. 16 and 22, but proposes amendment (a) in lieu:—

The House proceeded to a Division.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I ask the Serjeant at Arms to investigate the delay in the Aye Lobby.

The House having divided: Ayes 310, Noes 277.

Division No. 186] [10.50 pm

PETITIONS

Barnhaven Care Home

11.10 pm

Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton) (Con): This is the second petition in a month that I have presented to the House on the closure of a Devon county council residential home for the elderly.

The petition states:

To the honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland in Parliament assembled,

The Humble Petition of Robin Barwell and staff, residents, carers and supports of Barnhaven Residential Care Home, Bampton, Devon, Sheweth that the decision by Devon County Council to close Barnhaven is opposed by the petitioners.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your Honourable House will note that there is strong local support for both keeping Barnhaven open as a care home and expanding the services it could provide to support older people in the community, and urge the Government, in the light of the recent White Paper "Our health, our care, our say", to help our group of committed volunteers to put the aims of the White Paper into action in Bampton.

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, &c.

To lie upon the Table.

Southend Cancer Centre

11.12 pm

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): South Essex MPs join together tonight to show how important it is to defend our cancer centre at Southend hospital. I pay tribute to those excellent people who signed our petitions—they are stars who care about their community—and to the local press for getting behind the "hands off our cancer centre" campaign in the very best traditions of local journalism.

The petition states:

We pay tribute to all who work in the Southend Hospital Cancer Centre, believe it does wonderful and very caring work and achieves excellent outcomes. We wish to see this valuable facility retained locally to serve local people and believe that removing it will not provide cost savings or a better service for local people or better outcomes. We note the efforts of the local press and local MPs in successfully fighting for the centre some years ago and welcome the new efforts of the local press and MPs in working together to retain the centre now.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons call upon the Government to accept the views of local people and retain the cancer centre at Southend hospital and to give it full support in the future.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

11.14 pm

James Duddridge (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): With parliamentary colleagues, I present this petition, which includes more than 2,500 signatures from my constituency, on the evening of the end of the consultation to merge the South Essex cancer network, to which the petitioners are vehemently opposed.

The petition states:

The Petition of the residents of South Essex and others states,

We pay tribute to all who work in the Southend Hospital Cancer Centre, believe it does wonderful and very caring work and achieves excellent outcomes. We wish to see this valuable facility retained locally to serve local people and believe that removing it will not provide cost savings or a better service for local people or better outcomes. We note the efforts of the local press and local MPs in successfully fighting for the centre some years ago and welcome the new efforts of the local press and MPs in working together to retain the centre now.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons call upon the Government to accept the views of local people and retain the cancer centre at Southend hospital and to give it full support in the future.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

11.15 pm

Mr. David Amess (Southend, West) (Con): I have the honour to present a petition that has been signed by a great many of my constituents who regard Southend hospital cancer centre as a centre of excellence and who will resist any efforts to change the present arrangements for treating patients who suffer from cancer.

The petition states:

To the House of Commons,

The Petition of the residents of South Essex and others states,

We pay tribute to all who work in the Southend Hospital Cancer Centre, believe it does wonderful and very caring work and achieves excellent outcomes. We wish to see this valuable facility retained locally to serve local people and believe that removing it will not provide cost savings or a better service for local people or better outcomes. And the Petitioners remain, etc.

Green Belt

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): I rise to defend the green belt and the quality of life of my constituents. We are under increasing threat from land grabbers who want to take the green heart of our community and develop—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I let it go the first time, but the hon. Gentleman must not make a speech. He must stick to the terms of the petition.

Bob Spink: Thank you for your guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The Petition states:

To the House of Commons.

The Petition of the residents of Thundersley and others,

The Petition of people living in and around Thundersley, Castle Point declares that we the residents of Thundersley and surrounding areas are concerned about the loss of green belt land to development, particularly in the area of Burches Road, and we believe Castle Point is already overdeveloped for the infrastructure that exists.

The Petitioners therefore call on the House of Commons to urge the Government to impress upon Castle Point Borough Council to reject any development in this area, as requested by the Member of Parliament. And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Bus Services

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): I presented a petition in similar terms in defence of the No. 12 bus service from Tarpots to Benfleet. This is a brand new petition from a different group of people.

The petition states:

To the House of Commons.

The Petition of the residents of Benfleet and others,

Declares that the Petitioners wish to formally object to the removal by First Essex Buses Limited of the No. 12 bus service from Tarpots in Benfleet to Pitsea because there is no alternative service and the removal will cause great inconvenience and hardship to those residents who rely solely on public transport, and that this loss is unacceptable and particularly hurts vulnerable and elderly people in our community.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons call upon the Government to urge the Bus Company to maintain the No. 12 service and to take such action as is necessary to enable First Essex Buses to maintain such an important yet marginal bus services.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Pensioner Travel (Tyne and Wear)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Alan Campbell]

11.18 pm

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East and Wallsend) (Lab): Truly it is said that no good deed goes unpunished. A year ago, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced in the Budget statement that there would be free bus travel for pensioners. The announcement was widely welcomed and the Treasury allocated some £350 million—a sum of money that covers the cost of the policy. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister chose to distribute that money in such a way that some authorities got more than they needed to implement the policy and 32 authorities were short-changed. In cash terms, by far the greatest losers are the five district councils in Tyne and Wear, with a shortfall of £5.4 million. The problem arises because Ministers chose to use a general formula to distribute a grant that was designed for a specific purpose. There are two related issues that I would like to raise—pensioner travel on the Tyne and Wear metro and pensioner bus travel between Tyne and Wear and the neighbouring counties of Durham and Northumberland.

As soon as the problem became clear, strenuous efforts were made to achieve a solution. There have been discussions between officials from Nexus, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and the Department for Transport. There have been two meetings between the Minister for Local Government and local Members of Parliament, and there has been some progress. A small adjustment has already been made to the distribution formula in Tyne and Wear's favour. Separately, the Secretary of State for Transport has given Nexus £1.7 million to deal with the potential loss of income for the metro, which Nexus owns, if pensioner bus travel is free but metro travel is not. I wish to place on record my gratitude for the part that the Secretary of State for Transport has played in trying to resolve that issue. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] My hon. Friends are obviously grateful as well.

Two problems remain. Despite the free pensioner bus travel within counties it is now more expensive for pensioners to travel from Durham to Sunderland or Newcastle. The half-fare scheme covered the cost of the whole journey, but free travel only takes them to the county boundary. After that, they must pay the full fare for travel. Far worse—and this is at the heart of the issues that I wish to raise tonight—Nexus faces a £5.4 million shortfall. The authority must set a budget, and it must tell the five district councils what that budget is. There is little room for further delay.

Mr. Fraser Kemp (Houghton and Washington, East) (Lab): On the shortfall and the way in which Nexus has handled it, does my right hon. Friend agree that while we must try to find a solution in the final few days, it is imperative that we find a fair funding formula so that Tyne and Wear does not face this problem every year? Those reserves cannot be spent again. They have been spent this time, but they will not be available in future. We need to resolve the problem this year, but we must make sure that we do not face it again in future.

Mr. Brown: My hon. Friend is quite right. The Nexus budget for the financial year must cover the shortfall; the authority has no choice. Nexus has set a provisional budget, which is a combination of fare increases and cuts in secure services. As my hon. Friend has suggested, it is drawing down its reserves to cover half the shortfall. It can only do so once, as those reserves will not be available for drawing down again. We need a solution to this year's problem, and a permanent solution for future years.

Students who will be hit by the fare rise think that it is unfair. They are right to hold that view, as Nexus did not intend to introduce a fare rise until the budget shortfall became clear. Pensioners and organisations that represent them are upset too, as pensioners do not want their free travel to be paid for by service cuts and fare rises for others. That point has been made clear to me, and I am quite certain that it has been made to my right hon. and hon. Friends who represent the county. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Minister for the part that he has played in trying to find a solution. Talks are continuing, but I fear that they are doing so in the same way that a fairground roundabout continues in motion—it goes round and round, but it does not go anywhere.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland) secured on the Floor of the House a promise of a meeting with the Prime Minister. If there is not some real progress, my hon. Friends and I will very soon insist on that meeting. We want our money, and I for one will not give up until we have secured justice for our constituents.

Mr. David Clelland (Tyne Bridge) (Lab): I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East and Wallsend (Mr. Brown) on securing an Adjournment debate on such an important subject. As he intimated, I have taken a great deal of interest in the matter from the beginning. Like him, I have received representations from pensioners in Tyne and Wear who, for the first time in my 20 years' experience as a Member of Parliament, have said to me that they reject something that the Government have offered: free transport. They do not want free transport at the expense of transport for young people and others who currently receive concessions. Additionally, they do not want free transport at the expense of services, which will also be on the cards unless the problem is resolved.

My right hon. Friend referred to a possible long-term solution and reminded the House that the matter was initially raised by the Chancellor in last year's Budget. When the Chancellor announced the scheme, it was widely welcomed, not least by those of us in Tyne and Wear who had concessionary fares, but welcomed the idea of free fares for pensioners. However, we did not anticipate such an unintended outcome.

The long-term solution might well lie in next week's Budget. Even at this late stage, I urge the Minister to talk to the Chancellor and the Treasury about what that Budget might contain. It might well be that the Chancellor can resolve the problem by introducing a national scheme for free transport, rather than a local one. As I understand it, such a scheme would not cost a massive amount. It would be much easier to administer and would certainly resolve our problems in Tyne and Wear. It might also resolve the problems that are anticipated in other parts of the country. The existing scheme is restricted to local government boundaries. A national scheme could be introduced at low cost, so I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to raise the matter with the Treasury in the anticipation that next week's Budget might bring a resolution to the problem.

Mr. David Anderson (Blaydon) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I sense that there is a co-operative at work. The normal courtesy is that the right hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East and Wallsend (Mr. Brown) and the Minister have given permission for the additional contributions to be made to the debate. I think that that was perhaps implied by the concise speech made by the right hon. Gentleman, but I need to get things in order.

Mr. David Anderson (Blaydon) (Lab): I will try to be even more concise. My right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East and Wallsend (Mr. Brown) and my hon. Friend the Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland) did not talk about the way in which the scheme applies to disabled people. It is perverse that the impact of free travel for disabled people, which was announced in the Budget, might well be that we find that the care bus service will be withdrawn from Tyne and Wear.

Let me read from an e-mail that I received from a man living in my constituency who has severe problems due to muscular sclerosis. He wrote:

"No-one I speak to on the bus can actually believe that it will be stopped ... as threatened—they cannot contemplate their lives without it. It is a mental torture for them to be worrying about losing their independence, when many already have enough to worry about with illness and disabilities ... As our MP I hope you can let those with the power to solve this realise that they are not playing with pound signs, they are playing with the independence of already vulnerable people who deserve to be treated with respect & dignity—not left hanging on a thread of threats!"

That is what we are talking about with this cock-up. We are talking about bus services that should be a real bonus for our people actually becoming a detriment.

The Minister for Local Government (Mr. Phil Woolas): I should start by paying the usual tribute to my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East and Wallsend (Mr. Brown) for securing the debate and raising a matter that is extremely important to his constituents and those of other hon. Members in the Chamber. I have a useful opportunity to explain how we support services via the formula grant. My right hon. Friend is obviously especially concerned about the distribution of funding for free bus travel for pensioners in Tyne and Wear.

Before looking in detail at the process, it is worth reminding ourselves of the substantial social benefits that will be delivered by the Government initiative on concessionary travel. The need to meet the transport requirements of a growing population of older people is vital to the success of the Government's commitment to sustainable mobility and to people's ability to retain a high quality of life as their income, health and mobility levels change. Despite the rising number of older driving licence holders, declining driving ability and financial constraints mean that many motorists will have to adjust their driving practices, and probably ultimately give up their car. A high proportion of the older population will be dependent on public transport. However, evidence suggests that many will experience difficulties in using bus and rail services.

For the first time, in 2006–07, we have announced two-year grant allocations for every local authority in England. We have put a premium on the stability and predictability of funding, so that councils can plan ahead for better service delivery. The first three-year settlement will be introduced alongside the next spending review round commencing in 2008–09. In the interests of further stability, we have made grant floors a permanent part of the grant distribution system. Floors guarantee a minimum year-on-year grant increase for all authorities and increase local authority confidence in planning for the medium to long term.

Tyne and Wear, to which my right hon. Friend referred, has benefited from the extra money that we have provided in recent years to the local authorities, which have invested in improving local services—for example, reducing antisocial behaviour and providing more support for vulnerable people in Newcastle, developing healthy communities in Gateshead, and supporting carers in Sunderland.

For the 10-year period to 2007–08, we have been able to provide Tyne and Wear metropolitan district councils with an average annual increase in general grant of 4 per cent. in cash terms. For 2006–07 and 2007–08, the grant increases going to Tyne and Wear district councils are £14.7 million and £14.8 million respectively, or 2.8 per cent. in each year, running ahead of current inflation. Additional transport funding for Tyne and Wear has also come through the local transport plan and Challenge funding routes. We have provided £12.9 million for concessionary fares above last year's grant, and £1.7 million for the Metro transport system.

Capital funding to enable implementation of the local transport plan is allocated by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport to the Tyne and Wear authorities, mostly in the form of supported capital expenditure revenue—SCER—as my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East and Wallsend knows. The allocations are determined primarily by formulas reflecting transport need and adjusted to reflect the quality of the local transport plan and the progress made in implementing the plan. A single allocation is made for Tyne and Wear, which is distributed among the authorities in accordance with their wishes.

The allocation for 2005–06 is 68 per cent. higher than that for 1999–2000. As this is capital funding, it cannot be used directly to support the cost of concessionary fares. However, this high level of central Government capital support releases local authorities' own funding to support other initiatives in accordance with local priorities.

[Mr. Phil Woolas]

Since 1998 the Government have provided Nexus, the Tyne and Wear transport executive, with more than £7.7 million funding specifically to support the operation of a number of bus services through the urban and rural bus Challenge and Kickstart programmes. Funding for concessionary fares is supported through formula grant.

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for explaining the background to us. Does he accept that for the next financial year Nexus faces a shortfall in the funding arrangements of about £5.4 million? If so, can he give the House an assurance that meaningful discussions are going on in Government to try to resolve that problem? If he thinks the discussions are stuck and that we are not getting any further forward, will he say so, so that we can have the meeting with the Prime Minister that we were promised?

Mr. Woolas: I assure my right hon. Friend that meaningful discussions are going on. The Government recognise the real difficulties that the transport executive has in balancing its budget. Last summer's consultation with the Local Government Association and local councils resulted in general agreement that the distribution of money through the formula is the best way in which to pursue the issue. Indeed, representations by my right hon. Friend and others on the formula grant distribution method show that the needs of his authority, and of Tyne and Wear authorities in general, indicate that there is a shortfall in the ability of the formula grant to distribute money. Discussions have taken place and are taking place with the local authorities, the transport authority and the transport executive to try to resolve that problem. The level of pensioner bus usage in my right hon. Friend's area is very high, which is why we are continuing discussions with the transport authority and local authorities. My difficulty is that we must treat all local authorities fairly, and I know that my right hon. Friend agrees with that point.

Funding for concessionary fares is supported by the formula grant. My right hon. Friend is aware that the Chancellor added an additional £350 million in formula grant in 2006–07 in order to support the move from the statutory half-fare scheme to a free-fare scheme for all pensioners and disabled people. The funding for those new responsibilities has been added to formula grant in line with a commitment to provide authorities with continued flexibility in the use of their resources.

Mr. Alan Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed) (LD): Surely the Minister knows—the Government have admitted this—that whereas the total sum might be sufficient to cover needs across the country, the distribution between authorities, including Tyne and Wear and, for that matter, Northumberland, which has different but equally difficult problems, does not reflect the particular needs of those areas.

Mr. Woolas: The right hon. Gentleman has made an important point. However, it is also true that local government in general and the LGA in particular support the idea of distributing money through formula grant. Devolution, which involves the distribution of money by local authorities, supports the idea that formula grant is the way forward. The alternative is a specific grant to target individual authorities, but the right hon. Gentleman, his party and the LGA would not support that view. The distribution of money is based on a formula that inevitably results in winners and losers.

The Government always face difficult decisions in dividing up a fixed pot of money where there will be, as I have said, winners and losers. We have looked to ensure an equitable arrangement for concessionary fares funding, which retains local control for spending as requested by local government, rather than separately distributing the money through a specific grant.

Mr. Stephen Byers (North Tyneside) (Lab): The Minister will know that local government makes a number of requests and representations to Government, not all of which are agreed. He said that he wanted all authorities to be treated fairly. The consequence of his decision is that Tyne and Wear is being treated unfairly. This debate is being held because we, as Members for Tyne and Wear, find that unacceptable. Yes, we want free travel for our pensioners, but we want it to be done in a way that is fair and just, which is not the case at the moment. What will the Minister do to resolve that situation?

Mr. Woolas: My right hon. Friend, who knows much better than I do about the problems of distributing money through formula grant, makes a valid point. The Government recognise that the amount of money distributed to Tyne and Wear is not adequate to meet the needs of the scheme as proposed or the current demand for pensioner bus travel in his area. We have moved, through consultation, to ensure that £1.7 million has been allocated to Tyne and Wear through the Department for Transport grant for the metro system. We support the idea of a co-ordinated, integrated transport system in Tyne and Wear, as elsewhere. That money has been granted in recognition of the point that my right hon. Friend makes.

The Government also have to ensure that distribution is fair among all local authorities. That is why the cost of the statutory minimum half-fare scheme was previously supported through the formula grant settlement. However, many local authorities were providing a service above the statutory minimum for their residents—for example, by extending the concessions across the whole county or by enabling their residents to buy a pass to enable them to travel on buses free of charge. Those extensions to the statutory scheme were not taken into account when allocating formula grant. Some areas already offer free travel—Greater London, the west midlands and Merseyside are cases in point. It was right that those areas, too, should benefit from the extra resource so that council tax payers did not bear the burden of an authority's prior decision to offer what is now Government policy.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: What my right hon. and hon. Friends and I want to know is how this matter is to be resolved. Can the Minister point to the way forward?

Mr. Woolas: My right hon. Friend makes a valid request. The Government's approach is to examine the budget of Nexus, the transport executive in the region, to see how we can ensure that the transport concessions that are made—for example, for the student scheme, for the schoolchildren's scheme, and for the existing concessionary scheme—benefit from the allocation of Government money. We have to ensure that that scheme is legal and that it is fair to other authorities that are arguing that they are losing out. I have to say that none of the authorities that is benefiting from the allocation of money has written to me thanking me for it.

My right hon. Friend makes a serious point. We must ensure that we allocate the money through formula grant in a fair way and recognise the needs of the particular transport authority. That is why we are examining the way in which we can distribute money through the formula grant and other possible interventions. We want to ensure that my right hon. Friend's scheme for students, which has led to improvements in the stay-on rate for further education when compared with other areas, continues, and that student and school student travel for buses in his area is maintained and improved. How do we ensure that the unintended consequences of formula distribution of grant do not militate against the social benefits of the schemes that are currently in place for his constituents? That is our task, and the reason for genuinely congratulating him on raising the issue.

In developing the approach to grant distribution that we have now adopted, we had the benefit of extensive consultation, both in the official level settlement working group, in which my right hon. Friend participated, and in full consultation, especially involving local government, last summer on the range of our proposals for grant distribution.

The papers that the Association of North East Councils, which was mentioned earlier, brought to the settlement working group attempted to estimate the cost of moving from an authority's current position to a free-fare scheme. Inevitably, they could only be estimates. As I have explained, we could not base formula grant distribution only on those measurements.

Instead, we suggested that we should reweight the existing formula, known as the lower tier environmental, protective and cultural services formula to reflect the characteristics of areas where take-up of free bus travel is likely to be higher. Indeed, in the period between the announcement of the concessionary scheme in March and the consultation process in July and through to December, we took on board the points that my right hon. Friend made and the representations of others. That led to a significant increase in the money for Tyne and Wear.

We consulted on that in the summer of 2005 and, as part of the consultation, we exemplified the change in the EPCS formula. It is important to stress that the majority of responses to the consultation supported the change to the district level EPCS formula. I have to be fair to other local authorities in the area—

10. Mr. Shailesh Vara (North-West Cambridgeshire) (Con): If he will make a statement on the political situation in Iran. [57936]

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Jack Straw): Iran's nuclear activities are of the greatest concern. On 4 February this year, the International Atomic Energy Agency board adopted by a large majority a resolution calling on Iran to restore full suspension of all enrichment-related and reprocessing activities, but giving it until the March board before the Security Council became involved.

Despite intensive diplomatic efforts by Russia, China and the United Kingdom, France and Germany, the EU3, Iran did not take that opportunity. Instead, Iran has moved in the wrong direction, suspending co-operation with the IAEA under the additional protocol, which it committed itself in October 2003 to sign and ratify. This backward move by the Iranian regime is a symptom of a wider deterioration in the political situation in Iran, which includes further restrictions on press freedom and human rights, support for terrorism and unacceptable hostility towards Israel.

The IAEA director general's latest report said that it was a matter of concern that the nature of Iran's nuclear programmes had not been clarified after three years of intensive agency verification. The issue now moves to the Security Council. Our aim will be to use the council's political and legal powers to ensure that Iran takes the measures that the IAEA board of governors has deemed necessary. Iran must, among other steps, fully suspend all enrichment-related and reprocessing activities, including so-called research and development. We expect council action to be in support of the IAEA's work, in stages, and also to be reversible according to Iranian reactions.

Allowing Iran to acquire nuclear weapons would be deeply damaging for stability in the region as a whole and for the non-proliferation system. We will intensify our efforts with our partners to ensure that that does not happen.

Michael Gove: I thank the Secretary of State for his statement. He will recall that he visited Tehran five times over the past five years as part of his policy of constructive interaction. Following those visits, the Iranian regime has increased its support for Hezbollah, stepped up its drive for a nuclear bomb, turned its country into the biggest prison for journalists in the middle east, backed forces in Iraq targeting British troops and pledged to wipe Israel off the map. Can the Foreign Secretary tell us what precisely was constructive about that interaction?

Mr. Straw: That was an elegantly phrased question, but the insinuation that the one had followed the other is not entirely correct. I remind the hon. Gentleman that my five visits to Iran were all during the presidency of President Khatami, who was elected in what we think were free and democratic elections in 1987 and 2002, and when Iran was moving away from the confrontational approach that had been followed before. I am quite unapologetic about those visits and the efforts that we were making. I am also unapologetic about the work that I have undertaken with France and Germany to try to resolve this issue by peaceful and diplomatic means. Although it has been frustrating, I am clear that it has been far better than the alternative and that without this engagement between these three major European countries, we would never have got the consensus against Iran and for the non-proliferation regime that we achieved, for example, among the IAEA board of governors on 4 February.

Mr. Mackay: Following Iran's formal rejection of Russia's proposals for a joint venture operation and following the Foreign Secretary's welcome speech yesterday, can we conclude that he is nearer to Vice-President Cheney than he was before?

Mr. Straw: I have always enjoyed good relations with Vice-President Cheney, but I speak for the British Government, not the American Government.

Mr. Ruffley: The Foreign Secretary has told us that the UN Security Council will be able to act to reinforce the authority of the IAEA. While he has ruled out military sanctions, can he reassure us today that he will back economic sanctions, should Iran continue to flout its clear international obligations?

Mr. Straw: I have indeed ruled out military action. I have not ruled out the use of article 41 measures, which include sanctions and which will be before the Security Council if they reach a resolution, and Iran understands that. I shall not speculate about which measures might be appropriate or for which we could achieve consensus, but the actions of the Iranian Government are already imposing sanctions on the people of Iran. There has been a flight of capital out of the country, a fall in the Tehran stock exchange, when other stock exchanges have been buoyant, and, above all, a flight of the most important resource of any country—the brightest and best young people in Iran, and that is likely to continue as long as the regime is in power.

Mr. Amess: Now that the policy of appeasement has been seen to have been so disastrous, resulting in the dreadful Iranian President, does the Foreign Secretary accept that a firm signal of disapproval should be sent to Tehran? Will he now consider targeted sanctions, such as those suggested, of a travel ban and freezing the assets of senior officials?

Mr. Straw: The most important thing that we have to do is to maintain a strong and effective international consensus in respect of Iran. Nothing would please the Iranians more than to see the Security Council and the world split between Europe and the United States on the one hand with Russia, China and the non-aligned movement on the other. At each stage, the Iranians have calculated that they would be able to secure that split, while actually at each stage the consensus against them has strengthened, which is why, despite all the rhetoric, we know that they are very worried about the situation.

On appropriate measures under article 41, the hon. Gentleman will excuse me for not anticipating which measures we might be able to take. That will depend above all on gaining a majority and a consensus among the permanent five of the Security Council, but Tehran needs to take notice of the fact that having had the tacit acquiescence of the Russian Federation at the beginning of the process, Iran has now secured its active hostility.

Mr. Vara: Will the Secretary of State tell the House what discussions he has held with other Gulf states, with a view to putting pressure on Iran to sever its links with terrorist groups such as Hezbollah?

Mr. Straw: I have held many discussions with the other Gulf states. They are concerned about Iran's approach in respect of their own Shi'a populations and in respect of support for terrorism. Above all, they share the suspicions of the board of governors of the IAEA that Iran may indeed be using its nuclear facilities to develop a nuclear weapons capability and they are deeply concerned about that.

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend see any role whatever for a military solution to the problem and, if so, at what point?

Mr. Straw: No, and I have made that clear.

Mike Gapes (Ilford, South) (Lab/Co-op): Does my right hon. Friend agree that this crisis has to be handled carefully and long, and that talk of military action or of imminent sanctions is unwise until we have maintained unity in the Security Council?

Mr. Straw: That is very wise advice; my hon. Friend is absolutely right. Of course the situation is frustrating, but those who want precipitate action need to think about the alternatives, which I believe would be far, far worse.

David Lepper (Brighton, Pavilion) (Lab/Co-op): Can the Secretary of State tell us what assessment and representations his Department has made in respect of members of minority religious groups in Iran since its current Government came to power and in particular since the death, on 15 December 2005, of a Baha'i, Mr. Mahrami in Yazd prison?

Mr. Straw: The human rights situation has got worse since President Ahmadinejad came to power. The position of the Baha'is has always been precarious and has got worse. We continue to make strong representations to the Iranians about that, both directly and through the European Union.

Mr. Wayne David (Caerphilly) (Lab): Can the Foreign Secretary confirm that the British Government have made representations to the Iranian Government about alleged members of al-Qaeda who are being held in Iran?

Mr. Straw: We have, and the Iranians are as ambiguous about al-Qaeda as they are about so much else. They recognise that al-Qaeda is an historic enemy of the Iranian regime, yet they have so far failed fully to co-operate with other members of the international community to ensure that members of al-Qaeda are brought to justice.

Mr. Michael Moore (Berwickshire, Roxburgh and Selkirk) (LD): Iran's non-compliance with its international obligations is extremely serious and completely unacceptable. Amidst the tough negotiations, we certainly welcome the Foreign Secretary's restatement of his view that military action against Iran is inconceivable. Can he tell us whether the Prime Minister and the United States Secretary of State would use the same language, and how does the Foreign Secretary believe that the recent nuclear agreement between the United States and India will affect the Iranian position?

Mr. Straw: First, may I offer my congratulations to the hon. Gentleman on his elevation as a Liberal Democrat foreign affairs spokesman? [HON. MEMBERS: "Mini Ming!"] I think that he is quite a big lad myself, and well able to look after himself.

I have set out the British Government's position on military action. I cannot speak—I do not presume to do so—for any foreign Government, but I can say, because it is a matter of record, that although no Commander in Chief of the United States, the President, ever rules out options, in practice, military action is not on the American Government's agenda any more than it is on anyone else's.

Dr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that every Government in the world should regret the fact that Iran has allowed this issue to move from the IAEA to the Security Council? Will he take this opportunity to reaffirm that it is Government policy that any action against Iran will be authorised by the UN Security Council?

Mr. Straw: Any action that was taken by the international community would have to be authorised by the Security Council, and I speak for the United Kingdom. The IAEA operates under the Security Council's general supervision, and it is under its statutes that we have reported Iran to the Security Council.

I am afraid that I failed to answer the last of the questions asked by the hon. Member for Berwickshire, Roxburgh and Selkirk (Mr. Moore) in relation to India. India was not a member of non-proliferation treaty regime. It acquired nuclear weapons. We in the United Kingdom were co-sponsors of a resolution calling on India and Pakistan to desist. It is a reality that the United States and we have sought to ensure that there are agreements with India by which it comes at least partially—I hope, in time, fully—into the non-proliferation regime; but, interestingly, Iran has never raised the issue of India, because of course Iran continues to deny that it has any nuclear weapons ambitions whatsoever.

Mr. William Hague (Richmond, Yorks) (Con): Given that all diplomatic efforts to date to dissuade the Iranian leadership from pursuing its nuclear ambitions have failed, does the Foreign Secretary agree that the Security Council's response must be particularly robust and determined to have any chance of success? Does he agree that an essential part of that must be a comprehensive embargo on all deliveries of weapons and military equipment to Iran, including all nuclear and missile technology?

Mr. Straw: I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that the more robust and determined the response, the quicker that this issue can be resolved satisfactorily for everyone and, above all, for the Iranian people. It will be hard going in the Security Council. However, I am heartened by the fact that it was hard going to get a majority in the board of governors to report Iran to the Security Council, but after a lot of negotiation, we got China, Russia, India, Yemen, Sri Lanka, Egypt and Brazil all in favour, so I remain optimistic.

On precise measures, we anticipate an incremental approach. Initially, there will be a presidential statement by the Security Council. We hope that that works. If it does not, we will look for a Security Council resolution, which may not contain measures; but if that does not work, we are considering the possibility of there being measures. The right hon. Gentleman makes a proposal for inclusion in that, which, of course, we will consider carefully.

Mr. Hague: The Foreign Secretary said yesterday that the use of force against Iran was inconceivable—he has said pretty much the same again today—but on 7 February the Prime Minister said:

"You can never say never in any of these situations."

Has the Prime Minister now changed his view? If so, what has changed in the interim to change his view? In the interests of bringing maximum pressure to bear and of acting in concert with our allies, is it not a mistake entirely to rule out, however far in the future, the use of force?

Mr. Straw: There is no distinction in the British Government's approach. No one is talking about military action. Military action will not resolve the issue. There is no casus belli that I can see. If Iran were to attack one of its neighbours, plainly the situation would change and the issue of a Security Council resolution would not arise, but in the real world in which we are living, where we are trying to resolve this issue, I do not see that there is a place for military action. I have heard no one who believes that there is a place for military action. Given that that is the case and, frankly, given the understandable anxieties of the House, as well as the country, about military action against the background of Iraq, it is very important that we are straight with the British public about what is likely to be used and what is not likely to be used.

Mr. John McFall (West Dunbartonshire) (Lab/Co-op): How much consideration has been given to Mohamed el-Baradei's suggestion that member states establish fuel banks with countries with nuclear reactors, thereby ridding non-weapon states of the need to acquire the fuel-processing technology that can be used to produce weapons-grade material? Under such a scheme, if countries comply with their non-proliferation obligations they will receive that material.

Mr. Straw: A great deal of consideration has been given to that proposal, which fits in with proposals by the American Government. I spelt out to the Iranians the fact that I understand their anxiety about being wholly reliant on one supplier—in this case, Russia—for fuel, which is why we internationally have told Iran that we would be willing for an international guarantee to be given whereby the Russian supply or any alternative supply would be guaranteed. I very much hope that it will accept that offer.

Darfur

3. Mrs. Nadine Dorries (Mid-Bedfordshire) (Con): If he will make a statement on the situation in Darfur. [57928]

8. Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South) (Lab): What recent assessment he has made of the situation in Darfur; and if he will make a statement. [57934]

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Jack Straw): The security situation in Darfur remains serious, with 3.5 million people still requiring humanitarian assistance. The United Kingdom has led the international response and we are among the largest providers of aid. I delivered a strong message to the peace talks that I attended in Abuja last month. We recently announced a further £20 million for the African Union mission in Sudan, and we are now pushing for its early replacement by a stronger United Nations force. We were instrumental in securing the investigation by the International Criminal Court, and in New York we are proposing names for United Nations sanctions.

Mrs. Dorries: Given that the African Union is determined to persist with its mission in Darfur rather than hand over control to the United Nations as many in the international community had hoped, and given that every month thousands of people are still dying as a result of disease and violence, does the Minister think that £20 million is enough additional support for the African Union? Are those sufficient resources for it to continue its mandate, or does it need more to fulfil it?

Mr. Straw: It is sufficient for the time being. The African Union's decision was a curate's egg, but we judged it to be more, rather than less, helpful in moving the African Union towards acceptance of a United Nations mandate, as it has reaffirmed its support for the principle of transition to the UN, welcomed the Security Council launch of contingency planning, commissioned AU-UN work on the transition, and called for an end to incitement by the Sudanese Government of demonstrations against the United Nations. It is a controversial issue—it is controversial within the new Sudanese Government—but the presence of a United Nations force is the best prospect for properly securing peace in Darfur, and we are concentrating all our efforts on securing that end.

Mr. Mullin: Is my right hon. Friend aware that Kofi Annan and Mark Malloch Brown take the view that to be effective any UN force must include American and European troops on the ground? How realistic is that view, and is he aware that the Sudanese Government are boasting that they have seen off the UN? If the Sudanese will not co-operate, has not the time come to ask the International Criminal Court to unveil the results of its war crimes indictments?

Mr. Straw: I am aware that there is anxiety in the UN secretariat about logistical support that the United States and the UK could provide but which few other countries could provide. On the other hand, we must ensure that any troops who are posted are acceptable and know the situation, so detailed discussions are under way in the secretariat with the UN peacekeeping directorate and the African Union. A way through can be found, but the crucial thing is to put those blue-helmeted troops on the ground in Darfur in greater numbers. The present situation is absurd, as troops are not doing a great deal in the south of Sudan. The principle has been accepted in a place where they are not particularly needed, but they cannot transfer to the west of the country where they are needed. The Sudanese Government are resistant to the idea of foreign troops—we all accept that—but we have sought to persuade them to understand and appreciate that the only real hope of peace in Darfur is an effective international peacekeeping force alongside a more effective peace-making process in Abuja.

Sandra Gidley (Romsey) (LD): The Foreign Secretary will be aware that Salah Abdallah Gosh, Sudan's director of national security, was issued a visa, ostensibly for medical purposes. That gentleman has been implicated by a United Nations panel in relation to war crimes. What measures are being taken by the Government to ensure that all international bodies are given the support necessary to end killings in Darfur and bring the perpetrators to justice?

Mr. Straw: I cannot comment on the particular case that the hon. Lady raises. I am happy to write to her about that and place a copy in the Library of the House. On backing for the International Criminal Court generally, it was as a result of British diplomacy that we got the Security Council resolution—the first work of the ICC in respect of Sudan—and we have actively backed all its work subsequently to identify the perpetrators and to bring them to justice.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): The situation in Darfur is grave, but it has been grave for many months. We must find a way of bringing many more troops into the area. There are those who say that the only way to step up troop numbers and to get the UN fully engaged is through NATO being engaged. Is that a realistic proposition, and if not, what is the answer?

Mr. Straw: I know that my hon. Friend has been to Darfur recently and has great expertise on the situation. The point is the same as that raised by our hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) a moment ago. There is a great deal of talk about the high level of expertise in NATO member states, including particularly the United States and the United Kingdom. That has to be balanced against the acceptability of such expertise in Darfur. All I can say is that discussions about that are continuing.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): At the Labour party conference in 2001, the Prime Minister described Africa as "a scar on the conscience of the world."

Since then the humanitarian crisis in Darfur and Sudan has got distinctly worse. Some estimates put the number of displaced people at 3 million, and those who are starving and homeless at another 3 million, with 200,000 refugees crossing the border into Chad. Now we hear that Libya is supporting the Government of Sudan in effectively vetoing any further engagement by NATO troops. What more can the international community do, or is it content to walk by on the other side of the road and watch one of the worst human crises in the 21st century evolve?

Mr. Straw: I understand the hon. Gentleman's frustration. We must stay heavily engaged there. We are doing a great deal. We cannot take over the government of Sudan. In the end, we need the acquiescence of the Government of Sudan for any troops that go into that country. Although I note what the hon. Gentleman says about Libya and some other north African states not being desperately constructive, the other side of that is that under the very sound leadership of President Obasanjo, the former chairman of the African Union, to whom I spoke about the matter less than a week ago, and many of his colleagues, the African Union has shifted. It has finally understood that it must take responsibility for the scandalous situation which, as the hon. Gentleman said, has displaced 3.5 million people in the heart of Africa. All of us have to stay engaged and increase our activity there.

Mr. Eddie McGrady (South Down) (SDLP): Is the Foreign Secretary aware that the International Monetary Fund has just concluded an agreement with the Sudanese Government for an IMF-monitored economic growth policy? Could the implementation of that policy be used as a pressure mechanism to impress on the Sudanese Government the urgent need for the civil war to be brought to a close and, more immediately, for human rights abuses to be brought to an end?

Mr. Straw: I do not have all the details of the International Monetary Fund arrangement, but it is worth bearing in mind that two peace processes have taken place in Sudan. The north-south peace process led to a Government of national unity, so progress has been made and the situation is far better than it was a few years ago, and I believe that the IMF arrangements were made in respect of that process. The IMF always imposes conditions, which are principally economic, but I shall follow up my hon. Friend's suggestion and write to him.

European Constitution

4. Ann Winterton (Congleton) (Con): What recent discussions he has had with his EU counterparts on the future of the European constitution. [57929]

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Douglas Alexander): Last June, the European Council agreed to undertake a period of reflection on the draft constitutional treaty. I regularly discuss questions related to the future of Europe with our European Union counterparts, and recent discussions have focused primarily on the policy priorities for the European Union, such as economic reform and energy security.

Ann Winterton: Will the Minister confirm that all EU treaties fall outwith the royal prerogative, and that they, including any future regurgitated constitutional treaty, can be ratified only by an Act of Parliament and that in those matters Parliament remains supreme?

Mr. Alexander: We have had a number of European treaties, so the process by which they are ratified is fairly standard. However, the particular set of circumstances in relation to the draft constitutional treaty meant that a clear undertaking was given that included in the ratification process for the draft constitutional treaty not only ratification by parliamentary means, but a vote of the people of the United Kingdom.

Ms Gisela Stuart (Birmingham, Edgbaston) (Lab): Will the Minister assure the House that the UK Government will not go down the route suggested by the French Government, by which parts I and II of constitution would be ratified and the commitment to hold a referendum would be evaded?

Mr. Alexander: I have seen some of the speculation to which my hon. Friend has alluded. It is clear from our discussions with our European partners in recent weeks and months both that it is necessary to continue the period of reflection and that it is appropriate for the focus in the coming European Council to be on not only those institutional questions, but, as we have long argued, jobs and growth for the European Union.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells) (Con): Does the Minister recall the European Court of Justice case last September that required member states to impose criminal sanctions in support of EU directives, even if those member states vote against those EU directives? Since 21 of the 25 member states opposed that case, what is he doing to reverse that extension of EU power, or is he happy to see criminal laws changed by the EU through majority voting in defiance of the wishes of Parliament and the Government?

Mr. Alexander: On the right hon. Gentleman's view about the European Court of Justice, I accept that if we are part of the European Union, there should be a means by which the rules are enforced within the European Union. However, we have made our views clear in relation to the particular case to which he has referred, and I will make sure that a letter is sent to him confirming the position.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): A period of reflection is wise on a constitution that the Foreign Secretary has frequently described as being in limbo somewhere between heaven and hell. It is also correct that issues on which member states agree can be advanced as part of the overall reform agenda, which Britain has been proud of leading in Europe in the past nine years. Will the Minister give an assurance that we will move forward on those issues where reform is possible?

Mr. Alexander: Given a previous appearance at Foreign Office questions, I will resist the temptation further to elaborate on the Catholic theology of limbo. [Interruption.] I am not sure whether it was more incongruous that I was asked the question or that I, as a Scottish Presbyterian, endeavoured to answer it. We have long argued that there should be a sensible set of rules to reflect a European Union of 25 member states—it will soon be 27 member states—which is why we supported the draft constitutional treaty. However, that matter is clearly delineated from the commitment that we made at the time of the draft constitutional treaty, which stated that if the draft constitutional treaty is to be ratified in the United Kingdom, it will depend on a referendum involving the people of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West) (Con): The Minister knows that it is not only my right hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) who is concerned about the European Court of Justice. The current holder of the EU presidency, Chancellor Schuessel, has said that the ECJ has systematically expanded European competencies in the past few years, even in areas in which there is no Community law. Does the Minister agree with Chancellor Schuessel, and will the matter be on the agenda at next week's summit?

Mr. Alexander: First, on the agenda for next week's summit, the principal focus will be on jobs and growth in the European Union. There will also be an update on the work on energy security. Recently, the European Commission published a Green Paper following our Hampton Court summit. So, there will be a heavy agenda at the coming European Council later this month.

On the hon. Gentleman's substantive point about the European Court of Justice, we have made clear our opposition to certain rulings of the European Court of Justice in the past, but we accept the principle that there needs to be a means by which the rules and laws in the European Union are enforced.

Lebanon

6. Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op): If he will make a statement on the political situation in Lebanon. [57932]

The Minister for the Middle East (Dr. Kim Howells): The Lebanese Government are committed to addressing political, economic and security sector reform. During his visit to Lebanon in January, my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary reiterated that the UK stands ready to assist the Lebanese Government to implement those reforms.

The UK supports full implementation of United Nations Security Council resolutions 1559 and 1655, which promote the sovereignty of Lebanon, and encourages all parties in Lebanon to assist with their implementation.

Mr. Love: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer. Does he agree that the optimism of the so-called cedar revolution has been somewhat dissipated in the past few months, that the election of Hamas in the Palestinian territories is a setback and further destabilises the region, that as a result our objectives should be, as he says, the implementation of Security Council resolutions, and that we should not use Lebanon as some sort of proxy to fight battles in other countries in the middle east?

Dr. Howells: My hon. Friend, as chairman of the all-party Lebanon group, has taken a great interest in the affairs of that troubled country. His words are wise. Lebanon has suffered enough over the past 50 years. It should not be a battlefield for other wars fought by proxy in that country and I agree with him entirely.

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk) (Con): Does the Minister not think that there is an irony in the fact that, at a time when Lebanon has largely been freed from Syrian influence, the vacuum has now been filled indirectly by the Iranians and their support of Hezbollah? Does he have any evidence that the Iranian support of Hezbollah poses a direct terrorist threat against UK personnel and interests in that area?

Dr. Howells: We have not heard of specific threats, but I understand full well the hon. Gentleman's point. The area is very unstable. We have a great many people working out there, mostly in the private sector, and we have a duty to be very aware of the danger posed to them by Hezbollah and other groups such as Palestinian rejectionist groups, many of which are financed directly by Iran and the Revolutionary Guard. We know that Hezbollah itself is not acting like a proper democratic and political party. It has not laid down its arms and shows no intention of doing so.

Zimbabwe

12. Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): What recent discussions he has had with his African nation counterparts on the situation in Zimbabwe. [57938]

The Minister for Trade (Ian Pearson): We deplore the situation in Zimbabwe. The widespread humanitarian suffering there is caused by misgovernance and bad policies. We regularly raise the situation with African leaders. My noble Friend Lord Triesman of Tottenham, Minister with responsibility for Africa, discussed the issue with a range of South African Government leaders during his visit from 2 to 4 March. African leaders play a vital role in seeking an end to Zimbabwe's nightmare regime.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: Does the Minister really think that the other Governments in Africa, including that led by President Thabo Mbeki, are fully aware of the suffering of the Zimbabwean people? Are they fully aware that hundreds of thousands have been dispossessed by Mr. Mugabe's Administration, that hundreds of thousands are dying of hunger, that some 200,000 have already died from hunger, that there is growing anger in the country that is coming from all population groups, and that there is growing disillusionment with the United Nations, which does not appear to have the courage to take action to end genocide? Will the Government seek to take action, either unilaterally, with other countries in Africa, or through the United Nations, to stop that grotesque killing of innocent people?

Ian Pearson: I think that South Africa and other African nations are well aware of the situation in Zimbabwe. South Africa suffers more than any other country from the Zimbabwean crisis. As a former economist, I must say that the regime, to my reckoning, has got to be close to economic collapse, with inflation rates of 1,000 per cent. and an unemployment rate in the region of 80 per cent. It is clear that the regime is failing, and there is more that African countries can do to bring pressure on it, including supporting the UK and others in discussions in the United Nations.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): Of course we welcome what the Minister says, but the problem is that year after year we keep getting the same message. The reality is that something has got to be done. The economy is ruined and the agricultural policy is in tatters, and there is no future for the people of Zimbabwe with a gangster in charge. What can we do, and when are we going to do it?

Ian Pearson: I share my hon. Friend's sense of frustration at what is happening in Zimbabwe and the complete reluctance and implacable hostility of the regime to do anything about the suffering of its people.

Under our chairmanship, Zimbabwe was discussed for the third time at the UN Security Council on 19 December. Such attention is justified by the scale of the suffering that is clearly going on in Zimbabwe. We will continue to work with our partners in New York to ensure that Zimbabwe remains on the Security Council's agenda, and we want to press for a Security Council resolution.

Sir Malcolm Rifkind (Kensington and Chelsea) (Con): A few moments ago, the Foreign Secretary praised the African Union for becoming involved in what he rightly described as the scandalous situation in Darfur. Will the Minister equally condemn both the African Union and the South African Government for failing to apply similar courage with regard to Zimbabwe?

Ian Pearson: I think that I have made it clear that the Government believe that African countries could and should be doing more. Many share our concerns, and we have seen President Obasanjo, President Mbeki, former President Chissano and others trying to persuade Mugabe to change track. The simple fact of the matter is that when Lord Triesman talks to them, they reply that Mugabe does not listen to them either. I agree that the situation is terrible, but it is important that we all do what we can to exert international pressure on the regime to change for the good of its people.

Arms Trade

13. Mary Creagh (Wakefield) (Lab): What his Department's strategy is for ensuring that negotiations for an international arms trade treaty can begin in 2006. [57939]

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Jack Straw): An international treaty on the arms trade was one of the foreign policy pledges in our manifesto for last year's general election. We are working to build the consensus needed to start the process for a treaty at the United Nations. In 2005, I am pleased to tell the House, we secured support for such an arms treaty from our partners in both the EU and the Commonwealth.

Mary Creagh: I thank my right hon. Friend for his reply. He will be aware that the treaty is vital if we are to ensure that there is a level international playing field for the UK defence industry and to stop arms from falling into the hands of human rights abusers and indiscriminate killers. What discussions has he had with not only other Government Departments, but countries that have been identified as blocker states? What discussions has he had with colleagues in the House to ensure that there is support for such a treaty across the House?

Mr. Straw: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for her interest and concern. There is no party monopoly on the issue whatsoever because there is wide support across the House. She is absolutely right to point out that it is precisely the countries that are resisting such a treaty that show why it is needed the most. Many of the conflicts about which we talked earlier in today's Question Time have been fuelled by an unregulated trade in not only small arms, but medium-sized arms. I have held many discussions about the matter and I raise it with all Foreign Ministers whenever I meet them. As I said, it is significant that we now have active support from the European Union—we achieved that during our presidency—and more than 50 members of the Commonwealth.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate) (Con): A rather notable absentee from those who were giving active support is the United States of America. One has to ask precisely what point there is in a huge amount of official and ministerial effort going towards trying to get this treaty if there is no prospect of the United States being a party to it. Even if it were, if it treated it in the manner in which it treated the extradition treaty with this country, what point is there?

Mr. Straw: I have had many discussions with the United States and those will continue. The Administration—it would apply to any Administration—faces a difficulty about a possible collision between any international treaty and the right of American citizens under the second amendment of the constitution in respect of what happens internally in the United States. We have to find a way of navigating through that. The American Government are as concerned as any other responsible Government about the unregulated trade in small arms fuelling these conflicts; and in practice, the American Government are the biggest donor in terms of support for the United Nations and other aid programmes when it comes to resolving them.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Does the Foreign Secretary believe that it helps or hinders our role as honest brokers trying to fire up the international arms trade treaty talks that we have at the heart of government several hundred civil servants, paid for by the taxpayer, who are on free loan to the arms companies that promote the sale of arms and armaments to certain regimes, a few of which are very unsavoury by any standards?

Mr. Straw: There is no inconsistency between our support for the British defence industries and our support for an international arms trade treaty. I can say to my hon. Friend that our system of arms control in this country is one of the most rigorous in the world. It is adjudicated by the Quadripartite Committee on Strategic Export Controls, a powerful Committee that is made up of four of the Select Committees of this House. We are now in a situation where every quarter we give the Quad Committee real-time information about every arms control licence that we issue, as well as some of those that we reject.

Darfur

14. Mr. Stewart Jackson (Peterborough) (Con): If he will make a statement on the security situation in Darfur. [57940]

The Minister for Trade (Ian Pearson): There has recently been further fighting in Darfur between the forces of the Government of Sudan and rebel groups, as well as between different militias and tribal groupings. There have been attacks on civilians, humanitarian workers and the African Union monitoring mission, and the general level of banditry remains high. We call on all the parties to respect the ceasefire and reach an early political settlement. We are taking the actions outlined earlier by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

Mr. Jackson: I thank the Minister for that answer. Further to the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown), does the Minister think that it is acceptable that the President of Libya has a de facto veto on NATO involvement in enforcing the UN mandate in Darfur?

Ian Pearson: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point. However, this is clearly a matter for discussion in the United Nations. Let me re-emphasise that we are very concerned about the security situation. In a speech in Abuja on 14 February, my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary made it very clear to all the parties that they need to make urgent efforts to achieve a sustained ceasefire. That remains our hope and our position.

Joint Economic and Trade Committee

15. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): If he will make a statement on the current work programme of the Joint Economic and Trade Committee. [57941]

The Minister for Trade (Ian Pearson): The Joint Economic and Trade Committee is a bilateral mechanism for businesses to raise issues of concern for action by the Indian and UK Governments. It aims to encourage the Indian Government to open more sectors to foreign investment and to increase trade and investment opportunities for British business. Indian and British businesses are participating in working groups for agribusiness, accountancy services, health care, hi-tech clusters, legal and financial services and infrastructure.

Peter Luff: When the Select Committee on Trade and Industry was in India last week, we saw for ourselves the huge enthusiasm that exists in the Indian business community to build and deepen trade and investment relations between our two countries. We also saw the dignified response of the Indian Government to terrorist atrocities in Varanasi. Does the Minister agree that one of the most effective contributions that we can make to answering the terrorists is to signal our determination to do all that we can to build and deepen our relationships with the fastest-growing democracy in the world?

Ian Pearson: I agree and I look forward to meeting the hon. Gentleman and the Select Committee on Trade and Industry to discuss trade in India shortly. He is right that we must conduct more trade, which is surely the best message that we can convey to India. We are doing that through the Indo-British Partnership Network. Recently, I was in India with a strong business delegation and improvements are taking place. However, I am not satisfied. It is a little like England in the second test—our batting performance was poor. We need to do better, and I am sure that we will do better in future.

Angus Robertson (Moray) (SNP): Does the Minister accept that the Scotch whisky industry is seriously affected by the penal rates of duty and import tax that the Indian authorities impose? What are he, the Foreign Office and the Department of Trade and Industry doing to try to ameliorate the position?

Ian Pearson: I agree that the Scotch whisky industry is unfairly penalised by duty rates. I have raised the matter directly with the Ministry of Commerce and Industry and my opposite number. We have made regular submissions about it. We hope that, as part of the World Trade Organisation negotiations, there will be a reduction in tariffs not only for Scotch whisky, but for other products.

Ethiopia

17. Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): What recent discussions he has had with the Ethiopian Government on disturbances in the country. [57943]

The Minister for Trade (Ian Pearson): We remain concerned about the situation in Ethiopia. We have called on all sides to exercise restraint, avoid confrontation and violence, and respect the law.

Ministers and officials raise our concerns regularly. Since December, my right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for International Development, and my noble Friend Lord Triesman of Tottenham, who is Minister for Africa, have all discussed developments with the Ethiopian Prime Minister personally.

Julie Morgan: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is essential for the UK Government to continue to work closely with the Ethiopian Government to encourage more transparent democracy in the country? I have recently returned from Ethiopia where I viewed the problems and human rights abuses, but also the progress towards meeting the millennium development goals. We should continue to work closely with the Government there.

Ian Pearson: I pay tribute to my hon. Friend for her dedication to and interest in Ethiopia. The Government are concerned about the loss of life in the June and November disturbances and we want to work closely with the Ethiopian Government to ensure that they are aware of our views about the importance of a transparent, prompt and impartial inquiry. We want Prime Minister Meles to agree to international jurists observing the trial. We also want the trial to be conducted fairly, quickly and transparently. There are several serious issues to consider, and I would be more than happy to meet my hon. Friend to discuss her experiences on her recent visit.

Zimbabwe

18. Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): When he next expects to meet his EU counterparts to discuss EU sanctions against Zimbabwe. [57944]

The Minister for Trade (Ian Pearson): At the 30 January General Affairs Council, my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary joined his EU colleagues in renewing sanctions against Zimbabwe for a further year. That decision reflected the EU's strong concern about the human rights situation and failure of governance in Zimbabwe. We remain in close touch with our EU partners to maintain a firm international response to the crisis.

Mr. Bellingham: We heard earlier about the spineless attitude of neighbouring countries to Zimbabwe. They appear terrified of Mugabe. Although sanctions have been in place for several years, Zimbabwean officials and their families still travel to Europe. Furthermore, does the Minister know that Mugabe has travelled to Europe on five occasions? What more can be done? Is the hon. Gentleman genuinely saying that Her Majesty's Government cannot do more to help the people of that tragic country?

Ian Pearson: On the point about the stance of African countries, I have nothing further to add. However, the hon. Gentleman's comments are not helpful. He claims that EU sanctions are ineffective, but they place genuine pressure on the regime. They have the support of the democratic Opposition and the non-governmental organisation community in Zimbabwe. Mugabe and his cohorts detest the restrictions that are imposed on their movements. The hon. Gentleman mentioned potential loopholes. Standard exemptions enable travel to the EU in a few, narrowly defined cases, but overall the travel ban works and puts pressure on the regime.

Mr. Gregory Campbell (East Londonderry) (DUP): What assistance are the Government offering to the opposition parties in Zimbabwe that are taking such a courageous and noble stand against the excesses of the Mugabe regime?

Ian Pearson: We talk on a regular basis with the Movement for Democratic Change and the various elements within it. In addition to putting pressure on the regime to change, the key thing that we do is to provide humanitarian assistance to the people in Zimbabwe who are being disadvantaged by that completely odious regime. We will continue to do that through the Department for International Development, because it is important work and it is helping to save people's lives.

West Bank

19. Kerry McCarthy (Bristol, East) (Lab): What assessment he has made of the economic impact of settler expansion in the west bank; and if he will make a statement. [57945]

The Minister for the Middle East (Dr. Kim Howells): Settlement expansion—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear!"] I have never got this far down my crib book before. Settlement expansion has meant an increase in checkpoints and road closures in the west bank. The barrier circling settlements east of Jerusalem restricts movement for residents between the west bank and East Jerusalem. These factors are damaging the Palestinian economy. Settlements are illegal under international law. The road map is clear that Israel should freeze all settlement construction, and we continue to urge Israel to route the barrier away from occupied land.

Kerry McCarthy: I thank the Minister for his answer. I also thank the Secretary of State for agreeing to make a statement in a few minutes' time. When I was in the occupied territories as an observer for the recent Palestinian elections, I was particularly concerned to see the work that had been done to pave the way for building E1, the economic zone that will link the huge settlement of Ma'ale Adumim and Jerusalem, effectively cutting the west bank in two and completely destroying its territorial contiguity. Can my hon. Friend assure me that we are putting pressure on the Israeli Government to halt all building work on E1?

Dr. Howells: I can certainly assure my hon. Friend that we will continue to put pressure on the Israeli Government. I visited East Jerusalem recently, and I saw the disruption to people's lives that that barrier is causing; it is very severe in some cases. We agree, as we have to, that Israel has a right to self-defence and to protect itself against suicide bombers, but building a barrier on occupied land is contrary to international law. We continue to say to Israel that if it is going to build it, it should build it along the green line and not on Palestinian land.

Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside) (Lab/Co-op): Does my hon. Friend agree that the best way to deal with the Palestinian-Israeli problem is for the Palestinians to enter into negotiations with Israel to set up a Palestinian state on the basis of a two-state solution? Does he also agree that, to enable that to happen, Hamas must accept the existence of Israel unconditionally and permanently?

Dr. Howells: Yes, indeed. I agree with that.

Turkey

20. Meg Hillier (Hackney, South and Shoreditch) (Lab/Co-op): When he last visited Turkey to discuss human rights; and if he will make a statement. [57946]

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Douglas Alexander): My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary last visited Turkey on 25 January 2006 and held talks with Prime Minister Erdogan and Foreign Minister Gul on a number of issues, including human rights and the importance of continued reforms. It would be unworthy of me to omit at this stage mention of the fact that on that occasion my right hon. Friend was also awarded by the Turkish Industrialists and Businessmen's Association the 2005 Bosphorus prize for European understanding.

Meg Hillier: I recently had the privilege of meeting the Mayor of Batman when he was on a visit to Hackney—[Interruption.] Batman in Turkey. He was visiting Hackney and meeting Kurdish compatriots. Following the Foreign Secretary's meetings with the Turkish Government, what words of comfort does my right hon. Friend have for Kurds who are concerned about human rights abuses of their compatriots in Turkey?

Mr. Alexander: I assure the House that I have never had any difficulty drawing a distinction between Hackney and Gotham City. On the substantive question that my hon. Friend has raised, those of us who want an improvement of human rights in Turkey, in particular for the Kurdish minority, have taken heart from the opening of accession talks on 3 October. Many commentators have recognised that while some progress has already been made in relation to the Kurdish community, the very spotlight that the process towards accession to the European Union holds out is the strongest prospect for further progress.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): May I join the Minister in his remarks on progress towards Turkey's accession? What progress has there been towards peaceful reconciliation with the Kurdish minority and will he ensure that we give all the support we can to the Turks to make sure that there are no terrorist attacks on the Kurdish minority? Will he join me in asking whether Robin was also present at the meeting referred to earlier?

Mr. Alexander: I will leave the final question to be discussed between the Members concerned.

On the substantive point, of course we continue, through our embassy in Ankara and through ministerial contact of the kind of which I spoke, to press the case for further improvements in human rights. There has been progress—for example, in relation to Kurdish broadcasting—but there is further scope for progress to be made. That is why I give my word to the House that we shall continue to take forward this work during that process of accession over the months and years ahead.

3.31 pm

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): We will now take Question 11.

Hamas

11. Gordon Banks (Ochil and South Perthshire) (Lab): What steps he is taking to establish channels of communication with Hamas; and if he will make a statement. [57937]

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Jack Straw): We fully support the approach set out by the Quartet. Members of any Palestinian Government must be committed to non-violence, the recognition of Israel and the acceptance of previous agreements and obligations, including the road map.

May I take this opportunity to explain to the House what has happened today in Jericho and elsewhere in the occupied territories? First, I must emphasise the Government's condemnation of today's appalling acts of violence. They are totally unwarranted. I am glad to tell the House that all United Kingdom monitors and other employees of the British Government are safe—including British Council employees, all of whom are Palestinian—in Gaza and in Ramallah. We are currently advising against all travel to the occupied territories.

I set out the background to the withdrawal of our monitors from the prison in Jericho in a written ministerial statement to the House this morning. The House will recall that they arrived in Jericho under the Ramallah agreement in 2002, which helped to bring about the end of the siege of President Arafat's compound.

The Ramallah agreement set out clear conditions under which the six Palestinian prisoners would be held. The 14 British and American monitors were there to monitor those conditions, not to detain or protect the prisoners. Regrettably, the Palestinian Authority have never in the past four years met all their obligations under the Ramallah agreement, despite our repeated demands that they do so.

Our monitors faced an increasing threat to their safety. I considered—on advice from officials and security experts—withdrawing them last year, but I judged that, on balance, the risk was just acceptable to allow them to stay. In the light of recent reports, however, I decided that their position was no longer tenable and the security risks were unacceptable. The safety of the British monitors had to be my overriding concern. In my original statement to the House of 29 April 2002, I set out the fact that that was our overriding concern, but also the principal responsibility of the Palestinian Authority.

Given the deteriorating situation, on Wednesday last, 8 March, we—that is, the United States and the United Kingdom consuls general—informed the Palestinian Authority and the Israeli Government, as the Ramallah agreement required us to do, by letter of our intention to withdraw the monitors "with immediate effect"—I quote directly from the letter—unless the Palestinian Authority took a final opportunity to meet their obligations. I regret that they felt or were unable to do so. For obvious security reasons—namely, the safety of the monitors as they withdrew—we could not give precise timings of the withdrawal, but the phrase "with immediate effect" was absolutely clear. We made sure, and were assured, that President Abbas was made aware of our plans. The letter, indeed, was to him.

Just before coming to the House, I spoke to President Abbas of the Palestinian Authority, the United States Secretary of State, Condoleezza Rice, and the Israeli Foreign Minister, Tzipi Livni. I urged the Government of Israel to show the maximum restraint in their current actions being undertaken in the perimeter of Jericho prison.

Gordon Banks: In the light of today's developments and of reports of hostage-taking in Gaza, will my right hon. Friend tell us what wider measures he is taking to ensure the safety of all British nationals in Gaza and on the west bank, to reduce the immediate tensions and to limit any possible spread of today's violence?

Mr. Straw: We immediately issued changes to travel advice, urging British citizens—British subjects—not to travel to the occupied territories for the time being. We also gave other detailed advice. As I told the House earlier, I have already spoken to the Foreign Minister of the Government of Israel, and urged that the Israeli defence force show maximum restraint in the present difficult circumstances.

Mr. William Hague (Richmond, Yorks) (Con): May I return to the substance of the original question? The Quartet has laid down clear conditions for Hamas to comply with its demands. Will the Foreign Secretary tell us how much time Hamas has in which to change, and specifically when a cut-off in funding might occur?

The Foreign Secretary is right to attach such importance to the safety of our monitors, and his decision in principle to withdraw from the Jericho monitoring mission is therefore understandable. However, several questions inevitably arise. Did the Government give sufficient consideration to the consequences of a sudden withdrawal, and should an interim arrangement have been sought to avert an outbreak of violence when the monitors withdrew? What was done to alert the British Council and British officers in the region to the possibility of a sudden escalation of violence? Were the Government aware of the likelihood of Israel seeking to take custody of the prisoners by force? Under the terms of the Ramallah agreement, which party has responsibility for the lives and safety of the Palestinian detainees now that the monitoring mission has been withdrawn? In the meantime, what steps are the Government taking to make clear to armed Palestinian groups—or, indeed, anyone else—that the targeting of British property and personnel will in no circumstances advance their interests?

Mr. Straw: The right hon. Gentleman asked about the time that we would give the Hamas Administration. No time scale has been laid down so far. Indeed, for the time being there is no Hamas Administration. We wait to see the nature of that Administration. However, the Quartet's statement is very clear. Meanwhile, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development and I have sought to ensure that while clear expectations are laid at the door of the new Hamas majority in the Palestinian legislative assembly, ordinary Palestinians are not punished or impoverished for the results of their perfectly free decisions in the election.

As for the withdrawal decision that I announced earlier today, I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for the understanding that he showed. He asked whether sufficient consideration had been given to whether there was any alternative. The answer is yes. The matter had been under active consideration by me for getting on for a year. When I was first asked to agree to the withdrawal I decided not to do so, because at that stage, after further questioning of the security assessments, I judged—although it was a risk, for which I took responsibility—that it was just acceptable for the monitors to stay.

There comes a moment, however, when it is impossible to be irresponsible about such risks. My judgment then became, last week, that the risk to the people for whom we were directly responsible was too great. I also considered whether there could be some kind of phased withdrawal. The problem was that, according to the advice that I received and according to my judgment, if we gave notice our own monitors might end up being subject to kidnap or siege inside the prison. I am in no doubt about that. For that reason—and although we made it absolutely clear in the letter that was sent to President Mahmoud Abbas, a copy of which is in the Library of the House, that unless there was any change the decision would have immediate effect—we could not give either the Palestinians or the Israelis advance notice.

Did we alert the British Council? I cannot give the House the precise details, but I can say that British Council staff, who were all Palestinians, became aware of the possibility of demonstrations and that all those staff in both Ramallah and Gaza were withdrawn, so happily they are safe.

Were we aware of the likelihood of the Israelis' seeking to take people into custody or seeking, effectively, to lay a siege around Jericho prison? Indeed we were, and that was part of what I had to consider. The House will recall the background—these detainees had been accused by the Israeli Government of complicity or involvement in the assassination of the Israeli Tourism Minister. The Israelis wished to arrest them, but they took refuge in the Muqata'a, President Arafat's compound. There was then a siege of President Arafat and those prisoners, the resolution of which was that the prisoners would be held in a Palestinian jail but with British and American monitors. The Israelis only agreed to that provided that we agreed to monitor the situation. It was for that reason that we kept saying to the Palestinians, "Please improve security, ensure that the conditions of the Ramallah agreement are observed and ensure the security of our personnel."

Who is responsible for the detainees? Legally, I believe it is the Palestinians but, so far as the Israelis are concerned, the detainees are prisoners at large under charge in Israel. That is currently the subject of intensive diplomatic efforts with the Government of Israel and the Palestinian Authority.

Sir Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton) (Lab): Whatever revulsion Hamas arouses, is not it a fact that its election victory was as valid as that of the Israeli Government and a good deal more valid than that of George W. Bush in 2000? Does my right hon. Friend agree that if the Israelis continue to create their own do-it-yourself ghetto behind a wall encroaching deeply into Palestinian territory, while maintaining 350,000 illegal Israeli settlers and carrying out pre-election stunts like they have just done in Jericho, peace will be impossible and support for Hamas will rise still further?

Mr. Straw: The Quartet has accepted and acknowledged and, indeed, congratulated the Palestinian people on,

"an electoral process that was free, fair and secure."

In the same statement, the Quartet reiterated its view that settlement expansion by Israel had to stop, reiterated its concern regarding the route of the barrier and noted acting Prime Minister Olmert's recent statements that Israel will continue the process of removing unauthorised outposts. This is a difficult situation—it has been on many occasions in recent years—and we urge all sides to show restraint.

Mr. Michael Moore (Berwickshire, Roxburgh and Selkirk) (LD): This is a tragic development and whatever the Israelis' calculations and concerns, their actions have turned a sensitive situation into a highly volatile one, and that is utterly counter-productive. The Foreign Secretary is right that our first priority must be the safety of British citizens in the west bank and Gaza. We agree that retaliatory attacks against them and others are a disgrace and must be completely condemned. Will he clarify the steps that are being taken to mobilise the Quartet in response to these events? Will he confirm when he personally most recently discussed the Ramallah agreement with his opposite numbers in Israel and in the Palestinian Authority? What additional security measures at the prison were requested and refused?

Mr. Straw: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his understanding and acceptance that the first priority for any Foreign Secretary must be the security of his own personnel. Frankly, if I am open to criticism, it is on the basis that I kept them there as long as I did, and not that I had to remove them earlier today. On mobilising the Quartet, I have spoken to the United States' Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and I will speak to other members of the Quartet, including High Representative Solana, later today. Earlier today, I spoke to Ursula Plassnik, the Austrian Foreign Minister, who holds the presidency of the Foreign Minister's Council of the European Union. In any event, I am clear that all members of the Quartet will be of the same view as the British Government.

I cannot tell the hon. Gentleman off-hand when I last discussed the Ramallah agreement with either the Palestinians or the Israelis. However, I can tell the hon. Gentleman that our staff in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv have constantly raised the issue, especially with the Palestinian Authority. Following the dispatch of the letter by fax to President Abbas's office last Wednesday, the consul-general, John Jenkins, to whom I spoke just two hours ago, made four separate phone calls to Mahmoud Abbas's chief of staff to ensure that the letter had been received and fully understood. When I spoke to Mahmoud Abbas, who happened to be in Vienna, earlier today, he confirmed that he was indeed aware of the content of the letter. He expressed concern about the fact that we had not given them a precise date and time for the removal, but I have dealt with that issue: if we had, the monitors could have been kidnapped. The security problem has not been the willingness of the Palestinian Authority in Ramallah to act, but the inaction of the security personnel on the ground in the Jericho prison.

What we required of the Palestinian Authority was very straightforward—that they kept to the detailed conditions of the operational procedures for the Authority, as agreed in an annexe to the Ramallah agreement. That agreement included no use of mobile telephones, but they were used. Mr. Sa'adat, the leader of the Palestinians who stood in the Palestinian election, ran an election campaign from his cell with his telephone. There were supposed to be restrictions on visitors—they were ineffective—and on correspondence. Moreover, conditions for the monitors became so difficult that they could not carry out cell searches. A fundamental part of the Ramallah agreement was that the six prisoners in question should be kept separate from all other prisoners. However, the monitors were unable to be within the prison; instead, they had to stay on the roof, making effective monitoring increasingly difficult. That was the fundamental problem and putting it right could have been very straightforward—simply by following the Ramallah agreement. I regret that the Palestinian Authority did not have it within them to do so.

Mr. Peter Kilfoyle (Liverpool, Walton) (Lab): As the Foreign Secretary said, these are accused, not convicted, men. However, can he give unequivocal confirmation that there was no collusion with the Israelis on the timing of the withdrawal of the monitors, and will he condemn what I can only describe as state-sponsored terrorism, involving attacking a prison with tanks and rockets?

Mr. Straw: I can absolutely give that undertaking to my hon. Friend—there was indeed no collusion. Under the terms of the Ramallah agreement, we had to give formal notice in writing of our intention to withdraw not only to the Palestinian Authority, but to the Israeli Government. That letter, a copy of which was put in the House Library this morning, spelled out that we were indeed giving a copy of it to the Israelis. We deliberately decided not to tell anybody about the exact timing of the withdrawal because of the risk to the safety of our monitors, but also precisely to ensure that there could be no collusion with the Israeli defence force. The truth, given the nature of surveillance in the occupied territories, is that if we had told anybody in the occupied territories, we would in practice have been telling the Israeli defence force at the same time.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): The week before last, two of my hon. Friends and I visited the west bank. I shall allow them to speak for themselves, but it was quite apparent to me that relations between the Israeli defence force and the Palestinians were hardly cordial, and today's events will not have improved that. Can the Foreign Secretary persuade me that what he is doing is going to have a practical diplomatic and political consequence, and that it is not simply a well-motivated exercise in appearing to do something? What practical steps can he and his friends in the other members of the Quartet take to achieve some form of progress with this very vexing problem?

Mr. Straw: What I have announced today is a matter of regret, but had I come to the House and instead announced the death of British monitors as a result of my taking too high a risk, that would have been a matter of condemnation, not regret. That is the dilemma that I faced and, as I have said to the House, I was extremely reluctant to take these steps, which is why I held off from taking them, kept asking for more information on the security assessments and insisted that we gave proper notice to President Mahmoud Abbas. But there we are—I took that decision and I happen to think that it was the right one, even though there have been consequences, which we did anticipate.

As for the future, all I can say is that notwithstanding these difficulties there has been some progress, if we look back to April 2002 when the situation was dire and killings were taking place daily on both sides. There is now a ceasefire and the numbers of deaths on each side have been reduced. We have to build on that. It is fundamental to the interests of the Palestinians for Hamas to understand that just as we have responsibilities in terms of recognising the legitimacy of the election, the Hamas leadership has a responsibility to recognise that democracy is incompatible with the pursuit of terrorism.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have allowed Question Time to continue for a further 20 minutes, but we must now move on.

Gas (Supply and Demand)

3.51 pm

John Hemming (Birmingham, Yardley) (LD) (Urgent Question): To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to make a statement on gas market prices and supply and demand.

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Alan Johnson): Early yesterday, National Grid issued a gas balancing alert as a prudent signal to the market to increase gas supplies further. That was a planned measure and not an emergency response. National Grid took that action in response to an increase in gas demand due to the cold weather, problems on the supply side with the Rough storage facility being out of operation, and low delivery through the interconnector at the weekend. That resulted in a significant call on short-range gas storage and the resulting spike in the gas price.

As of today, the demand-supply situation has eased compared with yesterday. Demand has fallen to a near seasonal norm. Supply has increased, with greater flow through the interconnector. We are also seeing deliveries through the Isle of Grain and a further shipment of liquid natural gas is due to dock tomorrow. Deliveries from the North sea are performing strongly. National Grid expects supply and demand to balance today and does not anticipate the system being out of balance in the coming days. But National Grid, Ofgem and my Department will of course continue to monitor the situation carefully, in case of any change in the anticipated demand-supply picture.

There is no doubt that Rough being closed is making things more difficult than they otherwise would be. Rough accounts for about 80 per cent. of our total storage capacity. It can supply 10 per cent. of average daily winter demand. Were it in operation, we would not be experiencing any problems this week. Hon. Members may recall that an accidental fire a few weeks ago shut the main pumping station; the damage caused is still being repaired. We are in close contact with Centrica, which owns the facility, and understand that it will not be back in action for a couple of months.

It is, of course, normal for storage to be used during the course of the winter. We would expect the market to be drawing on short and medium-range storage in current circumstances, particularly at this late stage of the winter. We have had a spell of colder weather later in the winter and the UK's long-range storage facility has been shut for a month. The gas system and market has responded to those circumstances.

Let me reiterate that on present information, we are not expecting a formal gas supply emergency. While it is clear that we must not be complacent, it is equally important not to cause unnecessary panic. The present situation does not threaten domestic, or the vast majority of commercial and industrial, supply. And even were there to be an emergency, National Grid would be able to maintain supplies to domestic and other key gas consumers.

Of course the situation has had a major impact on prices. The spot gas price has increased significantly since the weekend. I know that for some heavy industry it is not easy to make alternative arrangements and the high prices will have an impact. The market is responding to a tight demand-supply situation, as we would expect. Gas suppliers have every incentive at those prices to maximise supply from all possible sources and we are in close contact with the operators of the interconnector to ensure that it flows as much as possible.

Market liberalisation in mainland Europe is a key factor in reducing energy costs for British consumers. That is why we have been encouraging the European Commission to take action and why we warmly welcomed the hard-hitting report that it published on 16 February. We shall continue to press for market reform.

Looking forward, significant new import infrastructure—new pipelines and liquefied natural gas import terminals, as well as increased storage—is to be delivered by the energy sector in coming years. Representing some £10 billion of investment, that will increase security of gas supply to the UK and should reduce upward pressure on UK prices.

In short, the circumstances are exceptional: our largest storage facility is out of action and we are experiencing an unseasonably cold spell of weather. None the less, supply is meeting demand and the market mechanisms are working, albeit at a relatively high spot price. National Grid, Ofgem and my Department continue to monitor the situation carefully.

John Hemming: The country is on a knife edge. What will the Secretary of State say to the 7,000 people who may lose their jobs in the plastics industry? What will he say to domestic consumers, who have seen price increases and are likely to see more? What have the Government done since long-term storage went out on 16 February?

If there is too little storage, as I think we all accept, why do we not import more on mild days? Why is the trigger for a gas balancing alert so high? On Sunday 319 GWh was taken from short-term storage, but there was no gas balancing alert. Had the same rate been taken on Monday and today, we would be in a gas emergency now. How can the Government expect UK industry to cope with energy prices in this country that are 50 per cent. greater than those in the United States of America?

Why do the Government do so little about energy security and reducing demand? The Prime Minister says, "Not me, guv—nothing we can do." Cold weather is now predicted. Short-range storage has approximately 50 million cu m and the Hornsea facility has 48 million cu m. Why do the Govt not do something about demand and supply?

Alan Johnson: I do not think that the country is on a knife edge. A gas balancing alert has been issued. That mechanism has operated in the electricity sector for a number of years, and as the hon. Gentleman knows, it has recently been introduced in the gas sector. It is an extremely important mechanism for telling the market that demand is exceeding supply, which means that the market responds to that. Saying that the country is on a knife edge is, I suggest, a wee bit of hyperbole.

The hon. Gentleman asks what Government are doing. The one thing that the Government should not do is interfere in the market. I would be interested to know what the Conservatives would do in such circumstances. The days when our energy was provided by state monopolies were bad for the consumer, bad for the energy supply situation and bad for the country.

The hon. Gentleman talks about the effect on consumers, but according to the most recent figures, we in this country are still enjoying the cheapest domestic gas in Europe. Industrial customers have had problems this winter, not only because of the problems caused in all European countries by high oil prices—Germany's wholesale gas prices have increased by 80 per cent., Denmark's by approximately 40 per cent. and France's by 20 per cent.—but because we have a tight situation in the UK this year, and probably will next year, too. We discussed that during the important debate in the House in January.

The analysts and experts misjudged the amount of gas that would come from the North sea. The period of adjustment to that is difficult, but it would have been ludicrous for this country to have storage facilities when it had a reserve in the North sea. The Netherlands and Norway, which also have indigenous supplies, do not have huge amounts of storage. We must get the right balance in terms of transfer across.

I think that the system is working for the benefit of consumers. We have had a difficult winter, but what the Government should do about that is to ensure that the market is operating properly—that is a particular issue for Europe—and that Ofgem and the right mechanisms are in place to see any possible crisis coming and deal with it. There is no national emergency at the moment; there is a gas balancing alert.

Mr. Doug Henderson (Newcastle upon Tyne, North) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend accept that the hon. Member for Birmingham, Yardley (John Hemming) is displaying more than a little opportunism and hypocrisy, given the background of the Liberal Democrats' energy policy? Although he is right to raise the issue of gas supply and demand being in balance, he and his party fail to tackle the issue of the country's energy supplies being in balance. Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the Government's policy is to ensure that there is a balanced energy supply in this country, especially on the base load?

Alan Johnson: My hon. Friend makes his point very powerfully. It is extraordinary that as we look to energy supply for the future and having security of supply, which every country is looking for, and given that the days of cheap indigenous fuel are probably gone for ever, the Opposition should rule out one option. We believe that all those options, including nuclear power, should be looked at properly. We do not rule out any of those options until we have had the arguments and the analysis to come to a proper conclusion.

Mr. Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton) (Con): On 16 February, I asked the Minister to explain the Government's policy for establishing onshore strategic energy stocks that stand a chance of lasting for more than a few days. The answer, in effect, was that we have very little storage and will not do so for some time. That largely explains why Britain is so acutely vulnerable to the sort of extreme price spike that we are facing today. British business lives in fear that its fuel costs will rocket to ever more punishing levels, and that it might even be cut off altogether. Yesterday National Grid, for the first time under the new warning system, issued a gas balancing alert. If there is one positive point to be drawn from this situation, it is that at least we know that the warning system is working.

For the next year at least, the UK will remain perilously sensitive to short-term gas price volatility. We have a free market in energy; the rest of Europe does not. Even when our prices are high, they still do not sell to us. This Government singularly failed to address this issue during their presidency of the European Union last year. Our gas production is falling, which is made worse by the Chancellor's tax regime, and during the winter we are now forced to import a growing percentage of our gas requirements. The gas comes mostly through only one pipeline, our shipped liquefied natural gas imports are not at the volumes we need, our storage capacity is puny and now our strategic vulnerability has been exacerbated by a cold snap across Europe, a fire at the Rough storage facility in the North sea, a drop in supplies from Norway and a strike by French gas workers. It is all happening at once.

Yesterday the price of gas for immediate delivery shot up from about 60p per therm to a peak of 255p—an increase of 400 per cent. Today it is trading at about 225p to 250p for delivery within the next week or so, but for delivery in April the market is much lower at about 65p. This is the ultimate short-term market squeeze. To put it bluntly, is it not the case that there is simply nothing we can do in the immediate future, and that the excruciating exposure that Britain and its companies face will not be remedied for at least another year? Is it not the case that additional capacity to import by pipeline or ship and our capacity to store larger quantities will not come on-stream for another year? Is it not also the case that British companies that will have to endure another winter of impossible uncertainty and soaring fuel bills will not thank this Government for their culpable lack of foresight?

Alan Johnson: I agree that the current situation shows that the gas balancing system works. I disagree with the hon. Gentleman's comments about our presidency. The major issue is still that, with prices yesterday running at their highest level ever, we were not getting the gas through the interconnector that we should have been getting. Some of that was caused by the strike in France, but the primary cause was that in the European Union, principle has not been put into practice. During our presidency—as we have explained on many occasions, most recently in the debate in this Chamber in January—my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy was instrumental in convincing the commissioner and the European Union to open not just one but three lines of inquiry, one of which will result in anti-trust cases against certain EU member states within a matter of weeks. That is just on the basis of the interim report from Commissioner Kroes. My hon. Friend the Minister for Energy is at the Energy Council in Brussels even as we speak, seeking to ensure that we maintain that momentum. I agree that we have not changed the situation in Europe overnight, nor did we change it during the six months of our presidency, but we have put in place measures that will lead to liberalisation across Europe.

As for our storage capacity being puny, 300 million cu m a day is coming into this country from the North sea, which is 75 per cent. of our supply. Rough has the capacity to introduce 10 per cent. of our daily demand in winter and, because total capacity is 3,340 million cu m and we can bring it in at a rate of 43 million cu m a day, we have 77 days of supply in Rough. There was an explosion at the Rough facility, which is close to my constituency, and I agree that there has been a combination of events, but we are not in an emergency. Our market has benefited UK consumers, both industrial and domestic, for many years. The worst thing the Government could do would be to step into the market with our size 16 hobnail boots. That happened in Canada and the Canadians have regretted it ever since.

Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): The current situation underlines more than anything else could the need for a balanced energy supply. My right hon. Friend said that the vast majority of commercial and industrial users were not under threat, but in the light of the needs of large businesses in my constituency, can he assure me that supplies to major gas users in the north-west are being prioritised in the interests of those important businesses?

Alan Johnson: We have not got to that situation yet. We have a gas balancing alert, but no action has been taken because we are not in an emergency situation. The only action that is happening is that companies themselves have decided to reduce their energy needs—and who can blame them, at the price—but that is a natural mechanism. There is no question of prioritising anybody's gas needs at present; there is just a gas balancing alert, not an emergency.

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton) (LD): Given that this is the first time that National Grid has ever warned British industry that gas supplies may be shut off, does the Secretary of State regret the fact that the Minister for Energy told the House only last November that the UK was "awash with gas"? What will the right hon. Gentleman say to the thousands of employees laid off because of the recent hikes in gas prices? Have the Government not been negligently complacent about Britain's gas crisis, especially the lack of gas storage infrastructure? When Germany has storage facilities for 75 days and France for 66 days, is the right hon. Gentleman not just a little embarrassed that without Rough the UK has storage capacity for only 12 days?

Rather than listing excuses, as the Secretary of State has done today, will he confirm that Ministers were warned about the danger several times in recent years? Is not it the case that if we had those extra facilities, gas prices for UK industry would be lower today and the alert would not have taken place?

Alan Johnson: I welcome the hon. Gentleman to his new position—and immediately disagree with him. He says that this is the first time in the whole history of our fabulous nation that we have had a gas balancing alert. Yes, that is true—because gas balancing alerts were introduced for the first time this winter. That is the simple fact. The system worked, and it was right to introduce it. When my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy spoke last November, the situation was completely different; we had not lost the Rough facility. A cold snap in December led to companies taking gas out of storage early in the winter, which was expensive and put up prices. The issue was not about gas supplies; there was plenty of gas around in December.

The hon. Gentleman raised another issue that was completely wrong, too. He put a bizarre question: could I confirm that in Germany and France there is lots of storage, whereas in the UK, without Rough, we do not have so much storage? Yes, I can confirm that. As Rough holds 80 per cent. of our storage capacity, I can confirm to Opposition Members that when Rough is out of action our storage capacity is reduced. I hope that that helps them.

Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): Does the Secretary of State recall that the hard-hitting EU report that he mentioned sprang directly from the Heads of Government discussions at Hampton Court? Is not the real issue before us—the key way forward—transparency in the European market? We have talked about that for a decade. Is it not now time that the EU took action?

Alan Johnson: My hon. Friend is absolutely right: transparency is key. At the moment, we have to try to find out what facilities exist in other EU member states and what can come through the interconnector. It is because there is no transparency that no member state knows what is happening with energy supplies. He is absolutely right to mention Hampton Court, where we set in train the process for reaching an understanding across the EU about energy supplies, and the situation at Christmas between Russia and Ukraine was a real wake-up call. If we had not raised that issue at Hampton Court, other member states would have realised, following what happened at Christmas, the need to have an energy supply policy throughout the EU.

Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): There is nothing particularly unseasonal about the weather this March—March can often be a very cold month—and we face these problems again next winter. Indeed, the problems are exactly as the Select Committee on Trade and Industry foresaw in its report published in December, to which the Government responded so constructively. As little can be done over the next 12 months to correct the situation fundamentally, we referred to the need to take mitigating action, particularly for industrial and commercial customers—for example, fuel switching and removing some of the restrictions on emissions. The Government responded positively to that idea and said that they were exploring it with the Environment Agency. Can the Secretary of State update the House on what more the Government have done to enable such mitigating action to be taken—not just for this winter but, I am afraid, for next winter as well?

Alan Johnson: The hon. Gentleman and the Trade and Industry Committee produced an excellent report. We are acting on those recommendations. Indeed, if we do get into an emergency—I do not think that we will, and we should get things into perspective, as I have been saying—such mitigating factors can be introduced. We are a long way along the route to helping, in strict accordance with the recommendations that he made. He is right to suggest that the weather may not be unseasonal, although I think that the weather has improved since 1997—I would make that claim on behalf of the Government. None the less, a cold spell this late in the winter with storage capacity out of action is a series of events that we could have done without.

Helen Goodman (Bishop Auckland) (Lab): In my constituency two factories—Potters Ballotini and Weinberger—have been closed since November, allegedly temporarily, even though their sister plants on the continent are still open. At the same time, I understand, Barclays bank is paying its energy traders record bonuses. I find the Secretary of State's statement that supply is meeting demand—other than in a textbook sense—extraordinary. Can he not admit that it was precipitate to liberalise our energy markets before countries in the rest of Europe liberalised theirs?

Alan Johnson: No, I think that that was absolutely the right thing to do. As for how it has worked for our customers, both domestic and industrial, British industry, for instance, has paid something like £8 billion less for its energy since liberalisation than German industry. The record of UK companies' energy costs has been very good. We have a problem this winter—my hon. Friend refers to companies in her constituency—and I do not want to diminish in any way the effect on energy-intensive users: it has been dramatic this year, and it is something that we cannot deny.

My point about demand meeting supply is that National Grid issues a gas balancing alert when supply is not matching demand. It looks at the situation every day. Yesterday morning it decided that it should issue a gas balancing alert, because supply was not meeting demand. This morning it decided that it should not do so, because supply is meeting demand. That is the only point that I was making on behalf of National Grid. I was not trying to make some great philosophical point about the political situation with energy.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): Does the Minister accept that it is little consolation for consumers facing sky-high prices and major users facing interruptions in supply to be told by the Minister that yesterday's announcement is part of a grand master plan that is working exactly as it should? Is it not weak-kneed and feeble to claim that a fire in a single installation can bring the UK gas market into chaos and disarray? When will the Government accept responsibility for the lack of capacity in the system and the lack of investment, principally caused by Ofgem, which has delayed Norwegian supplies to this country? Why, with 24 discovered but underdeveloped gas fields west of Scotland, have the Government imposed a 10 per cent. supplementary charge on pipeline infrastructure, which has delayed their development? Does the Minister think that that is a good idea, in the circumstances?

Alan Johnson: Last year there were a record number of licences for exploration in the North sea, and we are pleased by the amount of interest there. All the major explorers have continued to make the point that they are interested in looking for supplies in the North sea, but increasingly they are looking longer for fewer resources. In the spirit of knockabout it is good to suggest that there is a magic wand that we could wave to put the situation right this winter. All that we can do is put it into context and make the argument about what needs to be done to rectify the situation for British business. What is needed is liberalisation in the European Union and more investment in pipeline facilities and storage. Some £10 billion of investment will be made by the private sector—we would never have been able to do that in the public sector—in the next few years. It is easy to exaggerate the problems and the situation in the UK, but it is incumbent on us to put the issues in perspective and to repeat yet again that there is no emergency.

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney) (Lab): Is not the lesson from yesterday that even in exceptional circumstances the system worked as it was designed to work? A couple of weeks ago, I asked the head of one of the largest European gas companies why his company was not trying to sell more gas to this country when our prices were higher. His answer, quite simply, was, "I am sewn up in long-term gas contracts with my customers, and I have to put them first." Does my right hon. Friend accept that explanation, and if so, does it not say something about the balance between the amount of gas that this country receives on long-term contracts and the amount that people are buying or supplying on spot prices?

Alan Johnson: It is undoubtedly the case that in continental Europe there are far more contract supplies of gas and energy. In this country, the position was similar until recently. More companies have decided to buy on the spot market, and who can blame them, as it was producing gas at 22p a therm only 18 months to two years ago? In Europe there are more contractual supplies than in the UK, but across Europe we need transparency, as my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping) said, and a liberalised market. If we can achieve that, we can ensure that instead of having national champions—a system pursued by many European Union countries—we have consumer champions producing the low energy costs that we have enjoyed in this country for many years.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): The Secretary of State is right to say that the problem lies with liberalisation in Europe and that the Government have tried to do something about it. However, they have been trying to do that for many years, so why does he think that the Europeans are going to listen to him now?

Alan Johnson: I do not know how many years we have been trying, but one thing is different: the Commission, and Commissioner Neelie Kroes in particular, are determined to tackle the issue. The Barroso Commission is a breath of fresh air, given the intensity of its desire to liberalise not just in energy but in other areas that remain unliberalised, and given its whole approach to regulation throughout the European Union.

Mr. John Grogan (Selby) (Lab): The Government have said that the owners of LNG terminals and gas storage facilities must either use them or lose them. Is there not a strong case for establishing the principle of third-party access for suppliers to storage facilities and terminals to enable the market to operate more effectively?

Alan Johnson: There may well be a case. That is an issue that we will examine in the energy review.

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): Does not the recent series of events show how UK plc is vulnerable when its energy supplies are disrupted? If the Secretary of State agrees, will he tell the House what new measures have been put in place to ensure that our storage and infrastructure facilities are protected from malicious attack?

Alan Johnson: We have a vulnerability this winter and next winter. Beyond that we do not expect our situation to be any more vulnerable than that of any other country. We are fortunate that we still have an indigenous supply. [Interruption.] It may be declining, as the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) says from a sedentary position. We may be a net importer of gas—but of all the G7 countries, only Canada is not a net importer of energy. I think that we will be in a position similar to that of other countries. As for malicious attacks, if the hon. Gentleman is talking about terrorism, we have long-standing measures in place to protect against that, particularly at our nuclear facilities. We believe that those measures have worked, and will work in the future.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): What specific measures would the Secretary of State like the European Union to take to address the gross distortions of the continental gas market, and what is the time frame for getting those remedies in place so that they take effect?

Alan Johnson: The specific remedies will be, first, transparency, with everyone being absolutely open about the energy supplies that exist in the European Union. That is a big issue for the EU. Germany imports about 41 per cent. of its gas from Russia and is extremely worried about being over-dependent on Russia. There is an urgent need for the European Union to look at its own resources. Secondly, although other member states were due to liberalise seven or eight years ago when the directive went through, that has not happened. Policy has not been put into practice. That needs to happen, which is why Neelie Kroes is looking at anti-trust measures that should be adopted to galvanise the situation. On the time scale, we expect anti-trust measures to be taken within weeks, as I said earlier. Beyond that I am not sure, but we are seeing a level of activity in the Commission that we have not seen for many years.

Daniel Kawczynski (Shrewsbury and Atcham) (Con): May I tell the Secretary of State that three British companies are drilling for gas off the coast of Mauritania and have found significant reserves of gas in that country? Will he agree to meet representatives of those companies? Does he agree that it is disappointing that we do not have an embassy in Mauritania? If we are to start exploring for gas in such countries, we need representation there.

Alan Johnson: I, or my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy, would be glad to meet the hon. Gentleman's constituents, although I am not so keen to go to Mauritania. His question about Britain having an embassy in Mauritania is more properly one for the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, which I am sure will consider it with interest.

BBC White Paper

4.23 pm

The Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Tessa Jowell): With permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I should like to make a statement. I am today publishing a White Paper on the future of the BBC, entitled "A Public Service for All: the BBC in the Digital Age". It does exactly what that describes.

We live in an era of rapid change. In broadcasting, new technologies are leading to vastly more television and radio channels and to new media services. The BBC's charter, shortly due for renewal, needs to create a BBC strong enough to thrive in the new environment and flexible enough to adapt to new challenges. The BBC is a driving force to enrich our public realm. It is one of those institutions that brings the people of this country together as equals.

More than 70 per cent. of households now have digital television. As digital delivers ever more choice, there are some who describe the BBC as an anachronism. The Government disagree. More importantly, the British people disagree. Our unprecedented engagement with the people of this country in the development of the White Paper—more than 10,000 people wrote to us—has shown that people right across the country want a strong BBC that is independent of Government and is responsive to public wishes.

The Government hope that the new charter will give the public the BBC that they want. The Reithian principles—"inform, educate and entertain"—will be adapted for the digital age, but we will give audiences and competitors greater clarity about what that means in practice.

The BBC will have six new purposes: sustaining citizenship and civil society, promoting education, stimulating creativity, reflecting the identity of the UK's nations, regions and communities, bringing the world to the UK and the UK to the world and building digital Britain, where the BBC will act as a "trusted guide". There was strong public support for all those objectives, but licence fee payers also want to ensure that they get the BBC programmes that they want to watch and listen to, and they do not want an overdose of worthiness.

The White Paper makes entertainment central to the BBC's mission. The BBC should continue to take fun seriously, engraining entertainment into all its services, but the White Paper is not about writing the BBC a blank cheque or chasing ratings through copy-cat programming. It is about ensuring that the BBC delivers what licence fee payers want in terms of quality and distinctiveness.

The BBC's governance structure has become anachronistic, and the BBC needs a new form of accountability to licence fee payers, as the BBC's shareholders. Our new arrangements will make the BBC closer to the people who pay for it and more accountable to them. In a step change for the BBC's governance, we will abolish the BBC governors and replace them with two new bodies, the BBC Trust and a separate executive board.

The trust will be the licence fee payer's voice. It will act as a proxy for the BBC's shareholders, making it the first public interest body on that scale that the country has ever seen. The trust will oversee the executive board, whose own job will be to run the BBC's services. There will be clear separation of responsibilities between the trust and the executive board. Although the trust will be the sovereign body of the BBC—its word will be final—the new charter and agreement will prevent it from doing the executive board's job, which is critical to maintaining the objectivity required to generate and sustain public confidence. That is a unique solution for a unique organisation in unique circumstances.

An important part of getting the best programmes to the screen is competition for quality programmes. The White Paper requires the BBC to operate a commissioning system that encourages greater competition between in-house and independent producers but maintains the critical mass of in-house production. That new "window of creative competition" should result in the independent quota of 25 per cent. genuinely becoming a floor, not a ceiling.

I repeat our welcome in principle for the BBC's proposals to move a significant amount of production to Greater Manchester, helping to ensure that the licence fee is used as venture capital for the whole nation's creativity.

The BBC will continue as the cornerstone of public service broadcasting. We are equally committed to maintaining a dynamic commercial sector. That, too, is in the interests of the licence fee payer. In order to do that, we will put in place a triple-lock system to ensure the highest standards of accountability. First, the trust will issue licences to the executive board for running each BBC service. Secondly, BBC content will have to have distinctive characteristics, such as being original, of high quality, challenging or innovative—all supported by the consultation with licence fee payers. Thirdly, a public value test will be applied to all new BBC services or significant changes to existing services. In response to some concerns raised in the debate that followed the Green Paper, I am happy to clarify that whenever the trust carries out a public value test, Ofcom will provide the market impact assessment to guarantee rigour and ensure wider public confidence.

We will also put in place: a new duty on the trust to have regard to competition issues; ex ante codes in specific areas that have the potential to raise issues or concerns about competition; an overhauled fair trading regime; and a fair, transparent complaints system. The White Paper also confirms that the BBC will be fully licence fee funded for the period of the next charter. There will be future reviews into the scope for other methods of funding the BBC beyond 2016 and the possibility of distributing public funding, including licence fee money, beyond the BBC.

The process of deciding the next licence fee settlement has already started. Licence fee payers and industry will help to form our conclusions. The trust will need to make some tough decisions about how resources are allocated within the boundaries of the settlement. That will include self-help. To help the trust exercise stewardship of the licence fee, the relationship between the BBC and the National Audit Office will be strengthened within the existing arrangements.

Despite past predictions, public service broadcasting, led by the BBC, remains the bedrock of today's media, with strong public support. We are optimists about the future of the BBC, but it cannot take its position for granted. It must develop its role over the next 10 years, strengthening its accountability, bringing in new generations of viewers and listeners, and building a new consensus around the value of its place in Britain. The White Paper gives it the means to build that national consensus, with the authority and support of licence fee payers, and so I commend it to the House.

Mr. Hugo Swire (East Devon) (Con): First, may I thank the right hon. Lady for allowing me to have prior sight of both the White Paper and her statement? The wait was almost worth it, although I cannot quite see the difference between the Green Paper and the White Paper and we had to wait for the equivalent of the gestation period for an elephant to get the White Paper. I would be interested if the right hon. Lady would tell us where the differences are between one and the other.

The BBC is indeed a unique, much loved and much cherished institution and the Conservative party is committed to ensuring its future. Across the country and the world, the BBC stands out as a beacon of excellence. Our duty is to ensure that the BBC that we pass on to future generations is equipped to flourish in the decades ahead. Does the right hon. Lady not understand that to many the White Paper is such a disappointment? It singularly fails to rise to the challenge that the BBC faces. It was supposed to provide us with a springboard to the new digital age. But it is not so much a launching pad as a holding pen.

The White Paper is a huge missed opportunity for change and innovation. The Secretary of State has failed to grasp the challenges facing broadcasting in the 21st century. Digital television, broadband internet, podcasting and on-demand viewing are transforming the world in which the BBC operates and will change forever the future of public service television in Britain. In a fast-paced digital age, with people watching television on their mobile phones, iPods and laptops, and with the eclipse of the traditional television channel, is it credible to believe that a compulsory tax on the ownership of a television set is the right way to fund our national broadcaster for the next 10 years? Do not hon. Members accept that by failing to respond to those challenges, the Secretary of State has produced a White Paper that fails not only the BBC but the viewing public?
